is needless to state with any degree of precision the bounds and limits of this extensive country, for we should humbly propose to your Majesty that the new Government of Canada should be restricted, so as to leave on the one hand all the lands lying about the great Lakes and beyond the sources of the rivers which fall into the River St. Lawrence from the north, to be thrown into the Indian country, and on the other hand, all the lands from Cape Roziere to Lake Champlain, along the heights where the sources of the rivers rise, which fall into the Bay of Fundy and Atlantic Ocean, to be annexed to Nova Scotia and New England in such a manner as upon any future directions after particular surveys have been made shall appear most proper. If this general idea shall be approved the future bounds of the new Colony of Canada will be as follows. On the South East it will be bounded by the high lands which range across the Continent from Cape Roziere in the Gulph of St. Lawrence to that point of lake Champlain above St. Johns which is in latitude 45 degrees north ; which high lands separate the heads of the rivers which fall into the great River St. Lawrence from the heads of those which fall into the Atlantic Ocean or Bay of Fundy. On the North West it will be bounded by a line drawn south from the River St. Johns in Labrador by the heads of those rivers which fall into the River St. Lawrence as far as the east end of Lake Nipissin upon the Ottawa River, and on the South West by a line drawn due west to the River St. Lawrence from that point on Lake Champlain which is directly opposite to where the south line falls in and so cross the said River St. Lawrence and pursuing a North West course along the heights where the rivers rise, that fall into the Ottawa River, to be continued to the east end of Nipissin Lake where the north line terminates. In order however that your Majesty may judge with the greater precision of the limits of Canada as above described and also of those we shall propose for Florida, and of the country we think right to be left as Indian territory, we humbly beg leave to refer to the annexed chart in which those limits are particularly delineated, and of which your Majesty will have a clearer conception than can be conveyed by descriptive words alone." The chart referred to is Chart No. 27 of the Canadian Atlas, by Bowen & Gibson. Perhaps we may postpone looking at it for the moment, as I am on the text at present. "The advantage resulting from this restriction of the Colony of Canada will be that of preventing by proper and natural boundaries, as well the ancient French inhabitants as others from removing and settling in remote places, where they neither could be so conveniently made amenable to the jurisdiction of any Colony nor made subservient to the interest of the trade and commerce of this Kingdom by an easy communication with and vicinity to the great River St. Lawrence. And this division by the heights of land to the south of the River St. Lawrence will on the one hand leave all your Majesty's new French subjects under such Government, as your Majesty shall think proper"—I do not think I need read that further. That is the boundary along the Spine of the Gaspé Peninsula, as Sir John called it, where the height of land is made the express boundary.

p. 374

I had not noted for comment anything more in that document, and I think your Lordships might now look at the next important document on page 915.

The Lord Warrington.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Do you attach importance to the words, on page 910, "beyond the sources of the rivers which fall into the River St. Lawrence from the north" ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Oh, yes. My submission upon it is going to be that they contemplated territory right up to the north. Of the rivers that fall into the River St. Lawrence from the north a very good example is the River St. John itself. It falls into the River St. Lawrence from the north.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : It says the land beyond the sources of those rivers. That means the land beyond that height of land is affected.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, that is so. There is a good deal more about this later.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Of course, it stops at the River St. John, as its eastern boundary.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Quebec does.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord WARRINGTON : When they say "the rivers that fall into the St. Lawrence" they do not mean the rivers that fall into the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is very difficult to say exactly where the gulf ends and the River begins.

29 Oct., 1926.

Lord Warrington.

Lord WARRINGTON : We are not considering here the rivers on the south coast of Labrador which fall into the River St. Lawrence.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I am not sure, my Lord.

Lord WARRINGTON : I think you will find they are dealing with the boundaries of Quebec.

Mr. Macmillan.

Sir JOHN SIMON: My friend will notice the word "Gulf" comes immediately afterwards, and also before.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, but I do not forget that I am seeking for a line of demarcation between the Gulf and the River. It has been a highly contentious topic. I do not know whether one can get it out of this.

p. 375

Lord WARRINGTON : What are they setting themselves to define in that paragraph which begins : “ It is needless to state,” are the boundaries of Canada as possessed and claimed by the French. You will see in the previous paragraph it says : “Canada as possessed and claimed by the French consisted of an immense tract of country ”—and so forth. Then they say : “ It is needless to state with any degree of precision the bounds and limits of this extensive country.” That is what they are setting themselves to define in that paragraph.

The Lord Chancellor.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, but may I suggest to your Lordship that Canada as possessed and claimed by the French included the whole of Labrador other than the Hudson's Bay territory. There is no doubt about that.

Lord WARRINGTON : I am not sure whether the French called that Canada.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I could show your Lordship that later on, I think.

Mr. Macmillan.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Governor Murray's report said it was not so.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Somebody else said the other thing.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : That expression in line 20 might be taken to refer to all land north of this height of land to a certain distance east, but I am not quite sure how far east. It is only north of the rivers which fall into the River St. Lawrence ; so that it might stop at this point, or a little bit further east, but would not go certainly beyond the River St. John.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Fortunately, I do not need to rely upon this for my point there, my Lord.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : It is rather obscure.

29 Oct., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord Warrington.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I am not going to be dogmatic upon it, my Mr. Macmillan. Lord. I am not going to be dogmatic upon any point in this case. I am going to be, I hope, of assistance rather than a dogmatist, who never is of any assistance to anybody. I think you have this conception there. I suggest that you are parcelling out Canada as possessed and claimed by the French, and that you are considering this question of Government. You are recognising that certain portions of it do not require the same elaboration of government as other parts, because they were more primitive, and some portions may be left to the Indians. The point I am concerned with at this stage is to show from a perusal of these documents that the Lords of Trade did not consider that they had relegated already a large part of Canada as possessed and claimed by the French to Newfoundland. That is what I want to bring out if I can.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord Warrington.

Lord WARRINGTON : But did they not recognise that on page 909, where they say : “ This we suppose has been the reason which induced your Majesty to annex the Coast of Labrador to that Government,” that is the Government of Newfoundland. Then when you look and see what the Coast of Labrador was, it was from the Hudson's Strait to the River St. John. Therefore, when they are settling the boundary of Canada that has to be, they are obviously not dealing with that which has already been annexed to Newfoundland.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : You will see how they parcelled it out. The significance of that is this. Here this Coast of Labrador has been annexed. Why ? Because a temporary fishery is the only object.

Lord Warrington.

Lord WARRINGTON: Oh, yes, I know the reason. I am only saying when you come to the definition of boundaries, on page 910, it must be fairly clear that they are not dealing with either the River St. John or anything to the east, because that territory they have already referred to—whatever “territory ” may mean. That is at issue, of course.

Mr. MACMILLAN : They have disposed of the coast of that territory. May I qualify it in that way. May I say the coast of that territory, because I attach great importance to that. The hinterland and interior, in my submission, are dealt with otherwise. My Lord will reserve judgment upon that for the moment.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord WARRINGTON : I am only saying that the boundaries referred to on page 910 were not the boundaries of the territory which has already been annexed to Newfoundland, whatever it may be.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Of course.

Lord WARRINGTON : And it must be the rivers west of St. John's River, and not those to the east of it.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I think that probably is uncontrovertible.

Mr. Macmillan.

Your Lordships are, very naturally, possessed of the alluring propositions of my learned friend at present, which it is my humble endeavour to displace. The suggestion that your Lordship has in mind is naturally prompted by what you have already heard. If we pass to the reply on the 14th July, 1763, this whole matter is still under consideration. What are we to do in these new territories ? His Majesty is pleased to communicate his views. The passage is to be found at the foot of page 915. “ My Lords, Your Report, dated the 8th of last month, having been laid before the King, and His Majesty having taken the same into consideration ; I am, in consequence thereof, to acquaint your Lordships, that the King approves the erecting three new Governments in North America, under the denominations your Lordships propose, of Canada, East Florida, and West Florida.”

Viscount Haldane.

Viscount HALDANE : These are Crown Colonies.

Mr. MACMILLAN : There was provision made in Quebec for the calling of an assembly as and when times permitted.

Viscount HALDANE : That is all right. In the first instance they were Crown Colonies. We know that Sir George Murray had great trouble with the germ of the idea, and Sir Guy Carleton had after his time. There was a tremendous strife up to the days of Lord Durham which was finally settled about 1860.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That interesting historical statute which Sir John referred to, the Quebec Act, is exceedingly interesting reading on that subject. His Majesty approved of three new Governments, and they are suggested to be called Canada, East Florida, and West Florida. Then it goes on to point out : “ Yet the King thinks that great inconveniences might arise, from so large a tract of land being left without being subject to the Civil Jurisdiction of some Governor, in Virtue of His Majesty's Commission, under the Great Seal of Great Britain.” He has observed the boundaries proposed, but he says that that may mean a great deal of territory without civil jurisdiction. “ And (besides the Difficulties there might be, for Want of such a Civil Jurisdiction, in bringing to Justice Criminals and Fugitives, who may take refuge in that Country). Their not being included within some Established Government might, in time to come, furnish matter of Dispute, with regard to the Property; And other Powers, who might hereafter find Means of Access to those Countries, might take Possession thereof, as derelict lands ; the King therefore is of Opinion that, in the Commission for the Governor of Canada, all Lakes, namely, Ontario, Erie, Huron, Michigan, and Superior, should be included ’—that is the five lakes—“ with all the Country, as far North and West as the Limits of the Hudsons Bay Company and the Mississippi.” Note the next very significant words, my Lord,—“ And also that all Lands whatsoever, ceded by the late Treaty, and which are not already included within the Limits of His Majesty's ancient Colonies, or intended to form the Governments of East and West Florida, as described in your Lordships Report, be assigned to the Government of Canada, unless your Lordships should suggest any other Distribution, which might answer the purpose more effectually ; On which matter your Lordships will lose no time in making a Report to His Majesty.” Now these are significant words, my Lord, “also that all Lands, whatsoever, ceded by the late Treaty, and which are not already included within the limits of His Majesty's ancient Colonies, or intended to form the Governments of East and West Florida, as described in your Lordships' Report, be assigned to the Government of Canada." There is a sort of rounding-up there of everything that has been acquired. He has dealt with the territory which my learned friend is so interested in, the territory round about the lakes ; he has made his suggestion about those, and he also goes on to say : Let us have a general round-up so that there shall be nothing left over.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : There must be an implied exception there of the coast of Labrador, whatever that means.

Viscount HALDANE : He includes that in the words which are used there, " which are not already included within the Limits of His Majesty's ancient Colonies, or intended to form."

29 Oct., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount Haldane.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, my Lord ; with great respect I think not. I do not think the exception is there. If it is there at all, it is an implied exception. Your Lordships will see where my point comes in there. I think as one reads these documents, looking at them in their true historical perspective, the impression which one forms is this, that Newfoundland was not regarded as having acquired territorial jurisdiction to any material extent at all. It is true that it did acquire, and we have accepted the position that it acquired, certain territorial jurisdiction ; but I venture to suggest for my Lords' consideration whether the whole idea was not merely, as the proclamation talks of itself,—“ care and inspection ” I think were the words.

29 Oct., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

This question of the territorial aspect of Newfoundland and the main land was really negligible ; that was not considered of any importance. What was of importance was the vigilant observance of fisheries on its coast. You find throughout when they are dealing with the parcelling out of this territory of French Canada which had been ceded to us, a conspicuous omission to refer to any territory of Newfoundland in that area. It is always treated as if the Newfoundland Government is seated there, but as an institution of fishery interests, and therefore it is really irrelevant to the question of the parcelling out of the territory for territorial jurisdiction. You will see how that comes in in the proclamation. It fits the language of the proclamation extremely accurately, but on the generality of the language you do observe the suggestion of His Majesty was (of course, it was not carried out) that “ all lands whatsoever, ceded by the late Treaty ” be joined to the Government of Canada. That certainly would embrace, in my submission, the territory which my learned friend now claims and which, according to his view, had already been excised from the ceded territory and confined to the Government of Newfoundland. “ Having thus informed you Lordships of the King's Intentions with regard to the Extent of the New Governments to be erected in North America ; I am now to repeat to you, That His Majesty entirely concurs in your Lordships idea, of not permitting, for the present, ally Grant of Lands, or New Settlements, beyond the Bounds proposed in your Report ;

“Now—observe the words—“ And that all the countries, beyond such bounds, be also, for the present, left unsettled for the Indian Tribes to hunt in ; but open to a free Trade for all the Colonies : And the King; would have the Instructions to the Three New Governors in North America, formed so, as to contain the strongest Injunctions and Restrictions for this purpose.” Then they are told to get ready commissions for Governor Murray and the others. Then he deals with the ancient Colonies on page 917. I need not trouble with those, we know what they are. Then he thinks that the Agents for Indian affairs should “ correspond with your Lordships, in regard to the Indian country, and transmit information.” Following upon that, my Lord, you have the report of the Lords of Trade at page 919: “ In Obedience to your Majesty's Commands contained in a Letter from the Earl of Egremont, dated the 14th of July last signifying to US Your Majesty's Most Gracious Approbation of Our Idea, that that large Tract of Country, bounded by the Mississippi and the Limits of the Hudson Bay Company on the one hand and on the other by the Limits of Canada, East and West Florida and His Majesty's ancient Colonies, should for the present be made subject to no grants of Lands nor to any Settlements, But acquainting us, that it was Your Majesty's Pleasure, that it should be put under some civil jurisdiction, by a Commission,” and so on, for certain objects given, and “ that the whole of this Territory should be inserted in the Commission of the Governor of Canada.” Then they give reasons why it would be better to adopt another policy. My learned friend read the first paragraph there in order to emphasise that the adjacent territory around the lakes was what was in mind, particularly the six nations. Then he says : “ If these objections ”—that is to the King's proposal—“ should appear of Weight to Your Majesty, We would humbly propose that a Commission under the Great Seal, for the Government of this Country, should be given to the Commander in Chief of Your Majesty's Troops for the time being adapted to the Protection of the Indians and the fur Trade of your Majesty's subjects.” Then at the bottom you find the inception of the proclamation : “ In the meantime we humbly propose that a Proclamation be immediately issued by Your Majesty as well on Account of the late Complaints of the Indians and the actual Disturbances in Consequence, as of Your Majesty's fixed Determination to permit no grant of Lands nor any settlements to be made within certain fixed Bounds, under Pretence of Purchase or any other Pretext whatever, leaving all that Territory within it free for the hunting Grounds of those Indian Nations, Subjects of Your Majesty, and for the free trade of all your Subjects, to prohibit strictly all Infringement or Settlements to be made on such grounds.” My Lord, I pause here just to remind your Lordships of what are the two cardinal points of my learned friend's case which I have in mind as I am reading these documents, and which are no doubt present to your Lordship's mind. His case hinges upon two points, first, that the Hudson's Bay country was the height of land ; secondly, that there was no Indian territory reserved to His Majesty in the area

he claims, that is to say, in the green area. These are the two cardinal matters, and that explains the anxiety with which he addressed himself to the ascertainment of the Hudson's Bay boundary on the one hand, because it was a height of land boundary, and the even greater insistence which he placed upon the identification of the hunting grounds of the Indians which were reserved to the Crown. If his case breaks down on either of those points, then the claim collapses, and he finds himself driven from the height of land to some place else. Where he might find a rest for the sole of his foot is a question which your Lordships may have to determine. If he is once dislodged from the height of land on which he has for the moment perched himself, then he will have to journey towards the coast in my company, however unwillingly, and find himself arrested at some particular point which will be the point your Lordships will determine ; it may be one mile, or more, or less, but it will be some point other than the height of land. Then he will be confronted with precisely the difficulty which he is pleased to taunt me with, that I suggest a boundary which is indefinite and unascertainable, while he is able to present to your Lordships a physiographical boundary, attractive, therefore, because ascertainable by scientific means and not merely ascertainable by legal means, as my boundary is. One can understand therefore his anxiety on these two topics of the Hudson's Bay boundary and the Indian territory, because if he fails upon either of those he is dislodged from the peak—I should not say “ from the peak ” ; there are no peaks there—from the plateau upon which he is at the present moment perambulating the bounds. These documents bring one to the Proclamation. I am in your Lordships judgment as to whether I have not made good this up to date, that the fishery matter, with its attendant disposal of the coast of Labrador, was out of the way ; that the survey was being made now of Canada, the ceded territories, with a view to seeing what should be done with them ; that there had been a transaction—I am using the most neutral language—with regard to the coast of Labrador, but that that was over, and that the question still remained, what was to be done for the Indians, and what was to be done with regard to the parcelling out of this vast area ceded to Great Britain. It was the second chapter upon which they were embarking in this matter, and it was the sequel to the second chapter that the proclamation was published. My learned friend has said that the proclamation is the root of their title ; in point of fact it must be in the commission ; and there we are agreed, because Sir John has put it now upon the Commission and not upon the Proclamation.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount Haldane.

Viscount HALDANE : Was not there a good deal more of what is now within Canada to be disposed of ? You have talked of Canada. Canada consisted then of the Provinces of Quebec and Montreal on the one hand, and a rather indefinite Province called Ontario. Beyond that there was the whole of the north-west territory ; the Hudson's Bay made some kind of claim to it under the name of Ruperts Land, and there was also what is now British Columbia. Is there any trace of attention to the fact that the British Possessions in North-west America extended to this vast tract ? There is not a word of attention to it in the documents you have read.

p. 381

Mr. MACMILLAN : To the Northwest tracts ?

Viscount HALDANE : Yes.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I thought Sir John made his point good, if I may respectfully say so, when he pointed to the great territories round the lakes and to the northwest from there.

Sir JOHN SIMON : And to the northwards also.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It was the great Indian territory.

Sir John Simon.

Viscount HALDANE : There was a much larger territory away beyond that, extending to Alaska now. Nobody knew what the boundary was. Russia came in at one stage, but all that was in dispute between us and the French.

Mr. MACMILLAN : We got all the French had, but what the French had they did not themselves know.

Sir JOHN SIMON : That is right.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount HALDANE : I think that that is very likely. Consequently you do not find any systematic attempt to dispose of it, but it was vested in the Crown.

Mr. MACMILLAN : You do find this, that “ All lands whatsoever ceded by the late Treaty should be assigned to the Government of Canada.” That was the King's proposal. It was not carried out because the Quebec territory was not such as to embrace it all.

29 Oct., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount HALDANE : What were the words in the Treaty ?

Lord Warrington

Sir JOHN SIMON : Would your Lordship permit me to say that I cannot help thinking for the purpose of the matter in hand, the western limits would be the Mississippi, because your Lordship recollects that by the terms of the Treaty the French withdrew to the west of the Mississippi, and how the Sovereign rights might be distributed west of the Mississippi I fancy will be out of the picture. Is not that a fair suggestion ?

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : As always, my learned friend puts it quite fairly. The French did still retain under the name of Louisiana—which partly ran up there, but it was something very different to what is now the State of Louisiana—a large area there in what is now the United States to the west of the Mississippi.

p. 382

Viscount HALDANE : It may have extended up to the Arctic Circle.

Mr. MACMILLAN : The actual boundaries between France and the British Dominion are set out on page 336 in Section 7 of the Treaty. There it is done by frontiers, and a frontier is laid clown.

Lord WARRINGTON : The cession is in clause 4 of the Treaty. and the actual boundary is laid down by clause 6. In clause 4, Canada and all its dependencies is ceded.

Viscount Haldane.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I think I am therefore justified in saying that all that France had in that region was given, whatever it was. This is the definitive Treaty of Paris, and I will read it, if I may. “ His Most Christian Majesty renounces all pretensions which he has heretofore formed or might have formed to Nova Scotia or Acadia in all its parts, and guaranties the whole of it, and with all its dependencies, to the King of Great Britain.” I think my learned friend read this.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, we went through this.

Viscount HALDANE : Does “ Acadia ” there mean Canada ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : This is the real Acadia of the French. Then it goes on : “ Moreover, his Most Christian Majesty cedes and guaranties to his said Britannick Majesty, in full right, Canada, with all its dependencies.” Acadia was sometimes used for Canada in some of the old maps, but it is not so used there. They really mean Nova Scotia and, I think,

New Brunswick also.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes ; the peninsula.

Mr. MACMILLAN : “ Canada with all its dependencies, as well as the island of Cape Breton, and all the other islands and coasts,” and so on. It is in the most all-embracing terms.

Viscount HALDANE : I observe two things in it. In the first place, there is no reference to Hudson's Bay at all there. Whether they thought it was not necessary to provide for that. I do not know, but Ruperts Land being a very wide place you would have thought that they would have put something in.

Mr. MACMILLAN : We had already recovered for Britain, under the Treaty of Utrecht, the whole of the Hudson's Bay territory.

Viscount HALDANE: Including Rupert's Land ?

Mr. MACMILLAN: Yes, whatever that was.

Sir John Simon

The Lord Chancellor

Mr. Macmillan

Viscount HALDANE : Another thing I do not notice is any definition of Louisiana.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It comes out in this fashion. If you look at the frontier as set out in Article 7, you will find there the reference to the River Mississippi, and it is to the west of that that the French keep.

Sir JOHN SIMON : It is Article 7, I think.

Viscount HALDANE : Extending indefinitely north.

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, my Lord, not indefinitely north, but indefinitely west of that point. " In order to re-establish peace on solid and durable foundations, and to remove for ever all subject of dispute with regard to the limits of the British and French territories on the continent of America, it is agreed, that, for the future, the confines between the dominions of his Britannick Majesty and those of his Most Christian Majesty, in that part of the world, shall be fixed irrevocably by a line drawn along the middle of the River Mississippi, from its source to the river Iberville, and from thence, by a line drawn along the middle of this river, and the lakes Maurepas and Pontchartrain to the sea, and for this purpose, the most Christian King cedes in full right, and guaranties to his Most Britannick Majesty the river and port of the Mobile, and every thing which he posses, or ought to possess, on the left side of the river Mississippi, except the town of New Orleans." That does not exhaust the boundaries.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Forgive me, that is a matter of argument. If you will assume, as I suggested in opening, that the River Mississippi was regarded as rising on the height of land which was the southern boundary of the Hudson's Bay then it follows you have got a cutting off of the French Empire entirely to the west of that line. It was part of the proposition which I made.

29 Oct., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan

The LORD CHANCELLOR : On that map which we have been using, which was nearly of that date, the boundary of the Hudson's Bay territory fixed under the Treaty of Utrecht is marked by straight lines. The whole territory would be treated there as Hudson's Bay territory. There is also marked " Parts unknown."

Sir JOHN SIMON : No doubt.

Viscount HALDANE : That may be the explanation of it.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is also shown by this, in the second Article. The Treaty of Utrecht is confirmed. Under the Treaty of Utrecht there was "Hudson's Bay territory," whatever that was. It is one of the difficulties in this case that lines were never drawn ; territories were described. The Hudson's Bay territory, whatever that means, was British at that time, but all French Canada was ceded to us. Your Lordships are not really, if I may say so, much troubled with the question of the Hudson's Bay boundary to the west; it is the Hudson's Bay boundary on this side of it, to the east side, that is of moment in the present case. I shall have a good deal to say about it later on, but in the meantime my suggestion is that my learned friend's green area was part of the Canada which had been French and became ours, and was dealt with as we have seen. Referring again to the document in front of us, your Lordship has my view upon the two chapters of the Commission and the proclamation. Will your Lordships now look at page 921 ? There is one other letter to be taken, I think, along with this. We are still before the date of the Commission, which was the 7th of October. This is a letter from the Lords of Trade to the Earl of Halifax, who had succeeded Egremont.

3 F

p. 384

The LORD CHANCELLOR : If you are taking them in order of date, are not the instructions to Lord Colville before this?

Mr. MACMILLAN : The instructions to Lord Colville are found in Volume VIII, page 4215. The relevance of that is this, my Lord, that Lord Colville also got instructions to see that the 4th and 5th Articles of the Treaty of Paris were carried out. It is only necessary for the purpose of filling it in and accounting for everything here. This is the Commission to Lord Colville, whose command, so to speak, fitted in with Captain Graves's command, and he also is exhorted to see to the carrying out in the waters under his charge of the 5th and 6th Articles of the Treaty of Paris, the fishery Articles, just as Captain Graves's Commission had been altered when he got his new commission. In order to effectuate that, this instruction was given to Lord Colville " as Commander in Chief of His Majesty's ships and vessels employed, and to be employed, in the River St. Lawrence and along the coasts of Nova Scotia, Islands of St. John and Cape Breton, etc., providing for the supervision of the fishery on the said coasts."

Viscount Haldane

29 Oct., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord WARRINGTON : These are the Admiralty instructions.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord. " By the Commissioners for executing the Office of Lord High Admiral." He is a purely nautical person. He is instructed under a reference to the 4th and 5th Articles of the Treaty of Peace. It is line 32. Captain Graves's was 5 and 6 ; this is 4 and 5. Four related to the gulf and river of St. Lawrence.

Viscount HALDANE : You see what it was that he was to do at line 21 ; he was to guard “ the coasts of the provinces within the extent of your Command, and protect the trade bound to and from those Provinces, and the Fishery upon the coasts.” It was purely defence.

Lord WARRINGTON : He was in no sense a Civil Governor ?

p. 385

Mr. MACMILLAN : No.

Lord WARRINGTON: He was admiral.

Mr. MACMILLAN : He was to pay attention to those Articles of the Treaty. On page 4216, line 12, you will see : “You are therefore to use your utmost care, diligence, and attention, that the several stipulations herein before-mentioned be duly and strictly performed, according to the Tenor and intention thereof, as far as they shall come within the limits of your command; as also to settle and guard the fishery of His Majesty's Subjects within those Limits, taking care to prevent the subjects of France from giving them any disturbance by Acts of violence or injustice ; or by any evasion contrary to the spirit and intention of the said Treaties ; and likewise to prevent the French from catching Fish,” and so on. He was to look after elicit trade, and then there were paragraphs about moving people from the northern colonies to East and West Florida. He had some things to do on shore ; he had to make surveys and charts, and all the rest of it. That really had completed the arrangements that were necessary to look after the fishing matters under the Treaty, and that is all disposed of before the Proclamation is issued. There also precedes the issuing of the Proclamation, the letter of the Earl of Halifax to the Lords of Trade on the 19th September, 1763, page 921: “ Having laid before the King Your Lordships Representation of the 5th of August last, transmitted to the late Earl of Egremont in your Letter of the same Date, I am commanded to acquaint Your Lordship that His Majesty, upon Consideration of the Reasons therein set forth, is pleased to lay aside the Idea of including within the Government of Canada, or of any established Colony, the Lands which are to be reserved for the present, for the Use of the Indians. And His Majesty thinks proper to direct that the Extent of the Commission, which Your Lordships are to prepare for the Honourable James Murray, shall be exactly such as is marked out in your first Report of the 8th of June last, and in the Map thereto annexed, under the Denomination of Canada. That such Government be described in the Commission, as comprehending all such Part of Canada on the North Side of the River St. Lawrence, and all such parts of His Majesty's ancient Colonies of Nova Scotia, New England, and New York, on the south side of the said River, as lie within the Limits above mentioned, and that It be called the Province of Quebec. His Majesty approves Your Lordships' Proposition of issuing immediately a Proclamation, to prohibit for the present, any Grant or Settlement within the Bounds of the Countries intended to be reserved for the use of the Indians.”

Viscount HALDANE : The Indians got a mere occupancy title ; they got no legal title. The title was in the Crown.

p. 386

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is so. The Privy Council dealt with the proclamation, and on page 925 you have a record of their approval of the proclamation. I do not read it, because I do not want to delay unduly. It was approved by the Privy Council and was directed to be issued, and then you have this very important document, the Royal Proclamation. The first topic dealt with in the Royal Proclamation on page 153, in the Red Volume, is the erection of four distinct and separate Governments, Quebec, East Florida, West Florida, and Grenada, three on the main land, and one among the islands. The Government of Quebec is first of all described as “bounded on the Labrador Coast by the River St. John, and from thence by a line drawn from the head of that river ”—pray note the difference there ; it is “ from the head of that river, through the lake St. John, to the south end of the Lake Nipissim ; from whence the said line, crossing the River St. Lawrence, and the Lake Champlain in forty-five degrees of north latitude, passes along the high lands which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the said River St. Lawrence, from those which fall into the sea ”—that is right down to Cape Rosieres, and it is still called the River St. Lawrence—“ and also along the north coast of the Baye des Chaleurs and the coast of the Gulph of St. Lawrence to Cape Rosieres, and from thence crossing the mouth of the River St. Lawrence by the west end of the Island of Anticosti, terminates at the aforesaid River St. John.” I just paused a moment because I was not quite sure that I had done justice to the point :—“ passes along the high lands which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the said River St. Lawrence, from those which fall into the sea.” Yes, that is one the south side ; I was afraid for a moment I had done an injustice to the description.

Sir JOHN SIMON : That is right ; you will see it on your big map.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I used it for the moment for showing that the River St. Lawrence went down to Cape Rosieres, and I was not sure that I was justified in saying that.

Sir JOHN SIMON : It is just about opposite the River St. John.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Just about opposite. Now, my Lords, that is the description of the Government of Quebec. The Proclamation proceeds to set up three other Governments, East and West Florida, and Grenada, with which we need not delay.

Then comes, on page 154, what I venture to suggest is one of the most important of all the statements which we have in this critical year 1763 ; “ And to the end that the open and free fishery of our subjects may be extended to and carried on upon the coast of Labrador, and the adjacent islands, we have thought fit, with the advice of our said Privy Council, to put all that coast, from the River St. John's to Hudson's Streights, together with the islands of Anticosti and the Madelaine, and all other smaller islands lying upon the said coast, under the care and inspection of our Governor of Newfoundland.”

Viscount HALDANE : The phrase is very curious : “ care and inspection.”

Mr. MACMILLAN : If my view as submitted is sound, that the whole matter of concern at this time was a vigilant observance of fishery rights and their protection from encroachment by the French, then the language is exceedingly apposite. It was a care and inspection of fisheries that was confided to this Governor. He was selected for the very reason that he had experience in caring for and inspecting fisheries ; that was his job in Newfoundland. He was selected to do that thing, and here you have an express declaration in a document of the highest authority, a document described as the source of Newfoundland's original jurisdiction in the Labrador. In that document you find the express statement by the very persons concerned in this whole distribution of administration, of what they have done ; because this is a recital of something accomplished already —“ We have thought fit ” ; this is not the instrument which does it ; it is a record of what has been done ; and observe how it is done. It is done in association with this question of Quebec. Then you will find, a few pages further on, that we have got Quebec, we have got this care and inspection of the coast, and then we have still got to deal with the Indians, and we have dealt with that.

Lord Sumner.

Viscount Haldane.

Lord SUMNER : I understand your case to be that some territory was assigned out of the general land of the Crown by this Proclamation.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord SUMNER : Then all the rest of it “ to the end that ” and “ under the care and inspection of,” appear to go not to the quantum of the territory, but the policy. That is what he has to do with it ; it is a description of the territory as opposed, it may be, to its area.

Viscount HALDANE : They were gradually progressing from administration by the Crown, to Crown Colony government. You had got something like Crown government in the Island of Newfoundland itself, and you had got it in Quebec, but here there was a gradual progress in which it was not necessary to do anything more than to put certain coasts and islands under care and inspection. They did not become Crown Colonies. They became under the custody of somebody, who might be the Governor of another Colony or who might be someone else.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That may have been the general survey, but it does not leave me quite comfortable in answer to my Lord Sumner. I would like to meet that point as it was expressed to me, in this shape ; it is a point I ought to meet. If there is a territorial content in this already, then the mere fact that you describe the purpose with which you have confided that territory to the Governor of Newfoundland will not necessarily limit the extent of it. I think I have your Lordship's point correct.

Lord Sumner.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I will not at all limit it. I should like to deal with that, because I think that goes very intimately into this case. May I suggest, first of all, that if I have made any impression in the direction in which I have sought to make an impression, namely, that this conception of dealing with the coast of Labrador was not a territorial conception at all in its origin, but was a naval survey, it is quite true, and I cannot blink this, that as you progress, the documents use language which has made it inevitable that we should concede that there is some land. In its inception, had it not been for the language used in these later instruments, my submission would have been that he was not entitled to be on land at all any more than the French were. But one is driven to this, that you see a certain progress through the documents in the language used, and it is because of that language used, particularly in one or two of the later documents, that we have felt bound to admit that there is something territorial.

Lord SUMNER : If the whole purpose is to see that the English get the codfish and the French do not, that is a matter that requires no landing on the shore at all. If, in the next place, the fishers coming from England or any other English Colony are to gut and dry their fish, they must land upon the coast, and what is more, they do, whether you say they may or not ; but that need only give a kind of servitude. The exercise of jurisdiction over these casual landing parties and their temporary occupation might be in the Admiral or the Governor of Newfoundland in either capacity in the form of a licence to land, in the exercise of the jurisdiction, without it being necessary that there should be any assignment of the soil to Newfoundland at all. But as soon as you come to the conclusion that there was an assignment of the shore, so that there is a strip of land that is Newfoundland and is not anything else, from which I suppose Newfoundland could exclude Quebec—as soon as you get that, then the purpose and the policy and the care and inspection and the vigilance and all that, become of relatively small importance. You may be astonished that a man who had to keep an eye on the east coast should be given the land up to the height of land. It seems perhaps too liberal, but still if it is done, the fishery part of it does not matter. I am not quite sure in my own mind that we have got to the heart of this thing.

Mr. MACMILLAN : My Lord, may I offer this suggestion ? It is so easy now to exact from those legislators of this period a precision which they did not have. If I may say so, one is always to certain extent impatient in construing a document with things that are not precise and have not sharp definite edges. The trouble about them is that in so many human affairs, particularly administration affairs, people have not thought exactly and have not thought with precision. I think probably we have here in this interesting episode of our Colonial history just one of those cases where people did not sit down to solve the problem with precisions, and one cannot summon from these documents the precision which one would like to find in them. It is always a comfort to one's mind when one can be precise.

Lord SUMNER : I think it might be said in your favour that if the question had been put to the Lords of Trade : “ How far into the interior is the Governor to go ? ” their answer would promptly have been : “ No further than he can do it cheaply.” The first idea in this stage of colonisation is to run it as cheaply as you can, and that is one reason why the Home Government has constantly been so lavish with land on the map ; but the problem is not how little they would have liked to give, but from their words can you extract an intention not to give as much as the words cover.

Mr. MACMILLAN : The whole question is, what do the words cover, and one can only adduce those aids which both of us have been trying to do, each in our own interest, from the surrounding circumstances. to interpret what the words cover ; the words themselves are ambiguous.

Lord SUMNER : And yet the words appear to have been intended to mean something definite.

Mr. MACMILLAN : My humble submission is this, my Lord. Now I propose entering a little on the region of speculation. I think that your Lordship has put your finger upon what probably was the original conception of this whole matter. It is a mere coincidence, but it is exactly what I said to my clients in consultation on the subject. This looks exactly like a mere servitude or easement in its inception. I hope I am not disclosing anything that one ought not to disclose, but it seemed to me that this really was some kind of servitude right. It was a fishery that was to be conducted, it was to be guarded from the sea, but fishers must make landfalls in those places, seeing that they have to have places for their fish and so on. That was the kind of idea ; it was a fishery question which dominated the minds of these people, and with a view to that they said : “ We will put the coast of Labrador, the place where the fish come, under the care of the Governor of Newfoundland, he is at sea there ; we will give him the coast.” The reason why the Dominion's case is not put in that way is because, I say in perfect candour the language is too strong for me, the language has gone on to use terms which are not consistent with mere servitude.

Lord Sumner.

Mr. Macmillan

The LORD CHANCELLOR : It is called territory.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord, and, as your Lordship would expect from me, I admit that at once ; but none the less does it help one to consider what is the extent of territory if the intention of the whole thing was to subserve a particular purpose.

Lord SUMNER : I can quite understand your showing excellent historical grounds for saying "Coasts," which is a vague term. ought to be read in a strictly limited sense, because it would have been very foolish under the circumstances to annex to Newfoundland anything but the least amount of territory required for the purpose. That would be an argument, I think, which would have weight except for the fact that there are a good many counter reasons for saying there was no ground why they should not let them have as much as they liked.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Your Lordship has not yet been furnished by the Dominion with those other reasons. This is a point, if I may say so, that is most cogent, but I think it will lose a considerable degree of its cogency when certain other considerations in this case are developed; but up to this point it is most cogent.

Now, my Lords, there is this sentence, and as I submit a very pregnant sentence. Your Lordship noted, I am sure, Sir John Simon's insistence several times upon a proposition which of course was very necessary for his argument. He asked you to disregard the purpose altogether in interpreting the grant. There is a certain confusion in these matters. I do not want to be metaphysically Scotch and over refined, but there is a difference between motive and purpose. Motive is admittedly not a matter that you can examine as an aid in the same way that you can purpose.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Intention.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I was going to say, my Lord, that purpose is merely a synonym for intention, and I have always understood that the one thing one was in search of in construing a document, was, what was its intention, what was its purpose ? Therefore I think perhaps my learned friend will not resent my saying that he is hardly entitled to say that the purpose of a grant can be disregarded in the construing of it. He might still say that the motive is a different matter, but as to the purpose, that is the very thing of which everyone is in search when they seek to interpret words of grant. If you are in search of the purpose of it, if you are seeking to ascertain the intention from the words used, that is the proper source from which to ascertain it in the first place; you are generally left to infer intention from the words used. The curious position here is that we do not require to infer it from the words used, because the authors of this document have expressed their purpose in set terms. Therefore we are not reduced to the expedient of groping for intention. The intention is expressed on the very face of this document; but I am not losing sight of the fact that this is not a document of grant; it is a document of recital of a grant. At the same time it is the document which is referred to as the annexing document ; it is the document which is described by my friends as the foundation of their title and it is in a sense co-related with the Commission, because it is a disposal of the whole matter ; it is a comprehensive document bringing things all together.

Lord Warrington.

Mr. Macmillan

Lord Warrington.

Lord WARRINGTON: This is not really intention. What they
p. 391

are doing here is, they are expressing what they think will be, and what they desire to be, the result of what they have done. That would certainly not exclude territorial jurisdiction, because some territorial jurisdiction over the interior might assist the subjects in carrying on the fishery.

Mr. MACMILLAN : My Lord will not think I am over refining when I say that if you are in search of the contents of the coasts of Labrador here referred to, it is quite a proper guide to invoke : What was the intention with which the coasts of Labrador were confided ?

Viscount Finlay

Lord WARRINGTON : What do you say about this ? I have in my mind the Hamilton Inlet. The fisheries might be very material and very important there. Is it inconsistent with the end that the fishery of our subjects there may be carried on ? Does that exclude territorial jurisdiction ?

Mr. Macmillan

Mr. MACMILLAN : The Hamilton Inlet is really for this purpose no different from anything else. My learned friend says it is coast, and the whole question will be whether it is an inlet of the sea or an inland lake ; therefore it does not really complicate this general question, in my humble submission. May I put it for the moment in this way ? We are in search of the intention of those who used that language at that time, and the remarkable circumstance here is that we are not left to grope for the intention, because they have expressed the intention, and, as so often happens, that expressed intention—not an inferred intention but an expressed intention—coincides with all that I have been reading to your Lordships, which indicates that the whole intention of this plan was with fishery intent.

Vicount FINLAY : That is the end in view, but do you not think also there was in view as one of the means to that end the establishment of a certain Government, a certain control of the particular territorial area ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Certainly, my Lord.

Viscount FINLAY : I think that is admitted under one head of your argument, and the whole question comes to be, what is its extent ?

29 Oct., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan

Mr. MACMILLAN : I hope I am not unduly contentious on this topic. It seems to me, if you want to find out what is the extent of the coast the first thing you want to ask is this : Why did they give any coast ? One wants to find out what was in the minds of those who did that. At the moment we do not know how much coast it is ; nobody knows until your Lordships have pronounced upon it. The first thing one would ask is, what was the coast given to Newfoundland for ? There you get a measure founded on possession ; but it is in aid of interpretation of “ coast ” that I am making the whole of this submission.

3 G

p. 392

Viscount FINLAY : The motive might be in order that the fishery on that coast might profit, but still that does not control the grant.

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, it does not control the grant, but it assists in interpreting the grant. That is all that I put on the subject ; you are dealing with ambiguous words.

There is a very excellent passage in Maxwell on the Interpretation of Statutes, on this subject of general words, from which I will venture to read a sentence or two, because it seems to me to embody my argument. He says : “ But it is in the interpretation of general words and phrases that the principle of strictly adapting the meaning to the particular subject matter in reference to which the words are used finds its most frequent application. However wide in the abstract, they are more or less elastic and admit of restriction or expansion to suit the subject matter. While expressing truly enough all that the Legislature intended, they frequently express more in their literal meaning and natural force ; and it is necessary to give them the meaning which best suits the scope and object of the Statute, without extending to ground foreign to the intention. It is therefore a canon of interpretation that the words if they be general and not express and precise, are to be restricted to the fitness of the matter. They are to be construed as particular if the intention be particular ; that is, they must be understood as used in reference to the subject matter in the mind of the Legislature and strictly limited to it.” My Lords, that may sound rather a commonplace, but it expresses very accurately what I have in mind : that we are dealing with a word which may be bandied about between us here for all time ; it has all manner of meanings.

Mr. MACMILLAN : This is the 4th Edition, page 89. The reference is Chapter II, Section I. Sentences of that sort merely express, much better than I can express, what I have in mind. Then he says again : “ The words of a statute are to be understood in the sense in which they best harmonise with the subject of the enactment and the object which the Legislature has in view.”

The LORD CHANCELLOR : It is page 95 of the 6th Edition.

Mr. MACMILLAN : If your Lordship pleases. I shall just quote and adopt one other sentence, this time a sentence from Lord Blackburn : “ In all cases the object is to see what is the intention expressed by the words used. But from the imperfection of language it is impossible to know what that intention is without inquiring further and seeing what the circumstances were with reference to which the words are used and what was the object appearing from these circumstances which the person using them had in view.” That is a quotation from Lord Blackburn in The Wear Rivers Commissioners v. Adamson, in (1877) 2 Appeal Cases, at page 743.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

Mr. MACMILLAN : My Lords, I was directing attention to the sentence on page 154, upon which both sides have concentrated so much criticism. I utilise it as affording a key to the minds of those who were engaged in framing these material documents. On the question of interpreting a document it is, of course, quite true to say that if the language is unambiguous the purpose or motive, either of them, is quite immaterial because you cannot go beyond the accepted meaning of the language itself ; the language contains the effective will of the person who has used it, and if there is no ambiguity, then purpose is irrelevant. But the whole problem that we are confronted with here is a problem where the critical word is ambiguous, and it is in these circumstances that I humbly maintain that the ascertainment of the purpose is of the greatest value in enabling you to ascertain with what intention this word of vague and general meaning was used in this particular context, and that the word should not be extended beyond what is necessary to effectuate that purpose. Now, my Lords, the word here used as it was used in the Commission, is “ coast ” or “ coasts.” Among documents in these volumes much learning has been reprinted from dictionaries and other sources on the subject, but I do not think your Lordships would welcome very much investigation of it, because after all the word “ coast ” is known to your Lordships, as it is known to all who use the English language, and I think I put it with reasonable accuracy when I say that in the ordinary acceptance of the term it does mean a maritime edge or margin. When one uses the word “ coast ” in the general case it relates to a margin of ground or territory bordering upon the sea. It is not used of rivers, nor is it used of lakes ; it is used of the sea. But etymologically, of course, it has its origin in a word which means an edge or side merely. You see it in that use in French, of course, also, and you have examples which have been recorded in this book from the Bible and elsewhere, the best sources of English, where it used even of countries that are entirely inland. I am not contesting that in the least.

3 G 2

Viscount Finlay.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord WARRINGTON : You talk about the West Coast Route, but you do not mean that it runs along the sea shore.

Mr. MACMILLAN : And the East Coast Route also. That is one of the very examples that occurred to myself when I was thinking of it; on the other hand, when I say that I am going to the coast your Lordship would be surprised to find me at Derby.

Viscount Finlay.

Lord WARRINGTON: That is another thing.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Exactly, it is another thing, and it is, of course, just the question. We are dealing with a word whose meaning varies with the circumstances in which it is used.

Viscount Finlay.

Viscount FINLAY : The current use of the word is limited. There is a sort of archaism about speaking of the coasts of an inland place. Undoubtedly in the instances to which you are referring in the authorised version it is used as having no relating whatever either to sea or land.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord, it is ; there are examples of that ; but when it is used here, applied to a place which is bordering upon the sea, and you are talking of the coast of Labrador, in this context your Lordship may extend or narrow that according to what you think right.

29 Oct., 1926.

Viscount Finlay.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount FINLAY : Yes, at the same time you want to have settled order and administration of justice in an area very considerably for the prosperity of the fishers. You must have such control and administration of justice as will give security to those who are engaged there ; and that cannot be confined merely to the edge. There may be a question how far back you could carry your setting up a jurisdiction.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, there, of course, I am entirely in your Lordships' hands, but I suggest that to carry it back to the height of land is to carry it to a region infinitely remote from the necessity of a jurisdiction intended to control fishermen.

Viscount FINLAY : If that were the only object. But suppose the sentence had been a little broken up ; it is put all in one sentence here on page 154, but suppose it had been divided into two sentences and it was said in one sentence that the fishery had very much extended and that it was necessary to provide some settled governments in those parts and then it went on to say, in the language of the latter part of this paragraph, just about line 20 : “ under the care and inspection of our Governor of Newfoundland.”

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord, but then the difficulty is this, that we are just told in one of the preceding documents that it is not the intention to establish any settled government there.

Viscount FINLAY : The whole thing had to be put under some establishment of administration of justice.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I read from page 909 of Volume III : “ But as no such regular civil Government is either necessary or indeed can be established, where no perpetual Residence or planting is intended ; It will there be sufficient to provide for the free Trade of all your Majesty's Subjects under such Regulations, and such Administration of Justice as is best suited to that end. Such We apprehend to be the case of Newfoundland, where a temporary fishery is the only Object, and this We suppose has been the reason, which induced your Majesty to annex the Coast of Labrador to that Government.” So that the idea of any settled government of this territory is disclaimed in terms.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : That applies to Newfoundland also ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Certainly, it does, my Lord.

Viscount FINLAY : That is rather startling. That must mean that it does not want anything so elaborate.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Your Lordship will see in the sequel that granting of any territory in Newfoundland was forbidden absolutely, and that the one effort of the British Government was at all hazards to prevent it becoming a Colony ; the one thing to be preserved was as if it were a ship afloat at sea and no one was to settle there ; it was never to become a Colony.

I will read the passage later when I come to describe Newfoundland, but it is most significant to see that there was to be no settled government at all ; there was to be an officer on a ship. But, my Lords, why should we endeavour to extend this language to the height of land ? If any object were to be served by it, I could understand it ; but as it seems to me, when you satisfy completely the purpose which everybody had in mind at the time, when you satisfy the language as used by themselves, when you satisfy the object they themselves expressed, what is the necessity or what is the desirability for according a vastly greater area than was ever in the contemplation of the parties themselves and which would be absolutely useless for the purposes indicated ? I suggest that the natural approach to the problem is by the avenue by which I have humbly ventured to suggest it should be approached, and approaching it from that avenue, the whole thing forms a consistent whole and you get a complete view of the proposed administration.

29 Oct., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Now, my Lords, on the language which is repeated there, I say that prima facie the language is in my favour, that prima facie " coast " means the margin of the sea, and that prima facie, therefore, we are dealing with a margin. I give my friend, with both hands, the admission that you can find plenty of illustrations of the use of the word " coast " as implying some depth, and considerable depth, not by any manner of means always depth in to the height of land, but often behind the height of land, and often short of the height of land. I am sure the Côte d'Azur does not extend to the height of land, in the Mediterranean. There are innumerable examples in the use of the word " coast," and it may have a context of depth according to the circumstances in which it is used, but the whole problem here is, in this context what depth, if any, is to be attached to the coast, having regard to these purposes which are expressed ?

Lord Warrington.

29 Oct., 1926.

Lord Warrington.

Your Lordships will notice that the description is entirely by points on the sea shore ; and that is rather striking. Unlike the descriptions which precede it and the descriptions which are given of Quebec and the other Governments, here the only fixed termini are points admittedly on the coast. The entrance to Hudson's Straits is a point on the coast ; the other terminus is the River St. John. And your Lordships will notice that it is rather interesting that in the Commission as distinguished from the Proclamation the point is described with this definition added : " to the River St. John's which discharges itself into the sea nearly opposite the west end of the Island of Anticosti including that island." Those words " which discharges itself," you do not find in the paragraph on page 154 ; it is simply " from the River St. John's " ; but in the Commission the use of this language " which discharges itself into the sea nearly opposite the west end of the Island of Anticosti," indicates, I suggest, that the point is the point on the coast where the river discharges itself just opposite Anticosti. And you have the striking contrast when the boundaries of Quebec are described, that you are to carry the boundary up to the head of the River St. John's and then by a certain line. So that you have that contrast between the head of the River St. John's and a strip which is defined simply by two termini, one at one point of the coast and one at another. Then you have the numerous islands on the coast at several points, all giving a maritime flavour to this description of what was confided to the Governor of Newfoundland.

Lord WARRINGTON: The boundary of Quebec was to go to the River St. John's ?

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : To the head of the River St. John's.

Lord WARRINGTON : Then a line between the head of the River St. John's and the sea; would form the boundary between what lies to the east of it and the new Province of Canada.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Certainly, my Lord.
p. 397

Lord WARRINGTON : Does not that indicate what was included in the coast, from the River St. John's. When you look at the boundary of Canada, does it not mean that on the other side of that boundary was the land that was allotted to Newfoundland ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : With great respect, I should think not.

Lord WARRINGTON : Then what happened to it ? I confess it looks to me rather as if the people who were claiming that boundary from Canada thought that the River St. John's formed the boundary between what they were laying down and an adjoining country.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That would not suit my learned friends at all. Perhaps that is not a complete answer to your Lordship, but it would not suit their case at all, because then the boundary of the Coast of Labrador for their purpose would be eastward of the head of the River St. John's.

Lord WARRINGTON : The head of the River St. Johns as it is known now.

Lord Warrington.

Mr. MACMILLAN : As known then, it must be. Your Lordship means that you would look at both sides of the River St. John's : Look on this side and you are in Quebec, and then your Lordship says, Now look on the other side and then you are in NewfoundlandLabrador. That would not suit my friends' book at all, because that would give them a coastal strip, no doubt much broader ; it would give them a strip as far as the River St. John's along the coast, but it would not carry them up here at all.

Mr. Macmillan.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : It would include more.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It would include what was behind Quebec in Labrador, this strip of land that is away up north of the line between Hamilton Inlet and the Hudson's Bay boundary.

There is a great deal of territory, an enormous territory, there that, would not have been covered on that hypothesis, my Lord.

Lord WARRINGTON : I am not quite sure about that, because the Hudson Bay Company would have come in ; on the whole of that upper part belonging to Labrador, you would have Hudson Bay coming in.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I think I could explain it by the map, but I am afraid I cannot tell you, because the River St. John is the boundary of Quebec, and all that lies to the East of that is Quebec.

Lord WARRINGTON : It formed part of the boundary of Quebec, of course, but the boundary of Quebec is taken round.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It forms the Eastern boundary of Quebec.

Lord WARRINGTON : It forms part of the Eastern boundary.

Mr. MACMILLAN : With great respect it forms the whole of the Eastern boundary.

Lord WARRINGTON: Does it ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord, it is the Eastern boundary. Following my Lord as well as I can, your Lordship suggests : let us take the River St. John, all to the west of that is Quebec ; then your Lordship suggests ; and therefore all to the East of that is Coast of Labrador.

Lord WARRINGTON : Well ?

29 Oct., 1926.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That would only carry my learned friends along to the East of that till they reached the sea.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord WARRINGTON : I see what you mean.

Viscount Haldane.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It would not give them this great extent of inland territory at all ; they have to invoke something else for that ; they would then have to invoke this : that on the North East shores they are entitled to get their boundary by going to the height of land.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount HALDANE : Do you say that the River St. John's is really a longitudinal line which is to be carried up to there, and further if necessary, but there is no grant of the land East of that line.

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, my Lord, that was the boundary of Quebec and it was originally fixed with this idea : that it would include all the seignoirs that had been granted and were dependent on Quebec.

29 Oct., 1926.

Viscount HALDANE : On the East of that line further territory may be granted by another substantive title, or may be left in the Crown.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Undoubtedly. You remember the Labrador business had all been disposed of by this time ; Newfoundland had got what it was to get on the Coast, and then when the territory of Quebec was carved out, “ the River St. John to its head,” was selected as the boundary of the Province of Quebec. Therefore, the two things they were dealing with were entirely different, the one was a boundary for a settled Government, for a settled population, the other was a grant of something (X. as my learned friend put it) to enable the fishery to be protected.

Viscount HALDANE : It is not only a line.

p. 399

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is all it is defined by ; that is on my side of the account : that you have in Quebec something which is described by superficialities, and in the other case something which is described only by termini. Now no one suggests that it is merely a line which has length without breadth that we are dealing with here at all ; it is conceded it has some content, but, as to how much, one does not get much help from that contrast, I am afraid. The first point, as I say, is on the language itself, and I suggest to your Lordships the fact that two points on the coast are selected is very significant. I might just take along with that, what Governor Palliser thought. Governor Palliser was the most energetic of Newfoundland Governors, and he was extraordinarily active ; he got into a good deal of trouble in consequence of his activities, and what he said in answer to an enquiry upon which he had to report (I shall come back to this later on)—he was asked to report on various things, and you will see, at page 956 in the third volume, one of the things he was asked to report upon was this : “ What is the capital extent of the Coast of Terra Labrador under Your Government ” that is “Heads of Enquiry respecting the State of that part of the Coast of Terra Labrador ” on page 956.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : This is 1766.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Three years after.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, Governor Palliser succeeded Governor Graves.

Lord SUMNER : Who puts this question ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : The Government. The question was put to him in his Commission. You will observe that the Enquiry is, “ What is the extent of the Coast of Terra Labrador ”—not “ Coast of Labrador.” My learned friend would have to say, if one were to read it in his view, “ What is the extent of the Coast of Labrador,” because “ the Coast of Labrador ” is coincident with “ Terra Labrador ” in his view. The answer is “ From River St. John, which is the Western Boundary to Cape Charles, which is the Eastern Extremity, is 150 leags & from Cape Charles to the Entrance of Hudsons Streights is 160 Leags more, making together an extent of 310 Leagues of Sea Coast.” What he has in mind when he is asked, “What is the extent of Terra Labrador under your Government ? ” is that he is asked what is the extent of your jurisdiction, and he says, "I have 310 leagues of sea coast to look after." There is no suggestion there that he is going away into the height of land, he did not so conceive it ; and you will find that Governor Palliser was not a person who was in the least inclined to under-estimate the extent of his jurisdiction, because he got into very considerable trouble owing to his zeal.

29 Oct., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

3 H

p. 400

Sir JOHN SIMON : Might I ask my learned friend : is not the second question one which bears on it ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : " What is the Nature of the Soil and Climate ; what are its natural or improv'd Productions & are any, or if any, what Parts thereof Adapted to Inhabitancy." The answer is " The Climate is much the same as in Newfoundland, is too severe to Admit of any Cultivation or Improvements, the Summers being so Short, that nothing except a little Garden Stuff can ever be brought to Maturity ; it is not capable of any Produce to Subsist European Inhabitants, therefore no part of it is adapted to Inhabitancy, its natural Produce is nothing but Woods, there is great tracts without any Wood, being nothing but bare Rock, or covered only with a deep Moss." Now that is exactly consistent with our case. It is 310 leagues of sea coast where the climate is too severe to admit of any cultivation and improvement. That exactly answers our description of the sea coast there, where all these other things cannot be done. On the other hand, the climate inside is quite different, as your Lordships will hear a little later on. You get there a most accurate description of the nature of the sea coast at that point ; it is the natural kind of thing that Palliser would have thought and reported upon. Of course, my Lords, no controversy has arisen here, as to the purpose of this whole arrangement. My learned friend, observing the seriousness of the point, was quick to disclaim it, and to interpret it. He said, as I noticed, twice over, this : " The whole question here is not what is the purpose which was primarily the object of the grant, but what is the construction to be applied to the language now it has turned out in this back country that there is something which is value." How the construction of the language used in 1763 under any proper interpretation can change according as we find out, 100 years afterwards, that there is something of value or not, I fail to understand.

Viscount FINLAY : Where are you reading that from ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : From Sir John Simon's address at page 241, He said, " The whole question here is not what is the purpose which was primarily the object of the grant, but what is the construction to be applied to the language now it has turned out in this back country that there is something which is of value.” How the construction can change when you find out there is something of value, I am quite at a loss to understand. He says, further, at page 78, “ it is absolutely true that the purpose, the thing to be served, in the minds of those who legislated and directed, was unquestionably a fishery.” It is right to add that he said also, “ though not only a cod fishery.” He would not have said that, no advocate would have said it, unless he felt himself compelled to say it, and that is the impression which any person would draw from these documents ; therefore, he has to say : although that is the avowed purpose and we are all agreed that was in the minds of everybody, you must discard that assistance in interpreting the document before you now that it has turned out that there is something of value there. I suggest, on the contrary, that if you look at the documents, and you discover any ambiguity there, then the very thing to go to is the thing which Sir John would discard, the thing which he admits was the purpose, and the thing to be served, in the minds of those who legislated and directed ; it is the very topic, the one thing to address one's mind to, if they are in search of a canon of interpretation.

Now I would ask my Lords that you would next pass over to page 156 of the Proclamation and carry in your minds, if my Lords are good enough to do so, the point which we had reached. We have got the Labrador fishing question disposed of. We have got the Government of Quebec with its territory set up, and at that point my learned friend stops and says, “ Now you have disposed of the whole Peninsula of Labrador.”

Sir JOHN SIMON : No, I do not say that.

Mr. MACMILLAN : From the height of land.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Between the particular termini.

Mr. MACMILLAN : From the height of land ; yes, I think I am right—from the height of land on the West, Cape Chidley on the North, right down to the boundary of Quebec on the West ; you have disposed of this whole great tract of territory now, when you have done these two things, when you have given the Commission to Captain Graves and when you have delimited Quebec, then there is nothing more left over. My Lords, I suggest you have a great deal left over. You will find on page 156 this, “ And whereas it is just and reasonable and essential to our interests and the security of our colonies, that the several nations or tribes of Indians with whom we are connected, and who live under our protection, should not be molested or disturbed in the possession of such parts of our dominions and territories as, not having been ceded to or purchased by us, are reserved to them, or any of them, as their hunting-grounds ; we do, therefore, with the advice of our Privy Council, declare it to be our Royal will and pleasure that no Governor or Commander-in-Chief in any of our Colonies of Quebec, East Florida or West Florida, do presume upon any pretence whatever to grant warrants of survey, or pass any patents for lands, beyond the bounds of their respective Governments, as described in their commissions." The bounds of Quebec, of course, in the view of the Colony, boarded upon Newfoundland territory for a large part, " As also that no Governor or Commander-in-Chief in any of our other colonies or plantations in America do presume for the present, and until our further pleasure be known, to grant warrants of survey, or pass patents for any lands beyond the heads of sources of any of the rivers which fall into the Atlantic ocean from the West and North West, or upon any lands whatever which, not having been ceded to or purchased by us as aforesaid, are reserved to the said Indians or any of them." My Lords, I pause there, first of all, because it is plain, upon the papers for the Colony which are before us, that they have misread these words about "any lands beyond the heads or sources of any of the rivers which fall into the Atlantic Ocean from the West and North West." It is plain that their first view, at any rate, was that that applied to this territory in Labrador, and that, as they were not to pass any patents for these lands, and as you come, lower down, to a reference to " all the land and territories lying to the Westward of the sources of the rivers which fall into the sea from the West and North West as aforesaid," somehow or other that supported the impression that all in Labrador to the Eastward of the watershed fell into Newfoundland ;that I am accurate in saying that, my Lords. I think appears from one of the maps, No. 17 in the Newfoundland Atlas, if your Lordships would look at it for a moment. It is a most curious error that the Colony has fallen into here. This map, No. 17 that was referred to, shows that backbone running through the pink, that non-existent backbone, was apparently assumed by Newfoundland to be the dividing line between the land and territories lying to the Westward of the sources of the rivers which fall into the sea from the West and North West as aforesaid," in the Proclamation. Your Lordship will see in the printed note upon the left hand side of that Atlas the concluding words : "As laid down in the Proclamation of the 7th October, 1763: ' There was reserved to the Crown . . . all the lands and territories not included . . . within the limits of the territory granted to the Hudson's Bay Company ; as also the lands and territories lying to the Westward of the sources of the rivers which fall into the sea (i.e. the Atlantic Ocean) from the West and North West.' By implication or exclusion, then, all that lay Eastward and South Eastward of the watershed delineated on this map must be 'under the care and inspection of the Governor of Newfoundland ''"; and in their Case they have put forward the same grounds.

Lord Warrington.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord WARRINGTON: The real fact is, that when they are talking about the rivers running Westward into the Atlantic they are talking of the rivers running through the old Colonic, down on to the Atlantic Coast.

Mr. MACMILLAN: That is exactly so.

Lord WARRINGTON: They are not talking about this country at all.

Mr. MACMILLAN: That is why this note is wrong. That is why the Case, as based on that contention—it is part of their case here, if your Lordships will look at page 10 of their Pleadings , they quote it : “There was reserved to the Crown ‘for the use of the Indians, all the lands and territories not included within the limits of our said three Governments' (i.e. E. and W. Florida and Quebec) 'or within the limits of the territory granted to the Hudson's Bay Company ; as also the lands and territories lying to the Westward of the sources of the rivers which fall into the sea' i.e. the Atlantic Ocean) 'from the West and North West.'" Then they go on to say, "The effect of the Proclamation, according to the submission of the Colony of Newfoundland, was to place under the Government of Quebec, the area coloured blue, and under the Governor of Newfoundland, the area as coloured green and red on the map marked " A " ; so that it is quite plain, I think, that they have misapprehended that position. Sir John did not fall into that mistake ; he carefully avoided it, of course. He did not make the mistake which had been made by the cartographer who had suggested that. It is manifestly wrong. I listened with interest to see how Sir John would deal with that, and, of course, he saw that that related to the ancient colonies, and what is referred to there as " the rivers which fall into the sea from the West and North West as aforesaid," carries you back to the previous passage at line 18, where the phrase " the heads or sources of any of the rivers which fall into the Atlantic Ocean from the West and North West," is repeated, and that is in relation to " our other Colonies or plantations," to wit, " our ancient Colonies," so there can be no question whatever that that has nothing whatever to do with this.

Well, then, my Lords, what is there ? "And we do further declare it to be our Royal will and pleasure, for the present as aforesaid, to reserve under our sovereignty, protection, and dominion, for the use of the said Indians, all the land and territories not included within the limits of our said three new Governmen[sic], or within the limits of the territory granted to the Hudson's Bay Company." Would your Lordships be good enough to pause there just for a moment ? There is no mention made of the territory of Newfoundland ; and the Indians, therefore, are to have reserved for them in this area all that is not Quebec and all that is not Hudson's Bay. There is no exclusion at all of what is Newfoundland.

Mr. Macmillan.

You have, therefore, I suggest, a further recognition of what I have been maintaining, that so far from anybody conceiving that there was a territorial region of Labrador appertaining to Newfoundland at this time, there was nothing but a strip of coast ; and that was dealt with separately, and it was not necessary to exclude that here at all when they were considering the case of the Indians other than those in the territory of Quebec or those in the territory of Hudson's Bay. There is no exception of Newfoundland territory at all.

Of course, if I am right, the strip along the coast, the maritime strip, was not hunting grounds, and was not Indian territory in that sense at all ; it was an Esquimaux place and not an Indian place, and it is quite proper, therefore, to take no notice of it here, because the Indians really were not affected, territorially, by what had been given to the Governor of Newfoundland, at all,[SIC]

One saw, of course, why they were so anxious, why whoever it was who was concerned in these pleadings originally were so anxious to avail themselves of the next sentence, where it says : “ As also all the land and territories lying to the westward of the sources of the rivers.” One sees now why it was that they were so anxious to get that in, because otherwise there is something unaccounted for here. There is no mention, therefore, of Newfoundland at all there.

Then it goes on : “ And we no hereby strictly forbid, on pain of our displeasure, all our loving subjects from making any purchases or settlements whatever, or taking possession of any of the lands above reserved, without our[SIC] special leave and licence for that purpose first obtained. And we do further strictly enjoin and require all persons whatsoever, who have either wilfully or inadvertently seated themselves upon any lands within the countries above described, or upon any other lands which, not having been ceded to or purchased by us, are still reserved to the said Indians as aforesaid, forthwith to remove themselves from such settlements.” Then the next is important also, where it says : “ And whereas great frauds and abuses have been committed in the purchasing lands of the Indians, to the great prejudice of our interests and to the great dissatisfaction of the said Indians ; in order, therefore, to prevent such irregularities for the future, and to the end that the Indians may be convinced of our justice and determined resolution to remove all reasonable cause of discontent, we do, with the advice of our Privy Council, strictly enjoin and require that no private person do presume to make any purchase from the said Indians of any lands reserved to the said Indians within those parts of our colonies where we have thought proper to allow settlement ; but that, if at any time any of the said Indians should be inclined to dispose of the said lands, the same shall be purchased only for us, in our name, at some public meeting or assembly of the said Indians, to be held for that purpose by the Governor or Commander-in-Chief of our colony respectively, within which they shall lie : and, in case they shall be within the limits of any proprietary Government they shall be purchased only for the use and in the name of such proprietaries conformable to such directions and instructions as we or they shall think proper to give for that purpose : and we do, by the advice of our Privy Council, declare and enjoin that the trade of the said Indians shall be free and open to all our subjects whatever, provided that every person who may incline to trade with the said Indians, do take out a licence for carrying on such trade, from the Governor or Commander-in-Chief of any of our colonies respectively, where such person shall reside.” Now, my

29 Oct., 1926.

Lord Warrington

Mr. Macmillan.

Lords, there is no record of any licence ever having been granted by Newfoundland to anybody to trade with Indians.

Lord WARRINGTON : Probably not, because I expect Newfoundland did not consider that this referred to them at all.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It did not refer to them at all.

Lord WARRINGTON : If you compare this proclamation with the document which preceded it, it becomes pretty evident, I think, that this part of the proclamation did not refer to Newfoundland at all, or to any Indians there.

p. 405

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, my Lord ; and yet you will see in the sequel, some rather curious episodes. You will find Governor Palliser, of Newfoundland, founding upon this proclamation in order to complain that certain occupation was taking place on the territory under his charge, and he is invoking the proclamation.

Lord WARRINGTON : I daresay.

Mr. MACMILLAN : The confusion becomes pretty serious as one gets on, but for the moment I am anxious to show what your Lordship has been good enough to put for me, that we are dealing with two entirely different things altogether : On the one hand we are dealing in this Proclamation with the Government which has been set up and all that is necessary to be done, and the regime of the Indians who are upon their borders ; and on the other hand we have been dealing with something with a marine flavour in the previous Commission and instructions. Now, my Lords, if I have made good the distinction between the two regions in which the Government was operating I have made a considerable point.

At this stage I think it might be useful to consider the Indians' position a little more closely. I confess that I was a little bit surprised to hear my learned friend Sir John Simon give utterance to this sentence : " The idea that this Indian country had to do with a few Esquimaux up here in Labrador is really quite unhistorical and fantastic." Of course, I must address myself to my contention with some trepidation when what I am about to say has been characterised as " quite unhistorical and fantastic," and also, I think, as " preposterous " ; but I can only assume from the violence of the epithets that were used, that the argument which they were intended to support must be a weak one. I say that because I think your Lordships will appreciate that the argument that I am about to submit to your Lordships is neither unhistorical nor fantastic nor preposterous.

which was before these persons who prepared the proclamation. Governor Murray's report was transmitted, as your Lordships will remember, for the consideration of those who prepared the proclamation. Governor Murray's report was sent by the Secretary of State to the Lords of Trade on the 5th of May, 1763, in order that, in preparing this very proclamation, they might have that report before them. Governor Murray's report is printed on page 893 in Volume III, and it is a very interesting document, and one which has not yet been before your Lordships.

Your Lordships are now going to hear about the few Esquimaux up in this district : “ My Lord, In obedience to his Majesty's Commands signified in Your Lordship's dispatch to Sir Jeffery Amherst of the 12th December last I have the honor to transmit the following account of His Majesty's Government of Quebec and the dependancies thereof.”

p. 406

—Will your Lordships kindly note the date of this document, which is the 5th of June, 1762, before Quebec had been defined ; and, therefore, they are dealing with old Quebec here, and not the Quebec as delimited in the proclamation 1763.—“ I have the honor to transmit the following account of His Majesty's Government of Quebec and dependancies thereof.”—Then, my Lords, he is anxious to tell all that he can, and he deals with the matter under several heads. The sixth head is “ Indian Nations ” ; and on page 894 he deals with the Indians thus : “ Indian Nations residing within the Government. In order to discuss this point more clearly I shall first take notice of the Savages on the North shore of the River St. Laurence from the Ocean upwards, and then of such as inhabit the South side of the same River, as far as the present limits of the Government extend on either side of it.”

Viscount HALDANE : When the word “ Indians ” is used in this document, does it always include Esquimaux ?

Mr. MACMILLAN: Not always, my Lord; there is a distinction.

Viscount HALDANE : Here it does.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Sometimes, I am bound to confess, you have a reference to “ Esquamaux Indians ” ; that expression does occur, but there is a quiet recognised distinction, racial and in every other way, between the Esquimaux and the Red Indians. They belong to a different people. Now he deals with this in the following way at the top of page 895 : “ 1st, The Savages on the North shore. The first to be met with on this side are the Esquimaux, these are the wildest and most untamable of any, and are emphatically stilled by the other Nations, Savages. They never dress their food but eat fish rotted in the Sun and drink the oil it produces.”

Viscount HALDANE : Evidently General Murray did not like either their food or their drink.

29 Oct., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : They were in a state of nature, where life was what might be known as “ short, brutish and ”—I forget the rest of what Hobbs says. Then it goes on : “ Travellers represent them hardy, active and expert navigators. In the summer they come with their whole Families in Chaloups to fish in the streights of Belisle, these they leave in the Bays, and go out themselves to a considerable distance in Canoes made of skins wherein they sew themselves up. Their clothes and sails of their Vessels are made of the skins of wild beasts ; They are reckoned treacherous, and have had many encounters with the French and Canadians employ'd on the fisheries in those parts. Their Language is not understood but a few words they make use of nearly resemble the dialect of some of the most northern European Nations. A few here have trafficked with them and make a considerable advantage by it, but they never agreed well together ; and trade with the Esquimaux

p. 407

however must be precarious ; The Coast is rocky and difficult of access, the seasons for navigation short, and the risks too great to entice adventurers ; they have never been known to come on this side of La Forteau.”

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Where is that ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is close to Blanc Sablon, in the Straits of Belle Isle, my Lord.

Now, these are the Esquimaux. As you will see later on, they are a nation of coast dwellers, who do not penetrate into the interior, who speak a different language from the Red Indians altogether, and who, ethnologically, are thought to be associated rather with the Mongolians.

Viscount FINLAY : They are as different as any two races could be.

Mr. MACMILLAN : They are, my Lord ; and your Lordships will find later on that there was intense hostility between them and the Red Indians inside—a constant feud. The interior nations are quite different. These are the Esquimaux on the edge, and these are the people, for the most part, to whom the Moravians administered in their settlements on the shore.

Lord SUMNER : It says here that their language nearly resembles the dialect of some of the most northern European Nations.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord. I suggested that they were of the Mongolian type ; they were Laplanders.

Lord SUMNER : It does not say anything about that.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Well, my Lord, I do not know whether it was their diet which suggested that.

Now comes the second class, and your Lordships will pray note the distinction : “ The Montagnais or Monsonies inhabit a vast tract of Country from Labrador to the Saguenay ; they are again distinguished into those who live in the inland parts, call'd Nascapies, and the inhabitants of the water side, for this reason stilled Chuchouxlapishouets[SIC]. They take as many different names as they have Villages but are all the same people, and speak the same language. As in the interior parts of the Country there are many Lakes and Rivers which communicate with Hudson's bay, the former often trade on that side, which the latter also would have been obliged to do, if the interruption caused by the War, had continued for any time, tho' from the more convenient situation, they would have ever reverted to those who were Masters of the River St. Laurence, those are the mildest and most tractable of all Savages and never enter into War. Tho' their country is extensive their number is inconsiderable ; From Labrador to Mingan the Traders do not reckon more than from Eighty to one Hundred Families, and of those who resort to the King's Posts, there may be about 220 Families in all, but as their habitations are easily moved they are ever changing and shifting from one place to another. A Jesuit Missionary meets them at Tadousac when they come there for the trade and he resides in the neighbourhood all the Year.”

I need not deal with the coast territory, because those people were Hurons, who lived quite close to Quebec ; there was a special settlement of them there. Here you have a contemporary account of the two types of natives on this coast and in this interior : On the coast you have the Esquimaux; in the interior you have the two Indian tribes, the Montagnais and the Nascapies. These are people who are engaged in trade, and they come down to the St. Laurence posts, the trading posts, which are the French fur posts there, annually, on their migrations, for the purpose of exchanging the furs that they have got for food and guns and various other articles of trade. Sometimes they prefer to go to the Hudson's Bay side, because they are located up on this great plateau, where all these many lakes are, these many lakes and rivers in the interior ; so that sometimes they go down to the Hudson's Bay post on the Hudson's Bay side. But their natural direction, as your Lordships will see from the many other records in these books, was that they came down to the posts on the St. Laurence side. The King's posts were all down there, and they made their annual migrations down to that place. The great gathering ground was the Sandgirt Lake, in the head waters of the Hamilton River ; it was there they used to meet. Some of them came down to the Hamilton Inlet side. That there was a very considerable number of Indians in this territory, and that they carried on furring, is, I submit, beyond doubt ; but this matter of the natives in this region, that is to say in the Labrador region, was therefore before the framers of this proclamation, and in this proclamation they made provision for what the Governor of Quebec was to do in the matter of Indian administration.

29 Oct., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Now, my Lords, is it suggested that these Indians were in the territory of Newfoundland ? If so, you will not find any provision made for Newfoundland granting licences to trade with them, nor will you find any such provisions as are made with regard to Quebec, to enable Quebec to deal with these Indians who were outside their territory. Does the prohibition with regard to purchasing land not apply to them ? No such proclamation is addressed to Newfoundland. Could Newfoundland have taken the hunting grounds from these Indians, these Montagnais in Labrador ? Could the Governor of Newfoundland have contravened all these directions which are designed to protect the Indians on their hunting grounds ? I submit, my Lords, that you have only to read it to see that it is perfectly plain that these Montagnais and Nascapies were just as much under the protection of His Majesty as any of the Indians round the Lakes and to the west, where no doubt there were a great many more. But why these unhappy Indians should be excluded, or why they should be called “ a few Esquimaux,” which I think they would probably have resented, I am quite at a loss to understand.

May I just say this also, that if your Lordships will kindly turn to page 10 of the Newfoundland Case, you will get a description of the original inhabitants of the Labrador Peninsula, which might be useful to put alongside my learned friend's observations on page 231 of his speech. At page 9 of the Newfoundland Case they tell us with considerable accuracy the state of matters in the interior of Labrador. It is paragraph 6, and it says this : “ The aboriginal inhabitants of the Labrador Peninsula have altered very little, either in numbers or otherwise, since 1763. They may be roughly divided into three tribes : First the Esquimaux, to be found along the coast, particularly north of the Straits of Belle Isle (there are now no Esquimaux south of the Hamilton Inlet) ; next the Mountaineers, living further inland than the Esquimaux, and principally south of the Hamilton River, with their main huntinggrounds near the North West River, though they hunted on both sides of the height of land ; and thirdly, the Nascopies, occupying the central portion of the area south of the Hudson's Straits. The number of these native inhabitants varied probably between two thousand and four thousand in all. These Indians (apart from the Esquimaux who depended principally upon fishing) lived by hunting and trafficking in furs. The Mountaineers and Nascopies (particularly the latter, who had a large admixture of Red Indian blood) had had but little connection with white men.”

Now, my Lords, how it can be said in view of that statement, that in the territory to the north, the interior of Labrador, including the green area which embraces the Hamilton Inlet referred to here and the Hamilton River, there was nothing but a few Esquimaux there who did not require any protection from His Majesty, I am at a loss to see, but there is a great deal more, I am sure my learned friend's attention can hardly have been drawn to these matters, when I read the passages. If your Lordships would take Volume V, the volume containing the illustrations, page 2640. there is another contemporary account of the country of Labrador. This is a rather interesting document. It is “Extracted from the papers of Lieutenant Roger Curtis, of His Majesty's Sloop the . ‘Otter,’ with a plane-chart of the Coast. Communicated by the Honourable Daines Barrington. The people of this country form various nations or tribes ; and are at perpetual war with each other. Formerly the Esquimaux, who may be called a maritime nation, were settled at different places upon the sea coast quite down to the River St. John's ; but, for many years past, whether it has been owing to the quarrels with the Mountaineers, or the encroachments of the Europeans, they have taken up their residence far to the north. A good way up the country live a people distinguished by the appellation of Mountaineers, between whom and the Esquimaux there subsists an unconquerable aversion. Next to the Mountaineers, and still farther westward, you come to a nation called the Escopies. The Mountaineers are esteemed an industrious tribe ; and, for many years, had been known to the French traders ”—that is the Quebec traders. “ Their chief employment is to catch fur, and procure the necessaries of life. They are extremely illiterate, but generally good-natured; and are reckoned to be less ferocious than any other of the Indians. This softness of their manners is owing to their long intercourse with Europeans; and the other nations will doubtless lose their savage disposition, in proportion as they imbibe our customs.”

p. 410

Sir JOHN SIMON : It was not the imbibing of customs which did it.

Mr. MACMILLAN: I am afraid what they imbibed in other ways rather brought their ruin than their civilisation. “They come every year to trade with the Canadian merchants, who have seal-fisheries on the southern part of the coast, and have the character of just dealers. They are immoderately fond of spirits, for which blanketing, fire-arms (in the use of which they are remarkably dexterous), and ammunition, they truck the greatest part of their furs. Their canoes are covered with the rind of birch ; and, though so light as to be easily carried, yet sufficiently large to contain a whole family, and their traffic. By means of the multitude of amazing ponds throughout the country, they convey themselves a vast distance in a very little time. Whenever they find a pond in their way, they embark on it, and travel by water ; when its course alters, and by following it they would lengthen their distance anything considerable, they land, place their canoe on their head, and carry their baggage on their shoulders, until other water gives them an opportunity of re-embarking. They are most excellent travellers. They bear inconceivable fatigue with astonishing patience, and will travel two days successively without taking any sort of nourishment. These Indians are of a deeper colour than the Esquimaux. They are low of stature. Though of a robust constitution, their limbs are small, and extremely well adapted to the rocky country they are continually traversing.” Then he passes on to the Esquimaux. “The Esquimaux Indians, inhabiting the sea coast of the northern part of Labradore, are indisputably from Greenland. They are a very deep tawny, or rather of a pale copper-coloured complexion. . . . They live always upon the sea shores, from their dread of the Mountaineers.” My Lords, notice the date of that, that is 1774. This is a contemporary account of the Indians of Labrador. Then the next author I can invoke also happens to be of this period, and it is extracted from a "Journal of Transactions and Events during a Residence of nearly Sixteen Years on the Coast of Labrador," by George Cartwright. It follows the document I have just been reading, and its date is 1792. "The native inhabitants are two distinct nations of Indians ; Mountaineers and Esquimaux. The Mountaineers are tall, thin, and excellent walkers ; their colour greatly resembles that of our gypsies ; probably occasioned by their being constantly exposed to the weather and smoky whigwhams. In features they bear a strong resemblance to the French, which is not to be wondered at, since they have had an intercourse with the Canadians for so many years, that there are few, I believe, who have not some French blood in them. These people inhabit the interior parts of the country, which they traverse by the assistance of canoes, covered with birch-rinds, in the summer ; and of rackets, or snow-shoes, in the winter," and so on. It goes on to describe them at great length. It is interesting to note at, page 2643: " They profess the Romish Religion; but know no more of it than merely to repeat a prayer or two, count their beads, and see a priest whenever they go to Quebec."

My Lords, these are two more or less contemporary accounts. There are a great many other accounts given of the Indians which are not so old as that, but I think you might take a reference to one or two modern accounts, because as is stated in the Newfoundland Case, there had been practically no change since the period of 1763, the state of the inhabitants has been very much the same. There are several reports on the ethnography of this district, which are of some interest, they are printed in the same volume, first of all at page 2606. Mr. Low, of the Geological Survey of Canada, who has been already introduced to your notice, with compliments on his accuracy by my learned friend, gives his account of the population, and does so in very considerable detail, explaining again this difference between the Esquimaux and the Red Indians, but you will find the description of the Red Indians at the foot of page 2609. "The Indians of the Labrador Peninsular belong to tribes of the Algonkin family."

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Have you got the date of this ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is quite modern ; it is 1895.

Viscount HALDANE : He was a cartographer.

Mr. MACMILLAN : He was a Geological Surveyor. It is a Geological survey of Canada.

29 Oct., 1926.

Sir JOHN SIMON : He was also a cartographer.

Mr. MACMILLAN : He was also a cartographer. We both seem anxious to lavish compliments on his learning when it suits us ; in the last line but one he says : “ The Indians of the Labrador Peninsula belong to tribes of the Algonkin family. The principal tribes of Labrador are the Montagnais, the eastern and western Nascaupees, and the coastal Indians of Hudson Bay. The Montagnais inhabit the country extending south of a line drawn westward from Hamilton Inlet, to the headwaters of the St. Maurice River.”

It must be very shocking to my learned friend, but we are in the green territory here where there are only a few Esquimaux. We are right in the heart of the green country : “ The Nascaupees inhabit the interior country north of this line, or from the bottom of James Bay eastward to Hamilton Inlet. The northern limit of their territory is marked by the Koksoak River, from its mouth to the Hillwater Branch, and by this stream westward to its head on the neighbourhood of Clearwater Lake, and thence westward to Richmond Gulf on Hudson Bay. This line divides the Indian territory from that of the Eskimo, and the boundary is well observed, the latter keeping far to the north of it, when hunting deer inland, and the Indians rarely crossing it from the southward.” Then page 2611, at line 20 : “ A large majority of the Indians of Labrador are Christians, the Montagnais of the St. Lawrence and Hamilton Inlet being Roman Catholics, while the Indians of the western watershed have been converted by the missionaries of the Church of England.” That is what Mr. Low says, but he also, at page 2619, says something more about them, talking about trade : “ The post at Rigolet” — that is in Lake Melville—“ consists of about a dozen houses and stores, and trade for fur and fish is carried on with the Eskimo and ‘ planters.’ The trade of the post at Northwest River is made with the ‘ planters ’ living about the upper part of the inlet, and with the Indians, who hunt in the country drained by the Hamilton and Northwest rivers, as well as with those hunting to the southward in the Mealy Mountains.” We are right in the green area. “ A Roman Catholic chapel was erected some years ago near this post, and a missionary priest from the St. Lawrence used annually to visit the Indians there, during the summer, and so on. Then page 2627 in the last paragraph : “ The religion of the country is professedly almost wholly Christian. The people trading around Hudson Bay are Protestants, while all the Montagnais are Catholics, cared for spiritually by the various missions of the Gulf and the Saguenay.” Lest Mr. Low be thought to be tainted in any way with a Canadian view in writing, so in 1895 you will find the Smithsonian Institute Report on page 2628 on the ethnology of this district, on the ethnology of the Ungava district. You will find in that at page 2630 a sketch of the Esquimaux, and the Indians which is very interesting, and tells us all about the Montagnais and the Nascaupees, and about their religion and habits, and all the rest of it. The upshot of it all comes to be this, in this territory, this territory of Labrador, the native population consists of two tribes, the Esquimaux inhabiting the coast and the Indians, the Red Indians, inhabiting the interior, and the Red Indians again being divided into two types of Montagnais and the Nascaupees, and these Red Indians are people who have been in contact with Canadians—Quebec people—for a wry long period, indeed, they have been visited by the Jesuit missionaries and have been ministered to in matters both of commerce and religion from the Quebec centre. Their industry is the industry of pelts, they inhabit this great inland plateau. My Lord has heard a good deal about the height of land and the watershed, but this excellent relief map shows that in this country you have not got any distinct line of demarkation at all. The whole of the hinterland in there is a great mass of high lying land, the fall of the Lakes, the fact that all these Lakes are lying there is in itself an indication that you are not dealing with a ridge of mountains and watershed falling one way or the other, it is a great plateau on which this Lakes lie.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount HALDANE : I observe from the photographs nearly every where the land falls sharply to the sea.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is shown very well here, in the northern part it certainly does most of the way, it is pretty abrupt : But the interior land is not a place where there is a great divide or ridges, and these Indians took no cognizance of the height of land or anything of that sort, because they roamed over the whole of this interior territory, these were their hunting lands where they got their skins, which they brought down to trade at St. Lawrence, and sometimes they went to Hudson's Bay, sometimes they went down to the posts on the Hamilton Inlet or on Lake Melville, therefore, you have got here a well-recognised Indian population, and my Lord, if that is so, what became of these people under this new regime. The Governor of Newfoundland has had no instructions as to granting licences or preventing the settlement in these Indian territories—were their hunting grounds at mercy ? Could any person get the lands of the Montagnais and Nascaupees while he could not get an inch of land in the six nations—in any of the others. All the provisions you remember of the Proclamation, the anxious provisions of the Proclamation of 1763, on my learned friend's view have no application whatever to the unhappy Indians of Labrador, and of course he can say that with comfort because he thought there were only a few Esquimaux there. He had not realised that we were dealing here with tribes whose existence was brought prominently before the authors of the Proclamation by General Murray's report upon them of 1762, which was expressly remitted to the authors of the Proclamation. The unhappy Governor of Newfoundland finding himself charged, on my learned friend's hypothesis, with all the Montagnais and Nascaupees—all their affairs now subject to him—could grant no licenses to trade with them, he could if he pleased, I suppose, have made grants of land there because the embargo upon Indian land in the Proclamation had no application to him. The whole code of the proclamation for the protection of the hunting grounds of the Indians had no application to the Governor of Newfoundland and found no place in his Commission.

This is one of those small things which so often are rather indicative of the truth. When you look at the instructions to the Newfoundland Governor you find that he is to preserve liberty of conscience in religious matters for everybody except Papists. I will give you the reference to that because it is a little unfortunate for the poor catholic Montagnais who were apparently to be persecuted by the newly imported Governor. It is in volume 2 at page 423. I will take this en passant, it is not a very big point, but sometimes these things are a little significant. The instructions to Hugh Palliser, Governor of Newfoundland, at page 423 in Article 21 are as follows : “ You are to permit a free exercise of Religion to all persons, except Papists.”

The LORD CHANCELLOR : It is the same thing in Captain Graves' Commission.

p. 414

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is the same thing in Captain Graves' Instructions. I have my reference to Captain Graves' Instructions.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I noticed it the other day.

Mr. MACMILLAN : You observe the unhappy Governor of Newfoundland, amongst other unpleasant duties in his situation, was bound to break the Capitulation of Montreal. I will now give you the Articles of Capitulation. Turning to volume 6, page 2754. here are the Articles of Capitulation of Montreal, the 40th Article in the Articles of Capitulation [sic] of Montreal reads as follows : “ The Savages or Indian allies of his most Christian Majesty, shall be maintained in the Lands they inhabit ; if they chuse to remain there ; they shall not be molested on any pretence whatsoever, for having carried arms, and served his most Christian Majesty ; they shall have, as well as the French, liberty of religion, and shall keep their missionaries. The actual Vicars-General, and the Bishop, when the Episcopal see shall be filled, shall have leave to send to them new Missionaries when they shall judge it necessary.—‘ Granted except the last article, which has been already refused.’” That is about Vicars-General, and so on. But they were to have the same freedom of religion as the French. Your Lordship remembers how important that was in connection with the new Government of Quebec. Not only so, but in the instructions to the Governor of Quebec, in Murray's instructions and also in Carleton's instructions, attention is specially drawn to this matter of religion. In Volume II, page 772, article 28, are the instructions to Governor Murray, Governor of Quebec. “And whereas we have stipulated, by the late Definitive Treaty of Peace concluded at Paris the 10th day of February 1763, to grant the liberty of the Catholick Religion to the inhabitants of Canada, and that we will consequently give the most precise and most effectual orders, that our new Roman Catholic subjects in that Province may profess the worship of their religion, according to the rites of the Romish Church as far as the laws of Great Britain permit. It is therefore our Will and Pleasure, that you do, in all things regarding the said inhabitants, conform with great exactness to the stipulations of the said Treaty in this respect.” But the Governor of Newfoundland was not to tolerate papists, and the Governor of Newfoundland found himself suddenly the Governor of the Montagnais, an excellent Indian tribe, industrious, and engaged in the fur trade, accustomed to go down to the St. Lawrence for the purpose of getting goods, and to be administered to by a Jesuit priest. They were not to be tolerated by the Governor of New foundland, because he was to extend no tolerance to papists. His new subjects were actually to a very large extent papists, in so far as the Montagnais were papists, and that was their only religion. He was not to tolerate papacy among them. It is not manifest that the whole code of Indian Administration which was appropriate for the Quebec side. had nothing whatever to do with the Newfoundland side of this matter. When they were thinking of cod and whale and sea-cows and how these might best be got, and how that fishery might best be protected, they were never thinking of questions of administration, and difficult questions of administration, such as arise when an Indian territory is taken over, and when its tribes have to be administered. The Governor of Newfoundland, I submit, was never entrusted with the administration of the affairs of the Montagnais, and never given a territorial jurisdiction over this whole territory, including the green territory, where these Indian tribes were housed, I suggest that that argument could only have been submitted to your Lordships upon the apprehension, which I think must have been a mistake, that this Indian country had to do with a few Esquimax up here in Labrador. There must be some mistake about that.

29 Oct., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan

That being so, I have shown to your Lordships that there was here a very important Indian settlement of roving Indians, with hunting grounds extending all through this green territory, accustomed to wander round about this plateau, without any regard to the height of land whatever, and who came down from Hudson's Bay to the Gulf of St. Lawrence, or sometimes eastward to the outlet of the North West River, with their trades, on their annual migrations. These people were for the most part natives accustomed to the ministrations of the Jesuit missionaries, and they were in touch with Canada from the earliest days. Those were the people they knew, and no others. But apparently, if my friend is right, they have been transferred together with a large part of their hunting grounds to the regime of this naval officer on board his ship—the Governor of Newfoundland. I suggest to your Lordships that that is exceedingly improbable. If I have established that there was an Indian population to be catered for and to be governed, and that the Governor of Quebec was the person to whom those duties were entrusted, then I have gone a very long way indeed to displace my learned friend from the height of land. In my friend's Jigsaw puzzle—I hope I shall be pardoned for calling it so—in which he had different bits put in, I am going to put in another bit. We know that so often in trying to do these puzzles there is a bit you cannot fit in anywhere, and my friend could not fit in one bit. I am going to fit it in for him. There is the Indian reservation. Looking back to the terms of the Proclamation, look at the position. He says there is no tertium quid, but there is. The tertium quid is largely composed of this green area which he says was Newfoundland. This was all reserved. How ? If you look at Volume I, page 156, we have these words : “And we do further declare it to be our Royal will and pleasure, for the present as aforesaid, to reserve under our sovereignty, protection, and dominion, for the use of the said Indians, all the land and territories not included within the limits of our said three new governments, or within the limits of the territory granted to the Hudson's Bay Company ”—I omit the next words because I think it is now agreed they have no application—“ and we do hereby strictly forbid, on pain of our displeasure, all our loving subjects from making any purchases or settlements whatever, or taking possession of any of the lands above reserved, without our especial leave and licence for that purpose first obtained.” Then the next article enjoins everybody to remove from those reserved areas.

Mr. Macmillan.

My Lords, if you look at the preamble of that, the reason is given again at the top of page 156. “And whereas it is just and reasonable, and essential to our interest and the security of our colonies, that the several nations or tribes of Indians with whom we are connected, and who live under our protection, should not be molested or disturbed in the possession of such parts of our dominions and territories as, not having been ceded to or purchased by us, are reserved to them, or any of them. as their hunting-grounds ”—therefore these Crown reservations of Indian territory are created with that motive. Were the Montagnais not protected ? Were the Naskapis not protected ? Surely they were brought within the ambit of this protection. They were not entirely in Quebec, though some of them did come down into the Province of Quebec ; and they were certainly not entirely in Hudson's Bay territory ; and the territory contemplated here is Indian, not in Quebec and not in Hudson's Bay territory.

Now where are these Indians ? These Indians are, among others, the Montagnais and the Naskapis, and therefore it is perfectly plain that there is something reserved for those Indians in this territory. My learned friend had one piece of his puzzle, the yellow piece, which he found difficulty in fitting into his scheme, and he said that might be an Indian corridor. I am afraid that is a little too ingenious. A corridor of that sort is no particular use to roving Indians whose hunting grounds extend over the whole of the hinterland area, and they would be little benefited by a stretch of territory of that sort as a hunting ground for the Indians, to which the language of this embargo should apply. In any case, if that were all the territory to which this language were to apply, the whole of the green, on my friend's view, would be exempt from it, and the unhappy Indians there would not be permitted to practice the rites of their religion because, being papists, they would not be under the liberty of conscience clause in the Governor of Newfoundland's instructions, and apparently they would not be protected by any of the other clauses in the Proclamation.

On these grounds I submit with confidence that at least my contention is not unhistoric, nor perhaps will your Lordships think it either fantastic or preposterous. I venture to suggest it has a good deal to be said for it. It accounts for a great deal. It accounts for the whole of the regime of this part of the Labrador Peninsula, and it accounts for it on a satisfactory basis. We have the coast, with its fishery interest, confidence to the Governor of Newfoundland. We have Quebec, a settled territory, put under the territorial sovereignty of the Governor of Quebec. And we have the Indian territory where the Montagnais and others roam over these trackless plateaus, pursuing their trade, and portaging from one part to the other. We have their rights preserved, and their hunting grounds kept to them under the provisions of the Royal Proclamation, a Royal Proclamation which has no application to the Governor of Newfoundland. And then he, poor unhappy man, if my friend's contention be right, is put suddenly in the position of being Governor of all those inland Indians whom I have now discovered—my friend did not discover them—for your Lordships' consideration. He is made Governor of all those Red Indians from the deck of his ship off the Labrador Coast. An argument such as that almost merits my learned friend's epithets—only applied to his argument rather than to mine—but I prefer not to use such strong epithets on any opponent's argument.

That is not all. I want to turn next to the other element in the Labrador Peninsula—the Hudson's Bay Company. I propose to do my best to fit the pieces together there also. Nothing could have been more interesting than my learned friend's method of demonstrating how he partitioned Labrador. I am engaged in exactly the same occupation, but my result will be somewhat different.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : If you are beginning a new topic, we will adjourn now.

MORNING SESSION.

Mr. MACMILLAN : My Lords, may I be permitted to say that I am happy this morning in having the assistance of Mr. Doherty, who has just arrived from Canada. He was unfortunately detained by illness and has only now arrived. Your Lordships will recall that the task which I set myself in the first stage of my argument was to apportion the Labrador Peninsula—and I use the term advisedly in its full extent—to apportion the Labrador Peninsula in conformity with the combined effect of, first, Captain Graves' Commission, and, second, the Proclamation. Those two documents are now fully before the Board, and the problem is to apportion the Peninsula of Labrador in conformity with those two documents.

My Lords, I should like, with your Lordships' leave, to recapitulate for a moment. Prior to 1763, when those two documents came into existence, the whole area of the Labrador Peninsula was in two hands, and two hands only. When I speak of the whole of the Labrador Peninsula I speak of the half million square miles to which Sir John Simon referred at page 9 of his speech. One part of the Peninsula was in the hands of the Hudson's Bay Company; the other part was in the hands of the French. The Hudson's Bay Company and France between them accounted for the whole Peninsula of Labrador. I repeat that, because I am afraid I was a little hesitant on the subject the other day, but I have been reassured by finding that this is common ground in the Case ; and it is nowhere set out with greater clearness or accuracy than in the principal Case for the Government of Newfoundland, at page 7. It is the passage headed " D.—The position in Newfoundland and on the Labrador Peninsula in 1763." It says : " The Labrador Peninsula connotes all the area, some 420,000 square miles in all " (that is the half million square miles) " east of a line joining St. James' Bay and the River St. Lawrence. No further modifications in the position between France and Great Britain in Newfoundland or Canada or on the Labrador Peninsula were made by Treaty between 1713 and 1763, and accordingly though the war which was concluded by the Treaty of Paris involved the capture of Quebec by the British in 1759 after the battle of the Heights of Abraham, and the capture in 1762 of St. John's, Carbonear and Trinity by the French and their recapture in the same year by Lord Colville"—now here are the significant words—"yet the situation which the Treaty of Paris was designed to modify was that established as a result of the Treaty of Utrecht. That position was that the island of Newfoundland itself was subject to the British Crown, but that the only territories on the Labrador peninsula subject to the British Crown were those granted to or acquired by the Hudson's Bay Company under their Charter of 1670," and then it goes on.

Mr. Macmillan.

p. 421

Lord WARRINGTON : The next is rather important ; at least it may be.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes—"and that though the boundaries of those territories of the Hudson's Bay Company were not definitely ascertained, they did not extend anywhere (save possibly in respect of the area between Cape Chidley and Cape Grimington) further into the interior than the height of land, which formed their boundary in 1857." I postpone that for a moment, because I am going to recur to it in connection with the Hudson's Bay boundary. I want, first of all, to make the point clear that it is common ground here, that in 1763 the position was that there were two authorities, and two only, in the Labrador Peninsula : (1) The Hudson's Bay Company, and (2) France. It is true that the frontier between those two jurisdictions was not ascertained at that time. Indeed, in my submission, it has never been ascertained.

Viscount HALDANE : There is nothing to show the origin of the name "Labrador," or what it means in old days, is there ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : My learned friend, Sir John, gave an explanation of it which I think is the historically accepted one, that it was probably from the Portuguese "labradore."

Viscount HALDANE : But is there no definition attaching to the name ?

Mr. MACMILLAN: No, my Lord. I have read a little about it, and one finds that there are various conjectures as to the origin of it, but they all seem, I think, to have this feature in common, which is, that it is derived from a word which means a labourer; and one suggestion was that the land was first sighted by a farmer on one of the ships.

Lord SUMNER : That may be consistent with La Bradore Bay.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is possible, my Lord, because it is La Bradore, as if it was two words. As far as the origin is concerned, I think I have said all that need be said about it ; it appears to be a little vague ; on the whole I think that what Sir John said is correct.

Mr. Macmillan.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : It was in that book shown to us the other day, by Bellin.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord. Then, my Lords, what was the problem that the British Government was confronted with in the Labrador Peninsula ? The problem was to deal with that portion of the peninsula other than the Hudson's Bay portion, being the part acquired from the French under the Treaty. In this position of affairs we have the Government of Quebec established by the Proclamation, with an area carefully defined in extent by precise boundaries. That is my learned friend's " lozenge." All the rest of the peninsula other than this area delimited for Quebec, according to my learned friend's submission, was composed of Hudson's Bay territory and Newfoundland territory.

p. 422

The LORD CHANCELLOR: I do not think he said that ; I do not think he said that part of that yellow was Newfoundland.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I stand corrected, my Lord, to that extent, that there was a small portion left over, the yellow corridor, as my learned friend described it. Let me be precise ; he accounted for all the remainder of the Labrador Peninsula other than the yellow territory as being territory either of the Hudson's Bay Company or of Newfoundland. My effort at this stage is to establish to the satisfaction of the Board that there was another area situated in Labrador as a result of the combined effect of the Proclamation and the Commission ; and that other area is the Indian reservation ; lands reserved in the hands of His Majesty in order that the ancient hunting grounds of the Indians might not be disturbed. My parcelling out of the Labrador Peninsular is thus somewhat different from my friend's, and when I have completed my exposition of the materials available for this purpose, it will appear that the Labrador Peninsular, as a result of the combined effect of the two documents to which I have alluded, will be found to consist of Newfoundland and Quebec (the lozenge), the Hudson's Bay territory, whatever that is, the Indian reservations, whatever they are, and the rights and interests of Newfoundland on the coast of Labrador, whatever they are.

I introduce, therefore, into this area, a very important additional feature, the Indian reservations, and my learned friends, of course, appreciate how important it is from my point of view to establish the presence of that terbium quid, as my learned friend described it. There is no doubt of the importance which my learned friend attached to this subject, because at page 106 of the proceedings, on the first line, he said ; “ It is important for me to show, if I can, that in the disputable area you do get a distribution of area as between these two. On the other hand, it would be a matter in my friend's favour, and I admit it quite frankly, if he was able to establish that there is a tertium quid in Labrador.” It would be perhaps more accurate to say that there is a quartium quid in Labrador, because in my view there were four parties interested in the Labrador Peninsula as the result of the combined effect of those two documents.

Lord WARRINGTON : Who were the four ?

p. 423

Mr. MACMILLAN: The four were the Hudson's Bay Company, Quebec, the Indian reservations, and Newfoundland. I have adduced for your Lordships' consideration a certain body of evidence to show that when the Proclamation refers to lands of the Indians which are to be reserved for the present—will your Lordships kindly note the words, they are rather striking—which are to be reserved for the present for the Indians—

Viscount HALDANE : Where is that ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : The actual words I am quoting are to be found at page 156, line 23 : “ And we do further declare it to be our Royal will and pleasure, for the present as aforesaid, to reserve under our sovereignty, protection and dominion, for the use of the said Indians all the land and territories not included within the limits of our said three new governments ”—the only relevant government for our purpose is Quebec because the two Floridas do not come in—“ or within the limits of the territory granted to the Hudson's Bay Company.”

Viscount HALDANE : Do “ Indians ” include Esquimaux ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is a searching question, my Lord. It is very difficult to say, and I cannot answer it definitely because on some occasions they refer to Esquimaux as Indians. My submission here is that these Indians are not Esquimaux, and for a very good reason which you will see at the top of page 156, line 10. The purpose is that they shall not be disturbed in their hunting grounds. The Esquimaux had no hunting grounds of that sort. They were a marine people. The beneficiaries of these reservations were “ the several nations or tribes of Indians with whom we are connected and who live under our protection.”

Viscount FINLAY : Is that common ground that the Esquimaux are not spoken of as “ Indians ” in these documents ?

Mr. MACMILLAN ; No, I do not think it is common ground.
That is my submission.

Viscount FINLAY : It is the sort of impression that one gets on reading the papers.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I always prefer, if I may, not to say a thing is common ground unless I am sure, because it always leads to controversy, and it is perhaps easier to make it as a submission. Your Lordships will judge between us, if my learned friend challenges it. My submission is that when you are speaking of the hunting grounds of Indians you are speaking of Red Indians, and not of Esquimaux. When it was desired to retain these hunting grounds for the present under the sovereignty, protection and dominion, for the use of the Indians, what was contemplated was the Indian hunting grounds.

Viscount HALDANE : I suppose that means that the territory of the Indian lands is vested in the Crown subject to Indian occupation ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Exactly. They had no title at all. But as you will see in the sequel they were exceedingly jealous of their hunting grounds. They had themselves recognised areas in which they hunted.

Lord SUMNER : Does the expression “ the said Indians ” in line 25 go back to the “ several nations or tribes of Indians with whom we are connected and who live under our protection ” in lines 6 and 7 ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : I submit it does.

Lord SUMNER : Those words are limitative of “ the said Indians ” ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes.

Lord SUMNER : Before 1763 I do not think we have heard of any connection between His Majesty King George III and the Montagnais or Esquimaux ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord. I have the passages establishing that. I will come to that in a few minutes, if your Lordship will allow me. There was a most intimate relationship before 1763 between the Indians of Labrador and previously the French King, and thereafter our King. I will give your Lordship the passages a little later. I am very anxious for the moment to keep the general position before my Lords, because it is apt to be a little elusive. I was concerned, as my Lords recall, to show the presence of Red Indians in the green area, and to show there were not merely a few Esquimaux there. I was concerned to show further that the Indians contemplated in the Proclamation, while they undoubtedly included, and primarily included, I should think, the Six Nations, and other Indians who were, of course, much more numerous in the north-western portion, certainly did not intend to exclude the Naskapis or Montagnais in Labrador. The suggestion of my learned friend is given at page 121, line 40. Dealing with the position which I am now examining, he says : “ The reference to Indian lands in these eighteenth century arrangements is not a reference to just a few people who are on Hamilton Inlet. It is hundreds and thousands of miles away from the area which is really being pointed to.”

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord WARRINGTON : You said just now that you submitted the Proclamation does not exclude the Labrador Indians.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I am putting it at its very lowest.
p. 425

Lord WARRINGTON : It may not include them, without expressly excluding them.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is so, my Lord. It is always best rather to understate than to overstate. But my learned friend says it is inapt to distinguish them.

Viscount FINLAY : In the ordinary use of language at that time would an Esquimaux be spoken of as an Indian ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Why I hesitate to accept that at once is that in the papers in these books I find a description several times occurring of “ Esquimaux Indians.” That has embarrassed me in answering your Lordship, naturally, because the terminology was not very precise. But that the distinction between the Red Indians on the one hand and the Esquimaux on the other was well known at that time, I am going to demonstrate this morning. It would not however, be accurate to say there was not some confusion of terminology, because I do find the expression “ Esquimaux Indians.”

The LORD CHANCELLOR : You say this refers to the several nations or tribes of Indians.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Who have hunting grounds that ought to be protected.

Viscount HALDANE : Is that the Six Nations ?

Mr. MACMILLAN: No, it is all the tribes of Indians, not merely the Six Nations to the west. The Six Nations were round the lakes.

Viscount HALDANE : At the top of page 153 the words are : “ the several nations or tribes of Indians.”

Mr. MACMILLAN : That includes, of course, the Six Nations, but it also includes the Montagnais and Naskapis. And I am going to show in a moment that the Montagnais were a branch of the great Red Indian tribe of the Algonkians. I have already read a passage about that, but I will refer to it more conclusively in a moment. I am combating just now my learned friend's suggestion that the words “ Indian lands ” is not a reference to just a few people on Hamilton Inlet, and that it is hundreds and thousands of miles away from the area which is really being pointed to. In order to rebut that, I am really indebted to my learned friend for the prominence which he has given to the House of Commons Report in 1857 on the Hudson's Bay question. My learned friend brought before your Lordships as a document of much significance a plan which is appended to that Report. You may remember that he introduced the Report to your Lordships as a report of a Select Committee upon which Mr. Gladstone sat.

Lord SUMNER : That is the Arrowsmith map ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is the Arrowsmith map. I have the actual Government paper in front of me. My friend also emphasised that the plan to which I have alluded was ordered by the House of Commons to be printed on the 31st July and 11th August, 1857. May I say that the fact that a document is ordered to be printed by a Select Committee does not in the least mean that the Select Committee has adopted the contents of that document. It will be within the experience of your Lordships when sitting on Committees and Commissions that there is much material printed in a report by way of an appendix that does not necessarily reflect the views of the Committee.

Viscount FINLAY : What is ordered to be printed may be a fallacy.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Certainly. I have myself directed papers to be printed in an appendix which I should be very sorry to be taken as representative of my own views of the matter I was examining. My learned friend, when he was examining that map appended to the Hudson's Bay Committee's Report, cannot have turned over the page.

Viscount FINLAY : Have we got this map ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is Map No. 26., My friend cannot have turned over the page, because the very next map appended to the Hudson's Bay Committee's Report, and bearing, I am interested to see, the same imprimatur on which my friend relies so much as a guarantee of authenticity—"ordered by the House of Commons to be printed"—is described as "An aboriginal map of North America, denoting the boundaries and locations of various Indian tribes." That map is No. 33 of the Canadian Atlas, but I prefer to take the actual map. I have it in my hands now, and I will put it before the Lord Chancellor. It shows precisely what I have indicated to your Lordships, that the territory right up to the coast of Labrador, or selvedge of Labrador, is occupied by the Indian aboriginal tribes ; and it shows the Algonkian Indians stretching right across the area well into Sir John's green territory. I doubt if my learned friend can have turned over the page, because otherwise he would have put this document before your Lordships.

Lord SUMNER : We have a copy of this map.

Mr. MACMILLAN: It is a coloured map, and I think it is more important to see the actual document itself. In case there should be any question of the colouring not being actually reproduced, I thought it better to produce the original. The copy is also only a portion of the map. If my Lord Sumner would look at the map before the Lord Chancellor he will see the whole of the Indian territory coloured in green. It corresponds exactly with the description I ventured to give your Lordships—Esquimaux along the coast, and Red Indians in the interior. The Red Indians shown there are the Algonkian tribe, a large tribe of whom the Montagnais are a part, and the Naskapis further to the north.

Mr. Macmillan.

The LORD CHANCELLOR: What is the boundary between the two ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is only a difference in the wash, I think. There is no line as far as I know.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Oh yes, there is. It corresponds not exactly with the change of colour, but very nearly. It looks as if the Esquimaux for their purposes, whatever they were, had penetrated for some miles into the country, although obviously not so far as the Indians.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Certainly. What I am concerned to establish for your Lordship's satisfaction is that my description was accurate, that the Esquimaux are a nation inhabiting the coast, that the Red Indians are people inhabiting the interior, and that at the material date there were Red Indians in the area which my learned friend says was handed over to Newfoundland up to the height of land.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I see Naskapis Indians are noted on the map.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is the other tribe I mentioned. I mentioned the Montagnais and Naskapis. The Montagnais are a branch of the Algonkians.

Lord SUMNER : The Algonkians covered half of North America, so that it is a very general term.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes.

Lord SUMNER : Probably your point is that no Indians are found on the Coast of Labrador.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I am commenting on the suggestion that there were no Indians to be provided for in this territory with hunting grounds dealt with under the Proclamation of 1763. My Lords will note who is the author of that map. My learned friend was concerned to show what a valuable cartographer Mr. Arrowsmith was. That map was by Mr. Arrowsmith. That map was ordered to be printed by the House of Commons and, therefore, it is introduced to your Lordships' notice with exactly the same commendation from me as my learned friend introduced the map of 1857 to be found appended to the same volume.

p. 428

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I see that under the heading of Indian nations. are included Esquimaux as well.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I am much obliged, my Lord, I had not noticed that. The real value of that map is this. It shows pictorially exactly what I have been describing to your Lordships from contemporary descriptions. namely that the Esquimaux tribes are to be found along the coast, and the Red Indians are to be found inland. It is an exact pictorial representation of the state of matters at the material time, showing in a map what I have done already from contemporary and subsequent records. Lest it be said that that may have been the position of matters in 1857, but how do we know that it was the position of matter in 1763, which is the material date I first suggest that the Indians have certainly not been extending between 1763 and 1857. But again I am relieved by the indulgence of my friends from making any point about that because they state at page 9 of their case, "The aboriginal inhabitants of the Labrador Peninsula have altered very little, either in numbers or otherwise, since 1763." Therefore we may take it that the representation upon that Map No. 33 of the Canadian Atlas, a copy of which, as appended to the House of Commons Report, has just been before my Lord, represents the state of occupation of Labrador so far as the Red Indians were concerned, and shows the Red Indians as a people in occupation of the green territory, and therefore in occupation of a territory where they had their hunting grounds, and that those hunting grounds were handed over to the Governor of Newfoundland and were not reserved to the King under the Proclamation of 1763. I shall have to recur to that volume a little later on for another and perhaps even more important purpose, but for the moment your Lordships see the object I have in view.

There are one or two passages I would merely ask your Lordships to note in passing, confirmatory of the view which I submitted on Friday, and which I think is further vouched by the map which has just been in your Lordship's hands. Mr. Hesketh Prichard in Volume V, page 2646, an explorer in Labrador. gives an interesting account of what he saw.

Viscount HALDANE : What date is this ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is quite recent. Mr. Prichard's book is published in 1911.

Lord SUMNER : Do you know who he was ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : He was a very well-known officer. Unhappily he is dead, as your Lordship knows. But he had a distinguished career. This was his book giving an account of his explorations through

Labrador. He tells us about the conditions, and one reads it bearing in mind the exhortation of Newfoundland that the conditions of matters as regards the aboriginal inhabitants is now practically the same as it was in 1763. That excuses my reference to so modern a book. He talks of the great plateau which lies between the Atlantis and the George River, and of all the difficulties he encountered. Then he says, at line 17 : “ The present population of Labrador falls naturally into four divisions. The first is the permanent white community. which includes the Moravian Brethren and their families, the Hudson's Bay Company's factors, and the liveyeres (live heres) as the white settlers are called. These all dwell by the salt water. The second division is made up of the men belonging to the fishing–fleets, who are summer visitors only, coming up through the ice from Newfoundland and the south in the early days of July and leaving in October. The lives of these men are hard and stern, and in them again we find the predatory record. From the day on which they put out from Newfoundland in their schooners to that on which they return, they toil savagely, catching and curing fish, living meanwhile in wooden shanties on the barren windswept islands or on the shores of lonely inlets. With the third division we reach the real children of the coast, the Eskimo tribes. All along the eastern littoral, from Makkovik northwards, they exist, cared for and preserved by the Moravian Brethren, whose wise policy it is to encourage them to live as nearly as possible on the lines that Nature intended. The Moravians have done a great and heroic work, to which I have tried to bear witness in the latter part of this book. The Eskimo are altogether predatory, a race of hunters and fishers. Fish in the summer, fur in the winter, and seal, walrus and white whale are their quarry from one year's end to another. In the early springtime, while ice still holds the land ironbound. they make long journeys by komatik, or dog–sledge, after the herds of Barrenground caribou, the branch of the vast reindeer family which inhabits the barren uplands of North and Central Labrador. Now, we are left with the fourth, the Indians of the interior. Their numbers were, some time ago, computed to be four thousand in all, but the large majority of these hunt and trap in the southern part of the peninsula, massing at various points, and coming out with their furs to the water of the St. Lawrence. More to the North, in the central country are the lodges of two tribes, the Montagnais, and the Nascaupees. Here we find the dominant instinct of Labrador, the predatory instinct, at its fullest development. These tribes owe their food, clothing, and their habitations to the creatures of the chase, and they live a life of hardship and freedom such as was more common in the world of a hundred years ago.” Then with regard to the distinction between the coastal strip and the interior country, pray note the language used in the last paragraph of the page, at line 38. " In fact, few things have struck me more than the almost universal fear which lay upon the fisher population of this barren coast with regard to the great hinterland upon whose eastern lip they live. It was the one subject upon which their imaginations never failed them. To lose the way, to be drowned in some rock-staked torrent, to die miserably of starvation—in such glib phrases they voiced their many forebodings."

p. 430

Viscount HALDANE : I see he uses a new phrase at line 20 of page 2646. Speaking of the white community, he says : " These all dwell by the salt water."

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes. I read that with an intentional emphasis. On page 2649 the author proceeds under the heading of " The Indians of the Labrador " to say this : " The Indians of the interior are probably a diminishing people whose numbers it is difficult to compute, for they live for the most part withdrawn behind their fastnesses of wilderness and stony desert. According to the most reliable estimates they may be counted as some four thousand in all. The large majority of these hunt and trap in the southern part of the peninsula, coming out with their furs to the waters of the St. Lawrence. In the central country are the lodges of two tribes—the Montagnais to the south and the Nascaupes further north. They have parcelled out certain districts of the interior into hunting grounds, each of which is regarded as a hereditary belonging, passing from father to son. They call no man master, and they live a life of hardship and freedom such as was more common in the world of a hundred years ago."

Your Lordships have there, I think, a very accurate description of a recent explorer in this territory showing that the conditions now are just the same as those which Lieutenant Curtis found at the end of the eighteenth century at the time this material document came into being ; and the same conditions, again, as are reflected in the map appended to the House of Commons Report of 1857.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Have we had a reference to Lieutenant Curtis ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, your Lordship had that on Friday.

1 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Oh yes, I have it. It is in the same volume, page 2640.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes. I also gave your Lordship Cartwright, who was also at the end of the eighteenth century. So far as I have been able to examine the matter the whole position seems to be quite consistent, and it has the great advantage of coinciding with the pleadings—I mean the written as distinguished from the oral pleadings—of Newfoundland in this case.

There are other passages of great interest, and perhaps I might just make one further reference to the Indians apropos of a question my Lord Sumner raised. Your Lordships will realise that when we succeeded to this good heritage in Labrador we were not succeeding to a territory which was entirely unknown, or whose inhabitants were entirely unknown. There was a great unexplored hinterland, it is true, where the Indians had their hunting grounds, and where they roamed at large. But the Indians had to come to the coast, they had to come down from their plateau in order to trade ; and it is a characteristic of these tribes that they frequented the various posts, which were established at suitable places, in order to barter the skins which they had taken during the winter season for food, guns, knives, and other manufactured commodities, at the posts which had been established to trade with them. Those Indians with whom I am dealing had posts on three sides of them. They had the Hudson's Bay posts to the west, they had the well-known King's Posts on the St. Lawrence to the south, and they had certain posts which the Hudson's Bay Company had established to the east, the North-West post, and Rigolet post, and other posts about that region. Therefore, the Indian had a choice where he would take the peltries—to Hudson Bay, the St. Lawrence, or east to the Hudson Bay posts on the eastern side of the divide. There are traces of considerable competition to induce the Indians to come in one or other of those different directions. Some of that history is recorded in these volumes, but from a date long antecedent to the signing of the Treaty of Paris the value of this fur trade with the Indians of the interior of Labrador, had been recognised and had become a monopoly of the French King, a monopoly to which our King succeeded in turn in what is known as the King's Domain, or the King's Posts, situated upon the north bank of the River St. Lawrence, and comprising a large number of posts established, some on the coast of the river, and some further inland, being the posts to which the Indians from the interior, particularly the Montagnais—and it may be to some extent the Naskapis also, though they were a more northerly and rather more elusive tribe—regularly resorted for the purpose of bartering the skins they had taken with the traders established in those posts.

Viscount HALDANE : Was there any port there from which the skins could be taken away to Europe ?

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I do not know what development there had been. There were primitive harbours there, of course. They really were taken from there to Quebec.

Lord SUMNER : They would go back on the same vessels that came in ?

Viscount Haldane.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Quebec was the entrepot for the trade, and it is significant that it was conducted entirely by Canadians. It was not a Newfoundland trade in any sense of the term.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount HALDANE : Was there any road, or any way of getting to Quebec ?

p. 432

Mr. MACMILLAN : Only by sea. The Red Indians came down the rivers in their canoes. They were able to effect portages in this territory, which was so completely equipped with water communications that they could pass from one part of it to another by canoe. It was not a case of going over the Rockies at all. On this plateau you find a great number of lakes and rivers often separated by a very short distance, and they effected their transits from this country by short portages.

Viscount HALDANE : In those days there was no distinction between the coast of Labrador and the interior, so that they could come across at any point they wanted.

Mr. MACMILLAN : In 1763 there was no distinction at all. It was all France. If you would wish to have one or two references on this subject, General Murray tells us a little about the Indians on page 2760 of Volume VI : “ The posts of the Kings Domain vizt. Tadoussac, Islets de Jeremie, Chicoutimy and Sept Isles situated on the north side of the River St. Lawrence were during the French Government under the immediate management of the Director thereof who was appointed to that charge by the Governor and Intendant of Canada. He furnished them at the Kings expence with the merchandize and effects proper for the Indian trade or fisherys which were carried on at these several Posts, and received from thence likewise upon the Kings account, the furs, oyl, fish or other produce of the same. They had formerly been farmed but the lease expiring in 1756 they were advertised and no one bidding for them on account of the war the Intendant lest the savages should quit their usual haunts ordered them under the before mentioned direction, which continued until our arrival altho the expence far exceeded the produce. When they were let out to farm the highest rent paid for them under the French government was 7,000 livres or £291-13-4 sterling.”

1 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Where is Tadoussac ? Is that in the green ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : No; none of them are in the green ; they are in the River St. Lawrence.

Mr. MACMILLAN : None of these places mentioned are in the green, but some of the King's Posts I shall show were in the green.

Sir John Simon.

Lord WARRINGTON: I have Tadoussac and Sept Isles. Where are Islets de Jeremie and Chicoutimy ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : They are further up the river than Sept Isles.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Between Sept Isles and Tadoussac.
p. 433

Lord WARRINGTON : There is nothing east of Sept Isles amongst these that are mentioned.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, my Lord, I do not think so, but I shall be able to give your Lordships the extent of the King's Domain ; they extended to Cape Cormorant, that is the limit.

Lord WARRINGTON: Sept Isles was pretty close to that. Where is Chicoutimy ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : Chicoutimy is on the Saguenay, about half way between the mouth and the Lake St. John. If your Lordship would like to identify the Islets de Jeremie, they are, as a matter of fact, on my sketch map just about on the meridan of 69.

Lord WARRINGTON : Then they would be north-east of Tadoussac ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : That is right, my Lord. I think that is approximately right.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is, of course, where one would expect them to be, because they came down in their canoes. There was no other method of transport.

Viscomit HALDANE : They never came round the coast ?

Mr. MACMILLAN: No, my Lord.

Viscount HALDANE : They only had canoes ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Birch-bark canoes. The whole of that territory, without discrimination, by such a line as is indicated in blue there, was all one great territory so far as the Indians were concerned ; they had no notion of Newfoundland's present claim at all.

Viscount HALDANE : Nor of the height of land, I suppose ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : No ; the whole thing was a rolling plateau. There is interesting evidence to show that sometimes people had to drop a leaf in a stream to see which way it was flowing. Up on the plateau you are in a great extent of land, with the huge lakes all over it, honey-combed with lakes, so that until you get a long way from the centre of it, it is difficult to know which way the water is going. General Murray, in 1767, is telling us about the posts of the King's domain, and at page 2761 he says : “ After the reduction of Canada in 1760 the Indians of the Domain deputed their Chief and Missionary to address General Murray in their favor, and represented to him that they were in the utmost misery and distress since the Conquest, destitute of provisions and every necessary, begging that they might be taken under the protection of His Britannick Majesty and supply'd and maintained in the same manner they had been in the time of the french.” If my Lord, will link that language up with the language of the proclamation, these are Indians coming to Murray, our Governor on the spot, seeking to be taken under the protection of His Britannick Majesty and pleading their cause. “ The General after enquiring into the nature and establishment of the Domain”—he knew nothing about the domain, it was a French domain—“ reported the state of it to General Amherst who ordered it to be continued on the same footing as formerly, and an Agent or Director was appointed to supply them with merchandize, etc., and to receive the returns on the King's account.” Then there is some more about it. Then at line 30 there is : “ His Majesty was pleased to issue His Royal Proclamation signifying his pleasure with regard to North America and enjoining that the Trade with the Indians described therein might be free and open to all His Subjects.” General Murray is dealing with the King's posts ; that is to say posts to which the furs were brought down in the land of Labrador, and General Murray is invoking the proclamation of His Majesty, the document of 1763, enjoining that the trade of Indians described therein might be free and open to all his subject. General Murray's view was rather different to the view put forward now by Newfoundland, which is that the Indians referred to in the proclamation were hundreds of thousands of miles away. So far from being hundreds of thousands of miles away, they were at the very doors of Quebec and the trade with these posts was one of the most important things to which we succeeded. We succeeded to a well-established regime whereby the benefits of the fur trade in the interior of Labrador had been acquired and developed by the French King, and our King in turn, His Britannic Majesty, succeeded to that asset as one of the assets under the Treaty of 1763. “ General Murray issued a proclamation in consequence of that of the King last mentioned setting forth the hostilities were now ceased with the several Indian nations who had lately appeared in arms against His Majesty and a friendly intercourse between His Majesty's subjects and them thereby restored, declaring that the trade with the several Indian nations living under his protection was free and open to all His Subjects under the restrictions mentioned in the said Royal Proclamation ” ; and so on. If my Lord would look at General Murray's letter to the Lords of Trade on page 2766 you will find some more light upon this. It is a letter of the 26th May, 1767.

Lord SUMNER : Did you read the last paragraph on page 2761 ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, my Lord, I did not. Shall I read it ?

Lord SUMNER : It touches the point you were making, that the Indians trading from the green interior were among those who had been in arms, or appeared to have been enemies of King George III. You know these things better than I do. It may not be so good as some other things.

Mr. MACMILLAN : If I may say so, I think on the whole it is not so favourable to me, for this reason : it will appear to your Lordships a little later on that these Montagnais did not fight against us ; they had been civilised in their contact with the French and had really become commercialised to some extent. Apparently I have committed a dreadful solecism. I thought they had not fought, but I am told by those behind me that they had fought. I thought that these were a more docile people in this part. That was my impression, but I must be wrong. It is not very material for our present purpose. If your Lordships would look at page 2766 there is an interesting letter of the 26th May, 1767. “ The lands of the King's Domain were never ceded to nor purchased by the French King, nor by His Britannick Majesty ; but by compact with the savages inhabiting the said lands, the particular Posts or Spots of ground, whereon the King's buildings are erected and now stand, were ceded to the French King, for the purpose of erecting storehouses and other conveniences for the Factors, Commis or Servants employed to carry on the trade ; and the savages residing within the limits of the Domain, and who resort to the said Posts of His Majesty at certain seasons of the year, were adopted as Domicile Indians under the sole and immediate protection of the King, and so remained till the reduction of the Province, and a Missionary was sent to reside constantly among them. The lands of the Domain therefore, are to all intents and purposes reserved, as hunting grounds to the savages, of which they are ever jealous, on the least appearance of an encroachment even among themselves. With what propriety, therefore, could the Governor have complied with Mr Alsops petition for grants of land there ? would it not have been in direct contradiction to His Majesty's Proclamation ? and I flatter myself the contempt he has shown to the said Royal Proclamation of His Majesty's Government, will be far from entitling him to the favour he claims from the King's servants here.” This was a person who wanted to get a grant of land.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord WARRINGTON : Not in Labrador ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : In the King's Domain.

Lord WARRINGTON : What is the King's Domain ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : I will tell your Lordship in a moment.

The Lord Chancellor.

The territory of the King's Domain is very difficult of ascertainment, because it was a domain not measured by metes and bounds, it was a domain in which the King had established

p. 436

Mr. Macmillan.

posts for the purpose of attracting the Indians from the interior. The drainage area, if I may so call it, of the King's posts was naturally a very much larger thing than the territory actually occupied by the King's posts themselves. The domain was not defined by metes and bounds, but you find a series of posts established to which the trade came from all the hinterland. I have one or two clues to the size of the King's domain, but I am not going to say that it is ever satisfactorily delimited in any way. I do not require to do so, because my only concern is to show that there were posts on the St. Lawrence, and inland from the St. Lawrence, to which the Indians from the interior resorted. No one would suggest that those Indians occupied solely the yellow strip on my learned friend's map.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Where did furs which were here at the head of the Hamilton River and taken there go to—over the mountains ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord ; some went there. There is a very interesting story later on, of somebody wanting to get a grant down in the region that my Lord is pointing to, and it was opposed on the ground that if a grant was obtained there it would drain away the Indians from their resorting to the St. Lawrence and take them that way, and to that extent injure the King's domain, or the St. Lawrence Post. I submit, on the fair reading of the documents, there is no doubt we are dealing with a great region of Indian hunting lands there. There was a certain competition among the various posts to get the Indians to resort to them ; in fact one is sorry to see the temptation of fire water used in many instances to attract the Indians. They were most liable to go to the posts where they got most drink. They did not go beyond Cape Cormorant.

Viscount HALDANE : Were the only King's posts those on the way to Quebec ?

1 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : These are four mentioned by General Murray. There are more posts than these further inland.

Lord WARRINGTON: They are all west of the territories with which we have to deal.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Not so, if I may say so. The King's domain——

Lord WARRINGTON : But the King's posts are all west of the River St. John.

Lord Warrington.

Mr. MACMILLAN : All west of the River St. John ?

Lord WARRINGTON : Or the longitude of the River St. John.

p. 437

Mr. MACMILLAN: I think so, my Lord, I am not quite positive. They are dotted about in what is called the King's domain.

Lord WARRINGTON : I know.

Lord Sumner.

Mr. MACMILLAN : For my present purpose your Lordship sees that that is not very material. If posts had even been at Quebec it would have been good enough for me, if I could show that the Indians from this territory resorted to them.

Lord WARRINGTON : General Murray was Governor of Quebec, and his authority would only extend to that which was within his own Province.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Under the proclamation he was directed to deal with the Indians outside his own Province.

Lord WARRINGTON : In the reserves.

Mr. MACMILLAN : In the reserved portion.

Lord SUMNER : I quite see your picture of a very limited number of hunting Indians trapping and hunting over a vast area in an unknown interior and trickling down for the purpose of barter and consideration to coast places which were naturally those where there were established trading posts ; therefore the hinterland is the feeding ground for the King's posts more or less on the St. Lawrence.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord.

Lord SUMNER : But that does not seem to be entirely inconsistent with the back lands of Labrador including all this hunting area, so long as there is no grant of special ground to individuals, and so long as there happens to be no trading post of importance on the Atlantic coast. The natural tendency of the Indians to come down to the St. Lawrence shore remains as it had been from the beginning of the world.

1 Nov., 1926.
Mr. Macmillan.

If you could find the Governor of Newfoundland directed to establish roads and posts and intersect this hunting ground, or if it had been suggested that that is what would have been done, there would have been an obvious inconsistency between respecting the rights of the Indians who were attached to Quebec, and giving the Governor of Newfoundland that kind of power extending inland from the Atlantic shore ; but there is nothing of the kind, and for the purposes of some kind of definition to an area which would otherwise have been gaping open over a frontier of hundreds of miles they might have used language which covered the hinterland up to the height of land, and yet be quite consistent with taking the enjoyment of trade with the Indians south through the St. Lawrence,

p. 438

Mr. MACMILLAN : The stages, of course, through which one's mind passes are these ; first of all, are there any Indians there at all ?

Lord SUMNER : Yes.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It has been submitted to your Lordships that there are none.

Sir JOHN SIMON : That is no part of my case.

Mr. MACMILLAN: “ A few esquimaux up there ” is my learned friend's expression, and the Indians dealt with in the proclamation are Indians hundreds of thousands of miles away. I want to take the stages with your Lordships, if I may respectfully do so. First of all, Indians established there. The question is : Are those Indians under Newfoundland, or are they under Quebec, under Canada, or are they in the King's hands ? I find in the proclamation of 1763 a design to maintain the Indians in their hunting ground as in a Crown reservation, and I find a code providing for dealing with the Indians. First of all, Indians are not to have their land purchased by anybody ; there are to be no grants. Secondly, I find this : that if there are any people who have encroached upon the Indians they are to remove and leave the Indians free. Next I find a system provided whereby traders may get licenses from the Governor of Quebec to trade in the Indian territory. I find, in short, a code provided and handed to the Governor of Quebec. I find no such code handed to the Governor of Newfoundland. He is not authorised to grant any licences ; he is not enjoined to prevent people purchasing or acquiring portions of the Indian reservation. I find on one side of my argument a code adapted to a Crown reservation for Indians appropriate to a westward-looking jurisdiction, and pro contra I find nothing on Newfoundland's side appropriate to this at all. There is a direction that he is to encourage commerce, and so on, and I will deal with that in a moment, because that is another very instructive part of the case, but at this moment I am concerned to establish the presence of Indians there who were in a reservation, and that there was no gaping space at all, because the whole of this Labrador Peninsula is accounted for under these categories : Hudson's Bay, Quebec, reservation for the Indians, and such rights as Newfoundland may have had, whatever they were.

Lord Sumner.

Lord SUMNER : There is still a gap somewhere between Cape Chidley and Ance Sablon, although you put it so very much nearer to the shore. No one has ever filled that up yet.

Mr. MACMILLAN : One must go by stages. I think you will find that I can account for that also.

Lord SUMNER : Doubtless, but still at the moment I think it is important to see that if there are settlements to be prevented and squatters to be turned out, it appears to be the Governor of Quebec who is to do it. If there are settlers licenses to be granted they are got at Quebec. There is no application at all to the Governor of Newfoundland in any of these matters, and there is an established and valuable trade to be fostered from Quebec and valuable to Quebec. All those things are very significant.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I am content to leave it there, and I do not wish to press it further at this stage.

Lord SUMNER : You must remember they are not quite as significant as they would be if, in 1763, there had been Imperial Statutes laying down so-called areas for different self-governing Dominions. These are, after all, only dependent on Commissions which could be cancelled or superseded whenever it was considered necessary to do so. They are only dealing with the current administration of an area which would take more than two men to administer.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is quite true that in this area the only territory which was defined by superficial measurements or boundaries was Quebec, which was actually defined. Beyond that, we have nothing but the general description of Hudson's Bay territory, which is not a description by boundaries, but a description by the names of places, by lands, rivers, and so on. As regards Newfoundland, its rights, whatever they are, are admittedly not defined beyond two termini on the coast. Therefore we are in this position in this area. We have one settled Government whose boundaries are precisely ascertainable and ascertained, but for the present—and my Lords will appreciate what I am working up to—I am destroying, if I can, my learned friend's contention. The land on this side of the peninsula up to the height of land was all Newfoundland, was his case, and he was concerned to show that there were no Indians there, to whom this proclamation referred. That was the point. He said the Indians to which the proclamation referred were hundreds of thousands of miles away. If I can show that there are Indians there, and that the proclamation refers to those Indians, then I get the reserved Indian territory and I dislodge my learned friend from the height of land ; that is the course of my argument.

Lord WARRINGTON : Speaking for myself, that is the difficulty that I feel ; not that there were no Indians there, but that the proclamation extended to them.

Mr. MACMILLAN : May I take it again by stages ? How far have I got ? I have got this fixed : I have shown that there were King's posts. As regards those posts, who were the Indians who came to them ? They were Indians who came down these rivers to the posts, and they came from the hinterland, and they were the people to trade with whom licences would be given by the Quebec Governor, and they were, therefore, people who had hunting grounds jealously preserved in the Labrador Peninsula, and just the people to whom the proclamation would apply. I am sorry I do not carry conviction, but perhaps my Lord will reserve judgment upon it until the rest of the matter is put before his Lordship,

p. 440

Lord WARRINGTON : Certainly.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Would the furs which were taken by the Naskopi, who were the most northerly of the Indians on the land coloured green, come down the St. Lawrence at all, or would they go into Lake Melville and down to the coast ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : There is not much evidence of Naskopis coming down with furs, it is mostly Montagnais.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Was there much Montagnais ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes. I have tried, my Lord, to get some idea of the extent of the territory which was known by King's posts. About the best I can get, I think, is the description in the Memoir of Monsieur Cugnet in 1766, Volume VII, page 3254 ; that was just three years after the Peace of Paris. This Memoir was sent by Governor Carleton of Quebec to Lord Shelburne, who apparently wanted to know about the 20 King's posts. There is a great deal of material about the King's Posts, but it is a little bit vague.

Viscount HALDANE : He must have succeeded in 1766.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord, he was the second Governor, who was afterwards Lord Dorchester.

Viscount HALDANE : He became Lord Dorchester afterwards ; but, I think, not while he was there.

1 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord. Now, this document is written in French, and there is a translation at the foot, which says this : “ The King's Posts and trades commonly known as the Traité de Tadoussac, begin at Cape aux Oyes, adjacent to Les Eboulements and extended along the north shore of the river as far as cape Cormorant, fifteen leagues above Seven Islands.”—Then there is a description of them, and in the bottom line it says this : “ Tadoussac, 14 leagues lower than Malbaye, was always the chief post. Chicoutimy”—now we have the description of it—“ 40 leagues further inland, ascending the Saguenay river. Lake St. John is situated 40 leagues above Chicoutimy. After leaving Lake St. John two posts are to be found, namely, Mistassin, to the N.N.W., 150 leagues from its mouth, and Chobmonchouane, to the W.S.W., 60 leagues from the lake. Note.—The above three posts are dependencies of Chicoutimy post. Isle-de-Jeremie, 25 leagues lower than Tadoussac. Point-da-la-Crox or Havre St. Nicholas, 18 leagues distant. Note.—The last-named post is dependent on Isle-de-Jeremie. my father having reunited Mille Vaches to the Domaine, which thus formed part of that post. This deed of reunion should be in the records of the office of the Intendant. Presumably, the Aubert family, heirs of that seignior, incurred losses from that time. Seven Islands or River Moisy was also reunited to the Domaine at my father's request,” and so on. Now comes his description : “ This forms an extent of land along the river of 97 leagues in front by some 190 leagues in depth as known.”

Now will your Lordships just see what was considered. It was this : 190 multiplied by 3 is 570 miles inland, and there is 97 leagues of river frontage. You will notice that it is all called “ river ” down to Cape Cormorant. That is 291miles along the coast, and 560 miles in depth. It is rather interesting to take, along with this, my learned friend's map, and see where it would take one to.

Sir JOHN SIMON : The river frontage, as I think you will agree, is all to the west of Tadoussac.

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, all to the east of Tadoussac. If your Lordships will run a line up from Cape Cormorant for 570 miles inland, you will see where it brings you to.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : It would take you up to Ungava Bay.

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, my Lord, not quite so far that, but it takes you right up into the green, to the famous Sandgirt Lake, which was the gathering ground of the Indians.

Lord SUMMER : Is it due north, or north west ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : I can only say that it is the depth.

Lord SUMMER : It is at right angles to the Gulph of St.

Lawrence, in which case it would clear the green, or is it due north ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : I cannot say, my Lord. It only says : “ in depth.”

The LORD CHANCELLOR : This scale is 200 miles, the whole thing ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Then 570 miles would take you a long way up ?

p. 442

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord, but there is some better material coming in a moment. If one went right in, this would take one right up, very nearly to Ungava Bay. Your Lordship is right. That is what Mr. Cugnet, who was the son of the Director of the Posts, said in 1766, and that is the information that was sent on by Governor Carleton to Lord Shelburne. But fortunately we are able to dispose of the difficulty about where he got inland, because I think, if you will just turn over the page—

Viscount HALDANE : Is it page 3256 ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : We get a little more light on it on page 3210, which is an Ordinance of Intendant Hocquart, on the 23rd May, 1733, re limit of Traite of Tadoussac. The Traite of Tadoussac was the King's Posts.

Now will your Lordships just look at page 3208. After going through a great deal of preliminary material, he says this : “ And the whole being considered ; We have fixed the limits of the domain of the King called the Traite de Tadoussac, that is to say, on the north bank of the river Saint Lawrence from the lower end of the seignory of Eboulemens, which is opposite the north-east point of isle-aux-Coudres, to cape Cormorant, being about ninety-five leagues of front, with the isle-aux-Oeufs and other isles, islets and shoals adjacent thereto ; on the western side, by an imaginary line drawn east and west, to commence from the lower end of the seignory of Eboulemens to the height of land at the portance of lake Patitachekao, latitude 47 degrees 15 minutes, on which portage the said Sieur Normandin has affixed four fleur-de-lis, on four balsam firs, from which lake Patitachekao the river Metabetchouamon takes its rise, and discharges into lake St. John, whence it falls into the Saguenay ; further to the west by lakes Spamoskoutin, Sagainin and Kaouakounabiscat, at the height-of-land, in the latitude of 47 degrees 27 minutes, where the said Sieur Normandin has also affixed four fleur-de-lis on four balsam firs, the said lake Kaouakounisbiscat forming other lakes, and the river Quiatechouanon, which discharges into the Saguenay through the said lake St. John, which two lakes form the boundary of the hunting country in the rear of Batiscan ; and running still to the west, towards the region of Three Rivers, and in depth by the height-of-land, about two leagues from the Little lake Patitaouaganiche, latitude 48 degrees 18 minutes, where the said Sieur Normandin has also placed four fleur-de-lis on four balsam firs, which lake flows through lake Askatiche,” and so on. It is perhaps not worth while reading all that until you get to the bottom line, where it says : “ within which boundaries are the posts of Tadoussac, Malbair, Bondesir, Papinachois, Islets-de-Jeremie and Pointe-des-Bersiamites, Chekoutimy, Lake St. John, Nekouhau, Chomonthouane, Mistassins, and behind the Mistassins as far as Hudson's Bay ; and, on the lower part of the river, the Domaine will be bounded, in consequence of our said ordinance of the twelfth of the present month, by cape Cormorant as far as the height of land, in which extent will be comprised the river Moisy, the lake of the Kiches—

tigaux (lake Pletipi), the lake of the Naskapis (lake Ashuanipi), and other rivers and lakes which discharge therein.”

Now, my Lords, the lake Naskapis is the wine as lake Ashuanipi, which is shown on the green on the map.

Sir JOHN SIMON : It is treated as discharging into the Moisy.

Mr. MACMILLAN : But the point is : was any part of the green territory at the time in the hands of the King's Posts. Part of the territory claimed by my learned friend was actually part of the land which was in the King's domain, and actually with a post there.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : The line does seem. to be carried as far as the height of land.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : And Ashuanipi is only included because it is considered to discharge into the River Moisy.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes ; but your Lordship follows the point : These posts were up to that region, but the Indians who came to them came from beyond. There were Indians on the slope of the St. Lawrence ; but is it going to be suggested that the Indians did not come over from above that to trade at these posts ? What is the use of putting a post at the extreme limit, if there are no Indians to draw down to it. These posts are put inland, it is true, but they are put there for the purpose of attracting the Indians from the interior.

Viscount HALDANE : Do you say they came from Ungava

Bay ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : I do not know how far they came from, my Lord. They came from their hunting grounds, which apparently embraced practically the whole of this interior plateau.

Viscount HALDANE : Then the King's Domain extended right up. But there is no map which shows it.

Mr. MACMILLAN : We have drawn a map, but it is an ex parte map. It is Map No. 21, and, of course, it is open to the comment that it is a map which we have prepared.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I do not mind the Tribunal seeing it..

Mr. MACMILLAN : No ; it is one of the productions in the case, no doubt, but I prefer if possible to make my case on my opponents' documents, because it is always so much more satisfactory.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Your Lordships will see it later on.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is shown on Map 21, which is one of the Canadian maps ; I will show it to your Lordships. (Map produced). Here is what is shown as our conception of the Traite de Tadoussae—(indicating).

Viscount HALDANE : Does that show Ungava Bay ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, my Lord. That is our conception of what the Domaine du Roi was.

Viscount H ALDANE : About how far does that rise from the St. Lawrence ?

Mr. MACMILLAN: I will have that measured, my Lord. It is certainly goes well over the height of land. Here is the height of land line, at this point, and this part of it is above the height of land—(indicating). It is very debatable about there.

1 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : That plainly does not agree with Hocquart's Ordinance.

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, my Lord, it does not. Your Lordships will see the different posts marked there. And one must not leave out of sight also the fact that there was a ten league belt of land around each of them.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I do not know what this is. This does not include much of the green land.

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, my Lord, not much.

1 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Sir JOHN SIMON : If Ashuanipi was to drain into Moisy, in fact, would it include any ? I do not think it would.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I do not know. But my purpose is not to show that the King's posts were in the green ; my purpose is to show that there were posts there for the purpose of attracting people who were in the green. My real object is to show that posts were put there for the purpose of attracting people from the interior. It is not going to be suggested, I suppose, that these posts received only Indians living around those posts. These were foci, intended to attract the Indians. The Indians did not live in these posts at all ; they were for the purpose of getting the trade with the Indians, and therefore it is perfectly accurate to say that the sphere of influence is miles beyond the place where the post itself is situate. There is some indication of that in line 40 on page 3210, where there are orders forbidding others coming into this territory “ to trade, hunt, fish or carry on any commerce

Sir John Simon.

Mr. Macmillan.

under any pretext whatever, directly or indirectly, whether by themselves or by sending in merchandise, victuals, liquors, and ammunition, through friendly Indians, in any part of the country designated by our present ordinance, and generally any rivers or lakes the waters of which flow through the Saguenay river, and the river Moisy, though they may not be specially names in our said ordinance ; to treat the Indians who live in the same extent of country, or to draw them away in any manner, or even to approach within ten leagues of the limits above drawn in the lands, for the purpose of trading with the Indians or other establishments, without the express permission,” and so on.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I do not want to interrupt you, of course, because this is much too big a case ; but I dare say you would call attention to the reference to foreign Indians in line 39 on page 3210, just above where you were reading. Of course, this is a document in the time of the French regime, and it rather looks as if they were prohibited. It is a curious reference to foreign Indians. I did not want to interrupt you.

Mr, MACMILLAN : Oh, please, I am genuinely interested in the problem, and I want to get it all. Let me read it. It says this : “ We ordain that the said M. Pierre Carlier, his successors, fermiers of the western domain, their attorneys, clerks and foremen, continue to carry on alone, to the exclusion of all others, the trade, hunting and fishing, in the whole extent of the country, included within the limits above designated. We forbid all persons of whatever quality and condition, as well merchants as habitants of the colony, captains and masters of fishing-boats, bateaux and other vessels, the men employed to manage them and passengers, and all others whomsoever, even foreign Indians ”—these are the words.

Sir JOHN SIMON : That is what struck me.

1 Nov., 1926.

Mr. MACMILLAN: “ Even foreign Indians who do not reside in the lands of the Domaine, to trade, hunt, fish, or carry on any commerce under any pretext whatever, directly or indirectly, whether by themselves or by sending in merchandise, victuals, liquors, and ammunition, through friendly Indians, in any part of the country designated by our present ordinance, and generally in any rivers or lakes the water of which flow through the Saguenay river, and the river Moisy, though they may not be specially named in our said ordinance ; to treat the Indians who live in the same extent of country, or to draw them away in any manner, or even to approach within ten leagues of the limits above drawn in the lands, for the purpose of trading with the Indians or other establishments without the express permission in writing of the said Carlier, the lessees, his successors,” and so on.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord WARRINGTON : This is a concession to M. Carlier. Is not that what it is ?

3 O 2

p. 446

Viscount HALDANE : It is a monopoly.

Lord WARRINGTON : That is what I mean. It is a concession in the shape of a monopoly.

Sir JOHN SIMON : That is right.

Lord WARRINGTON : It begins : “ Having examined the petition presented to us by M. Pierre Carlier, Adjudicataire—General of the united farms,” and so on.

Lord HALDANE : It was given in 1733.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I think in its inception it was a monopoly. The history of it is that it constituted a royal monopoly ; and then it was let out to lessees—it was farmed out. That process continued for some time, and then it was abandoned again.

But, my Lords, pray do not misconceive my argument. What I am concerned with is to show, not necessarily that these posts were in the green area, but that these were posts which were established for dealing, among others, with the Indians in the green area to whom I am referring.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Foreign Indians.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I have been giving your Lordships, with regard to this matter of the King's Posts, some reference to what Murray said, and I think I might also refer to page 2766. I read the passage about the lands of the domain, and I need not read that again, but would your Lordships just take a reference also to Cabot's description of this place. That is in Volume V at page 2651. It is enough to draw attention to it as showing the distinction. This is an important book. I am not going to ask your Lordships to delay over it, but merely to take the reference to it, because I am told that this is an author of some authority, and he gives you a description of the Indian families at the back of the country and the Esquimeaux on the shore.

1 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount HALDANE : This is Hesketh Prichard. Is he quoting him ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : I have given your Lordships the reference to Hesketh Prichard. I am now quoting Cabot.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : He describes the warfare between the Esquimaux and the mountaineers. That is rather curious.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord. There is a great deal of evidence of that. They fought, apparently, constantly ; it was a hereditary feud between the men of the sea and the men of the mountains.

p. 447

My learned friend read a few affidavits as being of importance, or at least of some importance. I have a few statements also, and perhaps your Lordships might look at one of them which is in Volume VIII at page 3739, for what it is worth. This is a statement of one Raoul Thevenet, and he says : “ I am the manager of the fur trading post of Revillon Freres Trading Co. Ltd., which is situated at the mouth of the Northwest River in Lake Melville,”—so, of course, we are right in the green. “ This post was established in 1901 for the purpose of trading in furs with the Montagnais and Nascaupée Indians but more particularly with the former, sometimes called the Gulf of St. Lawrence Indians, which we knew were ‘ hunting ’ in the country in and about Lake Melville and its tributary rivers. I took charge of the post in 1909. (2) Re Indian Trade : The Indians with whom we trade are mostly Montagnais. We see also a few Nascaupées but only a few families make North West River their headquarters.”—Your Lordships see now why I said that the Nascaupées did not resort there to the same extent.—“ All the others, the Montagnais, come from St. Augustine, Mingan, Seven Islands and Nascarow, on the Gulf of St. Lawrence. These we see only during the winter months.”

Lord WARRINGTON : Then they come north.

Mr. MACMILLAN : You will see in a moment, my Lord. I do not think it means that these are people who are in Mingan, that is to say, Indians at Mingan, but I think it means people who resorted to these places. But we will read it.

Sir JOHN SIMON : None of those are in the green.

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, none of them are in the green. It says this : “ These we see only in the winter months when they come out to replenish their provisions, it being too far for them to go and come back to and from their original trading posts to their hunting grounds in the same season. The territory at and around North West River as far as Hopedale towards the coast has been the best of the Indian hunting ground for generations past, but these last few years the so-called Natives (half-breeds) and Newfoundlanders have been making a regular business of trapping, some of them having as many as three to six hundred traps set during the hunting season. In doing this they have overrun the Indian hunting grounds. The Indians are continually complaining to me about the matter, for, as hunting is their only means of living, they are getting poorer every year. Indeed, but for the relief which has been given them at the expense of the Government of Canada, some of them would surely have starved. They are becoming very bitter against the white trappers and any year trouble may break out. No relief whatever has been given to the Indians by the Newfoundland Government. The North West River Posts get only a small share of the Indian fur trade ; by far the largest part goes to the posts on the Gulf of St. Lawrence.”

p. 448

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount HALDANE : I should like to see just for a moment the course of the North West River. Is it on your map ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord. It is at Lake Melville.

Lord WARRINGTON : It runs into Lake Melville.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord.

Viscount HALDANE : It runs into Lake Melville, and so goes down into the Atlantic.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord. “ The North West River Posts get only a small share of the Indian fur trade ; by far the largest part goes to the posts on the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Perhaps this is accounted for, in a large measure, by the fact that the Indians for generations past have been devout Roman Catholics and have been in the habit of going out each year to the Gulf posts to meet the priest in charge of the Missions which have been long established at these posts. In former times, a Roman Catholic priest from Quebec used to visit North West River ”—this is rather significant—“ and for some time there was a Roman Catholic Mission here ; but for some reason unknown to me the priest discontinued his visits about thirty years ago, telling the Indians to meet him thereafter at the Missions on the Gulf.” So that these people were in the habit of going either to the Gulf of St. Lawrence or to the North West River, according as they thought fit, but they were the people of the interior, and accordingly the people who had hunting grounds in this territory. These are the Catholics with regard to whom the Governor of Newfoundland is placed in the awkward position of (I suppose) persecuting them, because he is to give no tolerance to Papists.

Lord SUMNER : Does that continue ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : We are dealing here solely with 1763, as I am so frequently told by my learned friend.

Lord SUMNER : Do you know when that disappeared ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : I do not know, my Lord, but it must have disappeared early in the nineteenth century. I think the Catholic emancipation legislation was about 1825, or somewhere about then.

Viscount FINLAY : Is that construed as applying to Roman Catholics who came there merely as visitors for the purposes of trade ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Your Lordship has misapprehended my point, I think. This is a Roman Catholic population who practise the rites of the Roman Catholic Church, and they see the Priest when they go there to trade, and then they go back ; but these Catholics are put under a Governor who is not to extend tolerance to Papists, if my learned friend is right.

Now there is another rather good statement of the same kind by Mr. W. Ewing on page 3736 in the same volume. I content myself with giving the reference.

Now I am going to pass from this question of the Indians. It seems to be a controversial topic, and the question between us is quite a simple one. When the Proclamation of 1763 was framed, did it, or did it not, reserve in the language of reservation to the Indians any part of the green territory ? That is the problem. My submission is that I have shown, contrary to my learned friend's submission, that that proclamation did refer to an Indian reservation in this district.

Viscount HALDANE : Before you pass wholly away from Ewing's document, I see at the bottom of page 3736 he says : " These Indians now come from Ungava (their headquarters) to Davis Inlet and from there get enough grub to enable them to resume their hunting back to Ungava." It looks as if they crossed the height of land.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I am afraid that they did not think much of the height of land in those days. There is no doubt that they roamed over the whole of the interior plateau.

I am sure that your Lordships have noted in passing the significant omission on page 156 of Volume I. When the King declares it to be his " royal will and pleasure, for the present as aforesaid, to reserve under our sovereignty, protection, and dominion, for the use of the said Indians " certain lands and territories, he describes them as " all the land and territories not included within the limits of our said three new governments, or within the limits of the territory granted to the Hudson's Bay Company." That is to say, the lands and territories not included within the limits of Quebec, or within the limits granted to the Hudson's Bay Company. The strange thing is this : If Newfoundland was seated in this region as well as the Hudson's Bay Company and the Quebec Government, why did he not also say " or within the territory which I have assigned to the Government of Newfoundland " ?

Mr. Macmillan.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : That is what troubles me. I thought it was common ground that something was annexed to Newfoundland.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I think the explanation is quite simple, my Lord. At least, I should not say that anything is quite simple in this case, but the explanation I think is at least a tenable one, and it is this, that if I am right, the Governor of Newfoundland had a coastal jurisdiction, and no concern with the Indians at all. He was concerned, if you please, with Esquimaux, whom he encountered in connection with the fishing, but he had no concern with Indians at all ; and my submission keeps him to the coast, keeps him to a territory where, as that map shows, there were no Indians at all, but there were Esquimaux, a different class of people altogether. Therefore I have accounted for the situation quite satisfactorily. The omission is intelligible in my view, because no Esquimaux territory was reserved to the Indians, but it is unintelligible upon my learned friend's hypothesis.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : You read this as meaning that all the lands and territories are reserved to the Indians, not included in the limits of the three governments ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : That suggestion is attractive, if I may say so respectfully, and it rather links itself up with what one may call the preamble at the top of the page, where it says : “ And whereas it is just and reasonable and essential to our interest and the security of our colonies, that the several nations or tribes of Indians with whom we are connected, and who live under our protection, should not be molested or disturbed in the possession of such parts of our dominions and territories, as, not having been ceded to or purchased by us, are reserved to them as their hunting-grounds.” That suggestion, which your Lordship was good enough to make, rather links itself with that, they are thinking of Indian territory.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I am trying to understand what your argument was. I did not want to make a suggestion of my own.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I quite understand. On my view, there you have an intelligible view, it was riot necessary to exclude the lands handed to Newfoundland, because they were not, on my hypothesis, Indian lands.

From that topic I pass now to what is a matter of importance for my case in this connection, that is the question of the Hudson's Bay Territory. I had indicated to your Lordships my learned friend's two main contentions were as I conceive them the green area is all mine, for two reasons, first, there are no Indians in it to whom the Proclamation applies, and therefore there is no separate piece of territory to be accounted for, secondly, the green area east of the Hudson's Bay boundary is all mine, and there is no gap there, the boundary of Newfoundland and Hudson's Bay are coincident boundaries and that boundary is the height of land.

May I ask your Lordship's examination of that topic for a moment. The suggestion offered to your Lordships then is that after the Commission and Proclamation of 1763 the boundaries of Newfoundand and the Hudson's Bay Company were coincident boundaries and the frontier was the height of land from Cape Chidley following the blue line southwards. That is the submission. These two Territories were then exhaustive in that region of all the Governments or jurisdictions or whatever one likes to call them, and my learned friend's argument culminated as my Lord may remember in his consideration of the Hudson's Bay Committee Report in 1857. Now, my Lord, would you kindly turn, because this is a little important, to the passages where my learned friend dealt with this matter, which are to be found on pages 224 to 230 of his address.

1 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

p. 451

Viscount HALDANE : We have not got the printed proceedings before us.

Mr. MACMILLAN : They are available.

The LORD CHANCELLOR, : I think we should follow it the better if through that medium you refer us to the documents which Sir John referred to.

Mr. MACMILLAN : If your Lordship pleases. The argument culminates in a passage as follows about line 30. My learned friend had been expounding the Select Committee's Report of 1857, and had been indicating its importance to your Lordship, and in particular you may remember he brought some most interesting original documents, opinions of Law Officers and so on, under your Lordship's notice, and I think the matter came really to a point in the comments of my Lord Warrington of Clyffe at page 229 where my Lord was good enough to say this, addressing Sir John : " It comes to this. The House of Commons in 1857 accepted the claim made by the Hudson's Bay Company in the letter of the 8th June 1850." This was how my learned friend formulated the position to you, my learned friend replied : " Yes ; and they say they did so having before them the opinion of the Law Officers." My Lord, I confess in my simplicity what I took from that question and answer was this, that if I went to the Hudson's Bay Select Committee's Report I would find two things, first, that the Committee passed upon the subject of the Hudson's Bay boundary, and came to a conclusion upon it in the sense my friend indicates, namely, that the height of land was the boundary of Hudson's Bay. I further took from that statement this inference that they did so in reliance upon the opinion of the Law Officers before them, which law officers my learned friend has indicated were Sir John Jervis and Sir John Romilly. At page 225 he refers to " The Law Officers of the Crown who were not consulted for some years afterwards but whose opinion was actually before the House of Commons Committee in 1857, being Sir John Jervis, Attorney General and Sir John Romilly, Solicitor General.” And he says at page 225, line 30 : “ In 1857 at any rate, the House of Commons Committee, without any sort of question, took the boundary of the Hudson's Bay Company as being the height of land.” And there are other references and also an indication of who the Law Officers were. I have before me a copy of the opinion of Sir John Jervis and Sir John Romilly who were the Law Officers in the year 1850. And at the foot of page 227 he says : “ We have here the material which was submitted, and the material is the other opinion, the opinion, of Sir Samuel Romilly and his colleagues. Perhaps it would be inferesting[sic] to see the originals.” I assumed therefore if I examined this Report to which I was directed I would find these two things. I have examined the Report and I am now going to ask my Lords to consider it a little carefully because I propose to establish to your Lordships' satisfaction two propositions on this, first of all, that the Select Committee never passed their imprimatur on the height of land as the boundary of Hudson's Bay at all, and, secondly, that the opinion of the Law Officers to which they allude was not the opinion of Sir John Jervis and Sir John Romilly at all, but was another opinion, and I undertake to demonstrate both of these matters from the Report itself. The Report, my Lord, is commendably brief, it occupies two pages.

p. 452

Viscount HALDANE : What year was it ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : 1857, it is dated the 31st July, 1857, and it is the Report of a Select Committee appointed to consider the state of those British Possessions in North America which are under—

Viscount HALDANE : What Government was that ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : I cannot say my Lord. My learned friend, Sir John Simon, suggests it was Lord Aberdeen, but I am not sure.

Lord WARRINGTON : That was the year of the Indian Mutiny.

Mr. MACMILLAN : We can easily find it.

Viscount HALDANE : I will find it in “ Whitaker.”

Mr. MACMILLAN : I observe my Lord Chancellor has the actual Report before him. Perhaps my Lord will be good enough to follow my comment with the text before him. This is : “ The Report of The Select Committee appointed to consider the state of those British Possessions in North America which are under the Administration of the Hudson's Bay Company, or over which they possess a License to Trade, and who were empowered to report their Observations, together with the Minutes of Evidence taken before them, to The House : Have considered the matters to them referred, and have agreed to the following Report.”

Mr. Macmillan.

Now, my Lord, for my purpose, of course, it would be my duty to read the whole of this Report, the two pages of the Report, in order to demonstrate that they came to no finding at all on the height of land, but I do not propose to do that if your Lordships will take it from me, and the Lord Chancellor will check it from me, I find from beginning to end of their Report no finding upon this subject at all—none.

What I do find on the other hand is certain interesting information which I shall show is entirely counter to my learned friend's submission. Paragraph 3 of the Report runs thus : “ Your Committee have received much valuable evidence on these and other subjects connected with the Inquiry which has been entrusted to them, and especially have had the advantage of hearing the statements of Chief Justice Draper, who was commissioned by the Government of Canada to watch this Inquiry. In addition to this, Your Committee have received the evidence taken before a Committee of the Legislative Assembly, appointed to investigateur this subject, containing much valuable information in reference to the interests and feelings of that important Colony, which are entitled to the greatest weight on this occasion.” Then comes the passage on which my learned friend relied. “ Your Committee have also had the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown communicated to them on various points connected with the Charter of the Hudson's Bay Company.”

My Lord, I confess I assumed from that that that was the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, being Sir John Jervais and Sir John Romilly. I am sure, I am in your Lordship's judgment, that was the impression your Lordships formed also, but it was not so. The Committee consulted the Law Officers.

Viscount HALDANE : I want to see who were the Law Officers.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I have got their names, Mr. Bethell, as he then was, and Mr. Keating. This is a very important point, I pray your Lordships will take the references to this passage in Article 4, because it has a most intimate bearing on my learned friend's whole argument.

Viscount HALDANE : It was Sir Richard Bethell and Sir John Romilly.

Mr. MACMILLAN : You will see that when I bring you to the Law Officers' Opinion in a moment. If you will be good enough to turn in the Report to page 402 in the Appendix to the Hudson's Bay Report, here is the Opinion. It was given by the Law Officers of the Crown, on the instructions of Mr. Secretary Labouchere, and you will see there a letter addressed from Mr. Merivale, I suppose he must have been the Secretary to the Committee, to the Attorney-General and the Solicitor-General, with enclosure. He says he is directed by Mr. Secretary Labouchere.

Viscount FINLAY : What is the date of this letter ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : 1857, it was during the period of the investigations they were making, the 9th June, 1857 ; “ I am directed by Mr. Secretary Labouchere to transmit to you, jointly with you (Solicitor-General—Attorney-General) copies of two despatches from the Governor of Canada enclosing the copy of a Minute of his Executive Council, and and[sic] extract from another Minute of the same, in reference to the questions respecting the affairs of the Hudson's Bay Company, now under investigation by a Committee of the House of Commons. You will observe from the former of the Minutes that the Executive Council suggest, on the part of Canada, a territorial claim over a considerable extent of country, which is also claimed by the Hudson's Bay Company, as owners of the soil, and with rights of Government and exclusive trade under their Charter. You will observe by the annexed Parliamentary Papers of 12th. July, 1850, that the 'Statement' of the Hudson's Bay Company's rights as to territory, trade, taxation, and government, made by them to Earl Grey, as Secretary for the Colonies, on the 13th. September 1849, was submitted to the then Law Officers of the Crown who reported that they were of opinion that the rights so claimed by the Company, properly belonged to them ; but suggest, at the same time, a mode of testing those claims by Petition to Her Majesty, which might be referred to the Judicial Committee. I am further to annex a Parliamentary Return made in 1842, containing the charter of the Company, and documents relating thereto ; and another of 23rd. April, 1849, containing amongst other papers an Act of 2nd. William & Mary, ' for confirming to the Governor and Company to Hudson's Bay their privileges and trade.' The rights so claimed by the Company have been repeatedly questioned since 1850, by private persons in correspondence with the Secretary of State, and are now questioned to a certain extent, as appears by these despatches, by the present Local Government of Canada. I am to request that you will, jointly with (Solicitor-General—Attorney-General) take these papers into your consideration and report.—Whether you think that the Crown can lawfully and constitutionally raise, for legal decision, all or either of the following questions :—The Validity at the present day of the Charter itself ”—that is the Hudson's Bay Charter—“ The Validity of the several claims of territorial rights, of government, exclusive trade, and taxation, insisted on by the Company. The geographical extent of this territorial claim (supposing it to be well-founded, to any extent). If you are of opinion that the Crown can do so, you are requested further to state the proper steps to be taken, in your opinion, by the Crown, and the proper tribunal to be resorted to ; and whether the Crown should act on behalf of the Local Government of Canada, as exercising a delegated share of the Royal authority, or in any other way.” This was the invitation of the Select Committee on Hudson's Bay matters to the Law Officers of the Crown, to advise them upon these matters communicated by their Secretary to Mr. Attorney-General and Mr. Solicitor-General of the day, and there follows on pages 403 and 404 the Opinion of the Law Officers, being the Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown referred to in their Report. One would have expected in view of the submissions of my learned friend that one would have found the Law Officers of the Crown saying the boundary of Hudson's Bay is without doubt the height of land. That is what one would have assumed. What they do say, on page 404, after dealing with the questions of the validity of the Charter itself, because this was often in question because of its vagueness, is : “ The remaining subject of consideration is the question of the geographical extent of the territory granted by the Charter, and whether its boundaries can in any and what manner be ascertained. In the case of grants of considerable age, such as this Charter, when the words, as is often the case, are indefinite or

Sir John Simon.

ambiguous, the rule is, that they are construed by usage and enjoyment, including in these latter terms the assertion of ownership by the Company on important public occasions, such as the Treaties of Ryswick and Utrecht, and again in 1750. To these elements of consideration upon this question must be added the inquiry (as suggested by the following words of the Charter, viz. : ‘ not possessed by the subject, of any other Christian Prince or State ’), whether, at the time of the Charter, any part of the territory now claimed by the Hudson's Bay Company could have been rightfully claimed by the French, as falling within the boundaries of Canada or Nouvelle France, and also the effect of the Acts of Parliament passed in 1774 and 1791. Under these circumstances, we cannot but feel that the important question of the boundaries of the territory of the Hudson's Bay Company, might with great utility, as between the Company and Canada, be made the subject of a quasi-judicial inquiry. But this cannot be done except by the consent of the parties, namely, Canada and the Hudson's Bay Company, nor would the decision of a Committee of the Privy Council have any effect as a binding judicial determination. But if the Hudson's Bay Company agreed to the proposal of the Chief Justice of Canada, that the question of boundaries should be referred to the Privy Council, it being further understood by both parties, that the determination of the Council shall be carried into effect by a declaratory Act of Parliament, we think the proceedings would be the best mode of determining that which is, or ought to be, the only real subject of controversy.”

Mr. Macmillan.

That is the opinion of the Law Officers to which allusion is made in the Report. I am sure my learned friend must have been in error when he suggested what I think we all assumed, that the Opinion in question was the Opinion of Sir John Jervis and Sir John Romilly.

1 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I am much obliged to my friend. Of course, I had not appreciated this, else I would have told the Board ; at the same time, as we are clearing it up, let us clear it up completely. I notice that the letter which was addressed to the Attorney-General and Solicitor-General, which I venture to think is not from the Secretary of the Committee, it was from some Government Department, I am not sure, but I notice it begins by saying : “ You will observe by the annexed Parliamentary Papers of 12th. July, 1850, that the ‘ statement ’ of the Hudson's Bay Company's rights as to territory, trade, taxation, and Government, made by them to Earl Grey, as Secretary for the Colonies, on the 13th. September, 1849, was submitted to the then Law Officers of the Crown.”

Mr. Macmillan.

That document, subject to my friend's correction, included the Opinion of Sir Samuel Romilly, Mr. Cruise and all the rest of them.

Mr. MACMILLAN : My friend is really doing me rather an injustice. I was going to come to that in a moment ; it is the next matter in the note that was before them, but my point now is the question whether the

p. 456

The Lord Chancellor.

Opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown referred to in the Report is the Opinion of Sir John Jervis and Sir John Romilly.

Sir JOHN SIMON : My friend has made his point perfectly right, but I thought from his manner and peroration, he was passing from it. It appears that Sir John Jervis's Opinion was before Sir Richard Bethell at the time.

Sir John Simon.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is all coming.

Viscount HALDANE : Does it matter whether it was Sir Richard Bethell or Sir John Jervis ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : It matters vitally to my friend, because he invoked this as being the Opinion of the Law Officers which said the height of land was the boundary, therefore he was able to say he had the Opinion of a Committee of the House of Commons, confirmed by the Opinion of the Law Officers at the time, that the height of land was the boundary.

Mr. Macmillan.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : If this recital is correct, then the Law Officers, to whom this statement was submitted, did confirm it, not these two, not Bethell and Romilly, but the earlier Law Officers referred to.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, I was going to bring it out in a moment.

Lord Sumner.

Sir JOHN SIMON : May I put myself right, because Mr. Macmillan is correcting a statement which one might well be supposed to have intended to make. I want to be quite fair about it, I am not saying my friend has not thrown new light upon the matter, but allow me to say the important point is not that some Law Officers have expressed an Opinion, but that the House of Commons Committee sat and when they published their Report, they did as a matter of fact, as far as I appreciate, not throw any doubt on the area so far as their report was concerned. There may be material which my friend has got which shows they did, but that is my point.

1 Nov., 1926.

Lord Sumner.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is a little different from the statement that the House of Commons without any sort of question took the boundary of the Hudson's Bay Company as being the height of land, and did so, having before them the Opinion of the Law Officers. I may have drawn a wrong inference from what my learned friend said, but I confess in my simplicity I had no difficulty at all.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord SUMNER : It sounds like this, that two Law Officers under some circumstances agreed, and I do not know how many other Counsel advised it, that the Hudson's Bay Company's boundary was the height of land. Then the House of Commons, having that amongst other learned

p. 457

Opinions before them, of course, they had further Opinions before them, did not say they agreed, but they did not say they disagreed. The last state of the matter was that Mr. Bethell and Mr. Keating said the best thing was, if they consented, to remit this dubious question to a quasi-judicial authority, and that does not seem to have been done.

Mr. MACMILLAN : There is a good deal more to come.

Lord SUMNER : It is only to see if I follow you as far as you have got.

Mr. MACMILLAN : As far as I have got I have got this, I am in search of two things, a statement in their report that they had passed upon this subject and come to a conclusion. Your Lordship is quite right, the report is blank upon the subject. Secondly, I was in search of the opinion of the Law Officers which they say they had before them. This is the opinion of the Law Officers. I was now going to point out to your Lordships the history of the position. It is quite true that the Law Officers referred to in the Report, when the papers were before them to advise, had their attention drawn to the fact that the previous Law Officers in 1850 had expressed that opinion, but that was not the opinion which was before this Committee. The opinion of 1850 was brought to the notice of the Law Officers who advised this Committee, and the significance of it to my mind is this, that the Law Officers who advised this Committee, did not say the matter is clear and the boundary is the height of land, but they said the matter is quite in a different position. They suggested other methods of ascertaining what was the boundary and they said that : " In the case of grants of considerable age, such as this Charter, when the words, as is often the case, are indefinite or ambiguous, the Rule is, that they are construed by usage and enjoyment, including in these latter terms the assertion of ownership by the Company on important public occasions, such as the Treaties of Ryswick and Utrecht, and again in 1750." In short so far from subscribing to the view that the height of land was the boundary of the Hudson's Bay territory, now a generally accepted boundary, as to which there need be no question, the learned Law Officers of the day consulted by this Committee, said nothing of the sort, they said on the contrary, having before them the opinion of their predecessors of 1850 upon which my friend relied, and which he thought was the opinion upon which this Committee acted, they said there are quite a number of considerations to be kept in view in determining where the boundary is and we think it is a fit matter for the Privy Council, but the topic may be pursued a little further, and I propose to do that. They did allude also in their report to Chief Justice Draper's statement which they say they have had the advantage of hearing.

Viscount FINLAY : I only want to see to what point we have got[sic] As I understand it you say you have now shown that this had no bearing, it left the question entirely open about the effect of the height of land.

p. 458

Lord Warrington.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, in 1857 entirely, and my learned friend was very naturally misled because he thought this Committee had before them an opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown saying there was no doubt about the height of land ; whereas the Law Officers of the Crown who they consulted reported in the sense I have indicated. It is quite true these Law Officers had before them the opinion of their predecessors.

Mr. Macmillan.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Which is recited in the opinion they had before them.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I know.

Viscount HALDANE : Tell us how it was on your theory that the Hudson's Bay Company got established the reputation of the boundary up to the height of land ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : The history of that is most interesting and was quite accurately told to your Lordships by Sir John Simon.

Lord WARRINGTON: Is not really for our purpose the question not what the boundary was in 1857 of the Hudson's Bay Company, but what in 1763 the parties regarded as the territory of the Hudson's Bay Company.

Mr. MACMILLAN : My Lord, I can only deal with my learned friend's argument in detail, but your Lordship may remember great emphasis was placed by Newfoundland on this matter. I am surely not to be debarred from showing that he is not entitled to any aid from this at all, because it is all based on a misapprehension. May I most humbly subscribe to your doctrine, I think 1763 is the important thing, but I am coming to that in a moment. I must first of all dislodge my friend on one front, I cannot deal with all fronts at the same time.

Viscount FINLAY : What at present you are contending is that what happened was the matter was left entirely open at that time.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, entirely open. Would your Lordships pass to what Chief Justice Draper said, this was before this Committee. First of all there is his oral testimony at page 212, if your Lordships would look at one paragraph. This is the person whom they referred to, they had the special advantage of hearing him as the Agent of Canada : “ Taking the points in the order in which you have mentioned them, first of all, with regard to the question of the limits of the province of Canada, are there any statements which you wish to lay before the Committee on that head ?—I should say with regard to that point that the view which is taken, be it sound or unsound, is this : at present it is understood by us that the Hudson's Bay Company claim as a legal right all the land which is drained by any streams, no matter how remote their sources may be, which flow into either the Hudson's Bay Straits, or Hudson's Bay. We consider that that is an ill-founded claim, principally upon this ground that it is a claim of which we can find no trace until a very modern period and is quite inconsistent with the claim advanced by that Company for nearly a century and a half. To save time I have prepared extracts from various documents, emanating from the Company themselves, with some few other documents ; it is a paper which it would save a great deal of time to put in, because I can give every place where the extracts are taken from, and therefore reference to the original documents can always be had. I would also desire to say that in every extract which I have made, I have made it a complete extract of all that is stated on the question, and if it involves anything favourable to the Hudson's Bay Company, it will be found in those positions, of which I have made the extract." This was a Judge, who although my friend reminds me was representing Canada, was a person who investigated the whole topic for himself.

Viscount HALDANE : Was he Chief Justice of the United Province ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : He was Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas in Upper Canada. Now, my Lords, we have the advantage of his statement, which you will find in the appendix at page 347, and it is a very valuable memorandum prepared by the Chief Justice on the whole subject. May I just refer—one must not delay too long over this—to page 378 where, having canvassed the whole topic, and he professes to have looked at it judicially by putting in everything pro and con, this is what he says : “ Enough, it is hoped has been stated to show that the limits of the Hudson's Bay Company's territory are as open to question now as they have ever been, and that when called upon to define them in the last century, they did not advance ”—and this bears directly upon my Lord Warrington of Clyffe's point, the question of 1763 “ was not advanced until the time that the Company took the opinions of the late Sir Samuel Romilly, Messrs. Cruise, Holroyd, Scarlett and Bell ” ; that is the imposing but inadequately remunerated team to which my learned friend referred. “ Without presuming in the slightest degree to question the high authority of the eminent men above named, it may be observed that Sir Arthur Pigott, Serjeant Spankie, Sir Vicary Gibbs, Mr. Bearcroft and Mr. (now Lord) Brougham took a widely different view of the legal validity of the Charter, as well as regards the indefinite nature of the territorial grant, as in other important particulars. Of the very serious bearing of this question on the interests of Canada, there can be no doubt," and so on he goes. Then the great question is : How shall we have it settled ? Shall we have a Privy Council case upon it ? This is Chief Justice Draper, and there is the opinion which, as my learned friend most justly

p. 460

said in his address, was the foundation of the height of land. Is that right, Sir John ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : I do not think so.

Sir John Simon.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Then I will withdraw that statement, I will put it differently. There is the opinion of Sir Samuel Romilly and his confreres to which my learned friend alluded and in which he found the height of land accepted by these learned persons as the boundary of Hudson's Bay. That was the first assertion of it, and that was what date ? 1814. We are dealing with 1763 my Lords. That is what the Chief Justice says on the subject, and that is his Report and statement referred to by the Committee as " the valuable evidence which they had from Chief Justice Draper." My Lords, I have looked up these other opinions which were obtained at the same time as Sir Samuel Romilly was consulted, and my learned friend gave you Sir Samuel Romilly's opinion, your Lordships will remember he produced it at the Bar of your Lordships' Board. I am afraid the discoveries after all are not so very novel, because I find that the whole of these documents were before your Lordships' Board in the Manitoba case, and are all printed there, all of them, including the original of Sir Samuel Romilly's opinion ; therefore, I am afraid we cannot claim originality in getting new documents to put before the Privy Council. because every one of them is there for a reason which will appear shortly. The Opinion of Sir Samuel Romilly of the 10th June, 1814, is in the Manitoba Appendix before the Board at page 47 ; that is the Opinion, and here is the material part of it.

Mr. Macmillan.

Sir JOHN SIMON: I do not know whether it is convenient to your Lordships or whether my learned friend would see any objection, but thinking that someone might possibly like to see the Case and Opinion we have had some copies printed.

Mr. MACMILLAN: Of course, I am delighted if you can help in any way.

1 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Sir JOHN SIMON: I am quite indifferent whether they are handed in.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It cannot all be in that.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Here is the Case.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Unfortunately, my Lords, there are two or three paginations, because there is, first of all, the Joint Appendix, then there is the Appendix for Ontario first, and then the Manitoba Appendix.

Viscount FINLAY : What is this : the Manitoba Report ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : These are the papers that were before the Privy

p. 461

Council. This is called, “ Copy Queries and Opinion of Mr. Justice Holroyd, Sir Samuel Romilly, Mr. Cruise. Mr. Scarlett and Mr. Bell.” The matter is dealt with very shortly, but none the less emphatically by these learned gentlemen in the sense that my learned friend stated to you. The first question is: “ Whether any objection can be made to the grant of the soil contained in the Charter, and whether the grant will include all the country the waters of which run into Hudson's Bay, as ascertained by geographical observation”; now that is the height of land.

Viscount FINLAY : This is the Charter of the Hudson's Bay Company ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : This is the case put by the Hudson's Bay Company before these learned persons.

Viscount FINLAY : But the Charter there referred to is their Charter ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, of 1670. That is the question put, and that is the plain question : Have we territory up to the height of land ? and the answer is : We are of opinion that the grant of the soil contained in the Charter is good, and that it will include all the country the waters of which run into Hudson's Bay, as ascertained by geographical observation.” So that my learned friend was quite right when he said that these learned persons, consulted in 1814 and being invited to say whether the grant included up to the height of land, said that it would include it.

Viscount HALDANE : Treating it as the watershed.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Treating, it as synonymous with that, my Lord. The Opinion of Sir Arthur Pigott, Lord Brougham and the others is in the Ontario Appendix at page 153.

Viscount HALDANE : Who took that opinion ? the other was the Hudson's Bay Company.

1 Nov., 1926.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Probably it would be the North West Company of Montreal, the rivals of the Hudson's Bay Company,[sic] This is a very much longer Opinion, but I do not know that it is any the better on that account. It is dated 1816 and it deals, of course, at great length with the question of whether the grant contained in the Hudson's Bay Charter was good at all.

Lord SUMNER : Who are the Counsel ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Sir Arthur Pigott. Mr. Spankie and Lord Brougham.

Mr. Macmillan.

3 Q 2

p. 462

Viscount FINLAY: Who was Sir Arthur Pigott; what was he afterwards ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : I cannot say, my Lord.

Viscount FINLAY : There was a Baron Pigott whom I remember very well ; I only wanted to know who this is.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I cannot say.

Viscount FINLAY : Mr. Spankie was afterwards Serjeant Spankie.

Mr. MACMILLAN : This was in 1816, after the Hudson's Bay Company had obtained their advice in the sense that they desired ; this Opinion was taken and is largely devoted to the question whether the grant is good at all. Then they say at page 154: " We think that the Hudson's Bay Company and their grantee, Lord Selkirk, have extended their territorial plains much farther than the Charter or any sound construction of it will warrant," and they say at page 155: " It is plain, therefore, that the Territorial grant was not intended to comprehend all the lands and territories that might be approached through Hudson's Straits by land or water. The Territorial grant then appears to be limited by the relation and proximity of the territories to Hudson's Straits."

The LORD CHANCELLOR : This is rather interesting.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Shall I read it on, my Lord ?

The LORD CHANCELLOR : A little further, if you would.

Mr. MACMILLAN : " The general description applying to the whole, is the seas, etc., that lie within Hudson's Straits, and the land, etc., upon the country's coasts and confines of the seas, etc., that is reddendo singula singulis, the lands upon the countries, coasts, and confines of each of the seas, rivers, etc., naturally including such a portion of territory as might be reasonably necessary for the objects in view ; but it is not a grant of all the lands and territories in which the seas, rivers, etc., lie or are situated, or which surround them to any indefinite extent or distance from them. Still less is it a grant of all the lands and territories lying between the seas, straits, rivers, etc., though many hundred or thousand miles or leagues of land and territories might lie between one sea, strait, river, lake, etc., and another sea, strait, river, lake, etc., and though the quantity of land comprised in this interior situation and far distant from any coast or confine of the specified waters, might exceed in dimensions the extent of many existing powerful Kingdoms or States. Within the Straits, must mean such proximity to the straits as would give the lands spoken of a sort of affinity or relation to the Hudson's Straits and not such lands as, from their immense distance (in this case the nearest point to Hudson's Bay being 790 miles, and from thence extending to a distance of 1,500 miles from it) have no such geographical affinity or relation to the straits, but which are not even approached by the Canadians through or by the Straits in question. The whole grant contemplates the straits as the access to the lands and territories therein referred to ; and, as there is no boundary specified, except by the description of the coasts and confines of the places mentioned, that is the coasts and confines of the seas, etc., within the straights such a boundary must be implied as is consistent with that view, and with the professed objects of a Trading Company, intending, not to found Kingdoms, and establish States, but to carry on fisheries in those waters, and to trade and traffic for the acquisition of skins and peltries, and the other articles mentioned in the Charter; and in such a long tract of time as nearly 150 years, now elapsed since the grant of the Charter, it must now be, and must indeed long since have been, fully ascertained, by the actual occupation of the Hudson's Bay Company, what portion or portions of lands and territories in the vicinity and on the coasts and confines of the waters mentioned and described within the straits, they have found necessary for their purposes, and for forts, factories, towns, villages, settlements or other such establishments, in such vicinity, and on such coasts and confines, as pertain and belong to a Company instituted for the purposes mentioned in their Charter; and necessary, useful, or convenient to them within the prescribed limits for the prosecution of those purposes. The enormous extensions of land and territory now claimed appears, therefore, to us not to be warranted by any sound construction of the Charter ; if it could be so, we do not know where the land and territory of the Hudson's Bay Company, granted by this Charter, terminated, nor what are the parts of this vast Continent, on which they have taken upon them to grant 116,000 miles of territory, exempted from their proprietorship under their Charter.”

Mr. Macmillan.

p. 463

Lord WARRINGTON : Who are the signatories to this ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Sir Arthur Pigott, Mr. Spankie and Mr. Brougham.

Viscount HALDANE : It is said that it is interpretative.

Mr. MACMILLAN : You have now, I think, got the three Opinions ; and may we just range them in their order : 1814 Sir Samuel Romilly and others had given a decided opinion that the claim to the height of lands put forward by the Hudson Bay Company then was a good claim. The Law Officers of the day, 1850, said with equal emphasis that they agreed. That Opinion is in the joint Appendix of Ontario and Canada on page 26 ; I will read the words in order that my learned friend may have the advantage of the full emphasis of the matter.

Sir John Simon.

Mr. Macmillan.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Without troubling you to trace it I am sure you will agree with me they had before them, as a matter of fact, the early Opinion.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I was going to show that in a moment, if I may, I think the whole matter on this occasion will be quite fully put forward. On page 26 of the Joint Appendix, this is rather interesting, there is a letter from Sir John Jervis, and Sir John Romilly to Earl Grey, and this is the opinion which my learned friend thought was the opinion of the Law Officers referred to in the Report of the Select Committee : “

We were honoured with your Lordship's commands contained in Mr. Hawes's letter of the 30th October last, in which he stated that he was directed by your Lordship to transmit to us the copy of a Resolution of the House of Commons, that an Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that measures may be taken for ascertaining the legality of the powers which are claimed or exercised by the Hudson's Bay Company on the Continent of North America. Mr. Hawes then stated that he was to enclose the copy of a letter from the Chairman of the Hudson's Bay Company, together with a statement and map, prepared under his direction, of the territories claimed by the Company in virtue of the charter granted to them by King Charles II.” I omit a passage or two then, and go on, “ In obedience to your Lordship's command, we have taken these papers into our consideration, and have the honour to report, that, having regard to the powers in respect of territory, trade, taxation and government, claimed by the Hudsons Bay Company in the statements furnished to your Lordship by the Chairman of that Company, we are of opinion, that the rights so claimed by the Company do properly belong to them. Upon this subject we entertain no doubt,” so that you have a most emphatic opinion by these two learned gentlemen in support of the view which Sir Samuel Romilly and his colleagues had taken in 1814 ; and therefore you have the genesis of the approbation of the height of land theory of the Hudson's Bay Company.

1 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount FINLAY : What is the date of that last Opinion ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : This is 1850.

Sir JOHN SIMON : We have had this all printed in case your Lordships want it ; but I am not offering it unless it is wanted.

Viscount HALDANE : It comes to this ; there was a controversy about it, and then comes the definite opinion which you have just read.

Viscount Haldane.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : This opinion was given by Sir John Jervis and his colleague before the opinion of the Law Officers of 1857, which I have read, and having this before them—because that is what my learned friend was concerned to bring out—and which I was just going to read—
p. 465

Viscount HALDANE : This is seven years before.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, and the only way in which that previous Opinion was before the Committee of 1857 was through the circumstance that when they consulted their Law Officers of the day those Law Officers had before them this Opinion.

Viscount HALDANE : And those Law Officers did not say they entertained no doubt.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Not at all.

Viscount HALDANE : On the contrary they left the thing alone, they invoked the authority of Sir John Romilly to give it an air of respectability.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Your Lordship has embroidered my address, but there it is. What I am concerned with is this, that surely the impression which one had gathered from the bringing together of these documents, that the House of Commons Committee in 1857 definitely pronounced upon this matter, based on the Law Officers' opinion, has gone by the board. The reason why I address myself with some anxiety to this is the very precise language in which the impression was conveyed which is to be found in my learned friend's address.

Viscount FINLAY : It comes to this : We have to make up our own minds as to what the proper answer to the question is.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I am glad to say there is a little more assistance for your Lordships, as I shall show in a moment. I do not know whether your Lordships will have to determine for the first time in history the boundaries of Hudson's Bay.

1 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount FINLAY : We shall have to do it now.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I do not know that it will necessarily be for your Lordships to do it, in the view I am going to present.

Viscount HALDANE : In your view it is not necessary.

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, but it is necessary for my learned friend's case, of course.

Lord SUMNER : In the Indian Territory you get what is called the Hudson's Bay.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I do not want to put it as a bribe, because that is most improper, but my learned friend's case must bring his boundaries together at the height of land : the Hudson's Bay Territory is to meet the Newfoundland Territory and say : “ Here we are, at the parting of the ways” ; he must get them there, and they must coincide ; and that explains the great effort that has been made to establish the height of land, because, of course, it is cardinal to their case. I am only here to show that, so far as the Law Officers' Opinion is concerned, my learned friend's submission is unfounded—so far as these documents are concerned.

p. 466

Viscount HALDANE : If it were a question between Indian Territory and Hudson's Bay Territory there would be a precise question.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes.

Viscount HALDANE : And there would be if Canada had succeeded to Indian Territory ; that may arise some day.

Viscount Haldane.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I do not know whether Lord Warrington would be good enough to help me on a point ; I have had great difficulty in tracing what was in your Lordship's mind in a question addressed to my learned friend, Sir John Simon, when you said, The House of Commons in 1867 accepted the claim made by the Hudson's Bay Company in the letter of the 8th June, 1850. I cannot find any letter of the 8th June, 1850 ; but what I have found is a statement of 1850.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : That must mean 1815.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is a misprint probably, my Lord.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : That is the date, 8th June, 1815 ; it is referring to the Opinion.

Lord WARRINGTON : Yes, that is so.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I puzzled over it a long time to find out what it was.

1 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord WARRINGTON : It is hardly my fault.

Viscount HALDANE : Will you tell me this, to satisfy my mind ; in 1884 which I begin to remember only dimly, the great case, in which I was Junior Counsel, settled the boundary of Ontario.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord.

Viscount HALDANE : As running up the Albany River, and, of of course, it got to the point where it became co-terminous with the Hudson Bay, or very nearly so ; did it touch the boundary ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : It did a most significant thing—but that comes at a later stage of my argument—which I think was to disregard the height of land altogether.
p. 467

Viscount HALDANE : This height of land ?

Mr. MACMILLAN: Yes, the Hudson's Bay height of land.

Viscount HALDANE : It disregarded it.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It disregarded it.

Viscount HALDANE : Was it considered ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is why all these Opinions are in the Manitoba and Ontario Appendix ; the whole topic was this, and I have got some most interesting side lights from it which I hope respectfully to distribute to your Lordships a little later on. For the moment I am concerned to give your Lordships the whole of this material and put it in its proper perspective ; therefore, I think we see now just where this matter of the height of land came into being. It is for the first time brought forward by the Hudson's Bay Company in 1814. It receives the highest approbation at that time from Counsel of eminence, and in 1850 receives a further imprimatur from the Law Officers of that day. Upon that my Lords, it is a little interesting to note that the map which was before the Law Officers who advised in 1850 was not the Arrowsmith's Map of 1857 which was printed by Order of the House of Commons, it was another map. Your Lordships remember the instructions given to Sir John Jervis and his colleague to advise, on page 26 of the Joint Appendix, said, " Mr. Hawes then stated that he was to enclose a copy of the letter from the Chairman of the Hudson's Bay Company together with a statement and map prepared under his direction." The map which those Law Officers considered was not the Arrowsmith map of 1857 which is printed as an Appendix to the House of Commons Committee's Report ; of course, it could not be, it was another map ; we have printed it and it is No. 31 of our atlas.

Viscount HALDANE : When was this printed ?

1 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It was ordered by the House of Commons to be printed in 1850 ; so that this map is another of those maps which has upon it the authoritative words, “ Ordered by the House of Commons to be printed, 12th July, 1850 ; ” and this time, what Sir John Jervis and his colleague had before them, was, not the 1857 map going up to Cape Chidley, but was another map showing a boundary upon the East Coast of Labrador.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : That cannot have been the map ordered to be printed in 1850, because the Opinion is dated January

p. 468

1850. This shows what the map was, it was a map prepared by the Hudson's Bay Company showing their Claim.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I think there is no doubt about it.

Mr. MACMILLAN: I think I can trace it, my Lord.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : If you look at page 26 you will see “ annexed to this statement was a map.”

Mr. MACMILLAN : I am still right, with great respect, my Lord ; there was put before the Law Officers a statement and a map, does not it say so, my Lord ?

The Lord Chancellor.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Yes.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Now I have got the statement, and the statement is in this series of Parliamentary Papers, and has annexed to it the map ; the statement and map to which this relates are the statement and map which were submitted to the Law Officers in 1850.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : 1849 as a matter of fact.

The Lord Chancellor.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It was not ordered by the House of Commons to be printed till the 12th July, 1850 ; that is my reading of it, and I think that is right.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I daresay that is so, but it was not printed for the Committee ; it was printed by direction of the House of Commons.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN: This is long before the Committee of 1857 was set up ; and what had been done at this stage was the obtaining of an Opinion from the Law Officers in 1850, and an Opinion upon a statement and a map ; we have the statement and we have the map, and then these documents were all subsequently ordered to be printed.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : It is only a question of whether the map submitted to these Law Officers in 1850 was the map as printed by order of the House of Commons in 1850. You read some description of it. It must have been printed before the Opinion. It may be a similar map.

Mr. MACMILLAN : What I am concerned to do is to identify the map submitted to the Law Officers with the map which was ordered to be printed on the 12th July, 1850. At any rate, I have the map here, and, if your Lordships will look at it, it differs, and differs substantially, from the famous Height of Land Map put forward as the Claim in the 1857 proceedings. It is very vague, and for one thing has no height of land line drawn at all ; it has got a washed colouring, which, as your Lordships will see, ends a considerable distance short of Cape Chidley. So that again one must be very careful really in assuming that these are the same. In 1850 at any rate there was ordered to be printed by the House of Commons, a map which differs from the map which was ordered to be printed in 1857, and the map of 1857 cannot have been the map which was before the Law Officers.

Viscount FINLAY : Being printed by order of the House of Commons, gives no special authority, it only identifies the document.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I thought not, but I gathered from my learned friend referring to that circumstance at least three times that he thought it gave it some authority. What is the materiality to our present case is this : that instead of there being a height of land line ascertained and approved by everybody in 1857, I think I have at least got this length, that I have got it quite loose.

Lord SUMNER : I see Mr. Arrowsmith is also the engraver of the 1850 map ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : My submission, therefore, on that map, at this stage is : that so far from anything that happened in 1850 or 1857 having established the boundary of the Hudson's Bay Company, I submit I have really made my point that we are at large.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

Viscount HALDANE: Are you now going on to a new matter ?

Mr. MACMILLAN: I am still pursuing, I am sorry to say, the elusive boundary of the Hudson's Bay Company, but I will pass now altogether from the contentious atmosphere of the House of Commons Select Committee's Report of 1857. Bearing in mind my Lord Warrington's exhortation, I remember that 1763 is really the important date, and I am frankly once more indebted to my learned friends for putting this matter really beyond question, so far as they are concerned, in their Case. If your Lordships would be good enough to look at the Newfoundland Case, on page 8, line 10, this is Newfoundland's view of the accepted Hudson's Bay boundary in 1763. " It is indeed probable that those responsible for the Royal Proclamation of the 7th October 1763 accepted as the Southern Boundary of the Hudson's Bay Company's territories the line shown on the small map inset in Mitchell's map (1755) of the British Colonies in North America, which represents the British proposal after the Treaty of Utrecht." So Newfoundland's view in their pleadings is that the Hudson's Bay boundary is to be found upon a map, that is to say what was before the people who were considering the Proclamation, and that is the really relevant matter for our present purpose. Now would your Lordships be good enough to look at this map, Mitchell's map, which is No. 11 in the Canada Atlas; it has been before your Lordships before, it is what is called the King's Map ; it is the interesting map which came from King George's library, and bears upon it the marks of having been used for the purposes of showing the results of various important transactions. My Lords, the inset map to which they refer is the little map up in the corner, the small map inset in Mitchell's map of 1755, and there you will see a line drawn transversely through the Peninsula of Labrador, and the letterpress on it is, " Proposed limits of Hudson's Bay." That coincides, of course, precisely with the exact language used in the Pleadings. They refer to this line as representing the British proposal, after the Treaty of Utrecht, so there can be no doubt, whatever that, so far as Newfoundland is concerned, their case to your Lordships is that the Hudson's Bay boundary, so far as it was in the minds of the framers of the Proclamation of 1763, is the line shown in red and blue in Map No. 11, the King's map. My Lords, that plainly is not a height of land line. Would your Lordships see how that map fits into the big map. May I try to assist a little in the understanding of the map ; my Lords will notice on the large

Viscount FINLAY : Not right across.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I mean extending across transversely, at an obtuse angle it goes off to the North East, and the inset map red and blue line is the continuation of that line ; and that line is lettered in red ink “ Boundary between the lands granted to the Hudson's Bay Company and the Province of Quebec,” that is along the top of the blue and red line in red ink, and that is the line whose prolongation through the inset map is described by Newfoundland in its Pleadings as the line which was probably before the framers of the Proclamation of 1763, as the Southern Boundary of Hudson's Bay Territory. My Lords have only to look at it to see that in no sense it is a height of land line.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : That is only a proposed line, it is not put as an existing boundary.

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, my Lord, but the point is that the statement of Newfoundland is that that is the line which was accepted as the Southern boundary of Hudson's Bay by the framers of the Proclamation.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Not the statement, I think.

Mr. MACMILLAN : May I read it : “ It is indeed probable that those responsible for the Royal Proclamation of the 7th October, 1763, accepted as the Southern boundary of the Hudson's Bay Company's Territories the line shown on the small map inset.”

Viscount FINLAY : If that were the case it would destroy the view of the height of land.

1 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Of course it would, my Lord, and that is why I quote it.

Viscount FINLAY : The effect is purely negative.

The LORD CHANCELLOR: What is the authority for that assumption ?

Lord Warrington.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That question, with great respect, should be addressed to Newfoundland, and not to me; it is their considered statement on their Record. Addressing it to me, my Lord, I think it is a very good one, for this reason, I just recall what I had read from the Opinion of the Law Officers in 1857, who said that, for the purpose of ascertaining the true boundary of Hudson's Bay territory, it would be proper to have regard to what was claimed after the Treaty of

Mr. Macmillan.

Utrecht, and 1750. There are other lines of interest upon that map.

p. 472

Sir JOHN SIMON : There is a height of land just above.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I recognise, of course, the importance of reconstituting, if one could, the position in 1763. After all, what happened after that may be important, but what we are anxious to see is, is it not : what did those who used the language of the Proclamation of 1763 conceive to be the territory to which they were alluding as excluded from the Indian reservations, to wit, the Hudson's Bay territory.

Sir John Simon.

Lord WARRINGTON : You need not go so far as that ; it may be that they did not assume a boundary at all : they were not concerned with settling the boundary of the Hudson's Bay property at that time, they may very well have assumed the boundary of the Hudson's Bay Company and then dealt with the rest.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Of course, my Lord, it was not necessary, on my view, that they should find a Hudson's Bay boundary at all, because they had general language which was sufficient to include all that was not in Hudson's Bay, and all that was not in Quebec, in Indian territory, without any exception of Newfoundland ; but I am, for the moment, really taking the considered statement of my learned friend's Case as to what it conceived to be the assumption. I will not put it higher than that, in the minds of the framers of the Proclamation of where the line of the Hudson's Bay territory was, and they say that it was probable that the authors of the Proclamation accepted as the Southern Boundary the line shown on the small inset map. Now, my Lords, the line shown on the small inset map, is not the height of land line, but is a different line ; it does not come: out at Cape Chidley, it comes out at, I think it is, Grimington Island.

Sir JOHN SIMON : My learned friend will have observed that the map does show, and shows in the neighbourhood, a height of land line.

1 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : And disregards it.

Sir JOHN SIMON : It describes it as the height of land line as fixed by the Treaty of Utrecht.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is quite right “ bounds of Hudson's Bay by the Treaty of Utrecht ” ; that is the green and red line, the wavy line.

Sir JOHN SIMON : That is also labelled, “ Lands Height,” you will notice.

Mr. MACMILLAN : And also labelled, “ Lands Height.” I could have understood my learned friend saying that that line was the line which was in the minds of the framers of the Proclamation; but having that map in front of them they rejected that line and said that the line that they had in mind, which makes it all the more prominent, was the red and blue line ; therefore, having before them a height of land line, they deliberately disregarded that and said that the boundary which was in the mind of the framers of the Proclamation was not the height of land line on the same map, but was the red and blue line. I do not know whether that is regarded as making too much of a Pleader's point—I do not want to make too much of a Pleader's point—but still it is rather significant that the statement made there varies so very widely from what is subsequently put before your Lordships in argument ; but my Lords will take this along with it, which has now been made abundantly plain, that in 1763 the height of land claim had not been advanced. It was in 1814 that the height of land contention of the Hudson's Bay Company (I read to you to-day the passage vouching that) was put forward and was canvassed and discussed.

It was approved by some persons ; other persons disapproved of it. But if the Newfoundland statement be true, it makes a most serious inroad into their contentions—if their own statement be true, and I can only assume for the moment that it is true, until it is disclaimed.

My Lords, there are other indicia of considerable value upon this question of Hudson's Bay in relation to the height of land. I shall have to refer to this map and the Quebec boundary question, later on ; meantime I thought it proper to bring it before you in relation to the pleadings of the Colonies. May I take one of those smaller matters which are sometimes indicative, more than would seem at first. My learned friend, at page 95 of his address, passing from the formal documents themselves, as to which he had expressed a view, with which I am almost in agreement, says, “ My own view, which I submit most humbly to the Board, is that what one has finally to do is to take the language of the formal documents, and that what has been done under them, though no doubt matters which your Lordships will carefully consider, is an entirely subordinate question.” I should think that view commends itself to my Lords as it humbly commends itself to me. He points out, of course, that the significance of these entirely subordinate matters varies very much according to the circumstances, and that where he can give an example of common consent, it has more weight than if it were really exparte. He classifies the different kinds of subordinate things, but it is remarkable that he selects as apparently the very first of those subordinate matters—certainly very early, because it is at page 98—as an example of one of these subordinate matters which assists him in the case of his height of land contention, the case of Fort Nascopie, and that topic was thus introduced to your Lordships.

My learned friend said that Sir George Simpson, a prominent official of the Hudson's Bay Company, being examined before the House of Commons Committee in 1857, had brought to his notice an incident which had taken place at Fort Nascopie. One Kennedy had said that a murder of Indians had taken place there and this incident was brought up against Sir George Simpson for the purpose of discrediting the efficiency of the Hudson's Bay Government, and it was said : “ How comes it that these crimes can take place in Hudson's Bay Territory ? ” Sir George Simpson disclaimed the locus, Fort Nascopie, as being in Hudson's Bay territory, and my learned friend thus put the point : “ One of the things about which he was very much challenged—”

Viscount FINLAY : You are reading Sir John's statement, are you ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : If your Lordship pleases ; I prefer to put his exact language, rather than to paraphrase it. “ One of the things about which he was very much challenged was the failure—so it was alleged—of the Hudson's Bay administration properly to punish a man who was said to have maltreated (I rather think to have killed) a native at Nascopie ; and his answer again and again was ‘ Nascopi is not in Hudson's Bay jurisdiction ; it is in the jurisdiction of Newfoundland.’ What Sir George Simpson said is not evidence, but it is an interesting circumstance that, in 1857, that was one of the matters which came out, and Nascopie acquired considerable importance in the Committee for that reason. (The LORD CHANCELLOR) : It did not matter to him whether it was in the jurisdiction of Newfoundland or Quebec, I suppose ? (Sir JOHN SIMON) : It did not, of course. (The LORD CHANCELLOR) : The point was that it was not within the Hudson's Bay territory. (Sir JOHN SIMON) : It is rather this : nobody suggested at the time that it could be anything else. He did insist that it was in Newfoundland. I am not attaching importance to it, but it does fit in, that in 1857, when that map was printed by the House of Commons as the result of the Hudson's Bay Inquiry ”—your Lordships notice how the 1857 map is referred to as “ Printed by the House of Commons as the result of the Hudson's Bay Inquiry.” Then Sir John continues : “ (and it is rather interesting to notice), there was confirmation that that is where you get dividing line. Lake Nascopie is the head of the waters that are running down. As a matter of fact, Sir George Simpson did again and again insist : ‘ That is Newfoundland.’”

My Lord, we have the evidence of Sir George Simpson, and you will find it printed in Volume V, at page 2280. On that page your Lordships will see that my learned friend is quite right in saying that Sir George Simpson was insistent on Fort Nascopie being in Newfoundland ; but to say that nobody suggested at the time that it could be anything else, is a little remarkable in view of the topic being pursued as it was with Sir George Simpson. After he had, as my friend pointed out, said, I think twice if not oftener, that it was in Newfoundland, he is asked this at Question 1572, on page 2280 : “ (Q.) Do you know whether that fort belongs to the Hudson's Bay Company ?—(A.) It does ; it is a post or establishment called the Post of Nascopie. These posts are moved from time to time according to circumstances. (Mr. Roebuck) : Can you remove a fort ?—(A.) A fort is half-a-dozen log huts, and may be erected by half a-dozen men in about a week ; that is what we call a fort. (Q.) It bears the same name wherever it travels ?—(A.) We call it either a post or a fort. (Q.) Do you mean to say that you move a fort about ?—(A.) We call it an outpost, a trading post. I do not call it a fort. (Q.) It is called a fort here ?—(A.) It may be so ; it is a misnomer. (Q.) Do you mean to say that you have no Fort Nascopie ?—(A.) We have an outpost called Nascopie. (Q.) You have no fort called Nascopie ?—(A.) We have not. (Mr. Grogan) : It is a station ?—(A.) It is a station. (Mr. Edward Ellice) : And those stations depend upon the time they are occupied ?—(A.) Exactly so. (Mr. Grogan) : Has that station ever been abandoned ?—(A.) I really cannot tell; I think it is very likely. (Q.) But has it been abandoned ?—(A.) I really cannot tell; we move an establishment according to circumstances. If the fish and the other means of subsistence are not sufficiently abundant, we move it to another point, 10, 20 or 30 miles distant.—(Q.) Mr. Roebuck put a question to you about the death of a great number of natives adjoining a fort, which at first you were under the impression was in Labrador ?—(A.) Yes. (Q.) Now it appears that it is in the Hudson's Bay Company's territory ?”

Sir JOHN SIMON : It did not appear at all.

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, but his answer is the significant thing : “ I am not quite sure that it is ; I am rather disposed to think it is not.” That is the gentleman who, we are told, said again and again, that Nascopie is not in the Hudson's Bay jurisdiction, it is in the jurisdiction of Newfoundland, and insisted on that again and again, and that nobody suggested at the time it could be anything else.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I am quite sure that in this matter, as in all others, you would wish to do me justice. Really unintentionally you are not correctly reproducing the observation I made. I said, and quite accurately said, that Sir George Simpson said Nascopie was outside the Hudson's Bay territorial boundary and therefore in Newfoundland. Then there were a number of questions put to him based on this idea that the Hudson's Bay Company could have no establishments outside their own territory, which of course was a mistake. When the Lord Chancellor said it did not matter whether it was in Newfoundland or anywhere else, I said in answer to the Lord Chancellor that nobody suggested it was anywhere else, meaning, of course—and I am sure I was understood at the time to mean—that nobody suggested it was in any tertium quid. I am sure you do not want to do me an injustice.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Certainly not.

Sir JOHN SIMON : My comment was perfectly justified.

Mr. MACMILLAN : We were not at the moment discussing a tertium quid.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Indeed, the Lord Chancellor was.

3 S

p. 476

Lord WARRINGTON : It is made quite plain at Question 1591: “ (Q.) It just now belonged to Labrador ?—(A.) Upon the coast of Labrador ; we have establishments upon the coast of Labrador.”

Mr. MACMILLAN : My Lords, the point I am making is that it is suggested that Sir George Simpson insisted again and again that it was in Newfoundland and that nobody suggested the contrary. My submission is that he did suggest the contrary.

Viscount HALDANE : There is a significant question and answer at the end.

Mr. MACMILLAN : My Lord, I was going on if I might. This is Question 1585 at page 2280 : “ (Mr. Roebuck :) You distinctly said that Nascopie was a station belonging to the Hudson's Bay Company ? (A.) Yes. (Q.) This account speaks of Nascopie ? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Therefore it belongs to the Hudson's Bay Company ? (A.) It did belong to the Hudson's Bay Company. (Mr. Grogan :) Has it ever been abandoned ? (A.) I do not even know whether it is at present occupied or not. (Mr. Edward Ellice :) It is still occupied ? (A.) Yes. (Mr. Roebuck :) So that it still belongs to the Hudson's Bay Company ? (A.) It always has belonged to the Hudson's Bay Company, when it has been occupied. (Q.) It just now belonged to Labrador ? (A.) Upon the coast of Labrador ; we have establishments upon the coast of Labrador. (Mr. Blackburn :) Are these posts sometimes in Labrador, and sometimes in the Hudson's Bay territory? (A.) They are moved as circumstances may render advisable. (Mr. Roebuck:) But they are always under the command of the Hudson's Bay Company ? (A.) Yes. (Q.) So that wherever they are moved to they belong to the Hudson's Bay Company ? (A.) Hudson's Bay establishments are under the control of the Hudson's Bay Company, but there are other establishments in the immediate neighbourhood.”

Now if your Lordships would look at Volume I, page 240, you will see the position of Fort Nascopie, because here you have the actual deed of surrender by the Hudson's Bay Company of their territories. You will find Fort Nascopie entered as in Labrador under the heading “ Montreal Department, Rupert's Land.” This document is the surrender that was made by the Hudson's Bay Co. to the Queen in pursuance of the Act of Parliament that your Lordships may remember, whereby Rupert's Land might be surrendered and become incorporated in Canada ; and the formal deed of surrender contains a schedule ; the schedule is made part of the deed of surrender at page 235, and among the forts surrendered is Fort Nascopie described as being in Labrador Montreal Department, Rupert's Land.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord SUMNER: Is “ Montreal Department ” a description of the territory or of the authority under which it is ruled ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : I think it must be only the Hudson's Bay Co.'s denomination of the way in which they divided up their districts.

p. 477

Lord SUMNER : “ Labrador ” is intended to describe, I suppose, the territory that it is in.

Mr. MACMILLAN : But the heading is “ Rupert's Land.” That is, of course, the important heading. These are Labrador posts in Rupert's Land and, in my submission, they include a considerable amount of Labrador.

Lord WARRINGTON : This is only a list of posts which belong to the Hudson's Bay Co. situate in Labrador.

Lord Warrington.

Mr. MACMILLAN : With great respect, I was looking to see if that was so. You will not find Rigolet or these other outposts included in this ; you will find this post Fort Nascopie is taken in. It is one of those posts unlike places which they had beyond their own territory, beyond Rupert's Land. They had a number of posts that were beyond the height of land to the east ; there is no question of that ; they came down to the east coast ; but these were not the places they were surrendering, because they were only surrendering posts that were within their boundaries ; and they got, as you know, a grant of land with each of their posts. There is a distinction between places to which the Hudson's Bay Company men may have gone in the course of business and the formal surrender of the posts in their territory, in Rupert's Land. Therefore when the Company is surrendering in respect of a payment of £300,000 that series of their posts and enumerating them carefully, you find there that they put a series of posts in Rupert's Land, Labrador, and Fort Nascopie is one of them, and they are to have a grant of 75 acres of land with Fort Nascopie. Will your Lordships look at the same time at the other posts marked in Labrador, because they are rather interesting ? Fort Nascopie and its outposts are the first lot. Then Fort Chimo in Ungava ; that is right away up at the top of the map.

Lord WARRINGTON : In the first column is the district. I suppose for the purposes of administration of the Hudson's

1 Nov., 1926.

Bay Company, Labrador is one of the districts within the Department of Montreal.

Mr. MACMILLAN : And inside Rupert's Land.

Lord WARRINGTON : A good deal of the Peninsula of Labrador was certainly to the west of the height of land.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Certainly, my Lord.

Lord WARRINGTON : And these other places, as far as I can see, except Fort Nascope are all to the west.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, my Lord, with great respect.

3 S 2

p. 478

Lord WARRINGTON : Are they not ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : I was going to show that.

Lord WARRINGTON : I was looking as far as I could on the sketch map and I thought they all were.

Lord Sumner.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I think not, my Lord ; I may be wrong.

Lord WARRINGTON : Whale River, George River ; they are all to the west.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I was just going to show your Lordships where they all are ; but my first point upon it is this. This is a territorial surrender by the Hudson's Bay Company of the posts in its territory.

Lord SUMNER : Are you quite correct ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : I hope I am right, my Lord ; I may be wrong.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord SUMNER : In the document to which this schedule is annexed, on page 235, paragraph (2) it says : " The Company to retain all the posts or stations now actually possessed and occupied by them or their officers or agents whether in Rupert's Land or any other part of British North America, and may within twelve months after acceptance of the said surrender select a block of land adjoining each of their posts or stations, within any part of British North America, not comprised in Canada and British Columbia in conformity, except as regards the Red River Territory, with a list made out by the Company and communicated to the Canadian Ministers, being the list in the annexed schedule." I assume that to mean that this was an agreed list of the land that they were entitled to retain at each of their posts whether those posts were in Rupert's Land or in any other part of British North America.

1 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord Sumner.

Mr. MACMILLAN : True, but I am emphasising the fact that this particular post is put in under the heading of Rupert's Land. Rupert's Land is the definition in the original Charter of 1670 the Territory of the Hudson's Bay Company.

Lord SUMNER : It is on either Rupert's Land or North–West Territory, and if it was not North–West Territory it was, as a matter of nomenclature, in Rupert's Land apparently.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I may be quite wrong, but the thing that seemed to me to be important was this, that when I look at these Forts and places which are referred to, they do not seem to include a number of what might be called outposts, extra territorial places ;

p. 479

because I find, for instance, on the green area there was a well known post, North–West River.

Lord SUMNER : Is not the reason that in regard to those they omitted the posts they did not want to retain or had not got an agreement that they should retain any land around the post.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That may be, my Lord.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord SUMNER : Perhaps there was something that will explain this a little more definitely, but from the language of this section it does not suggest to me that because Rupert's Land is the heading of the section and Labrador is the district inside, therefore it is an admission that Fort Nascopie is in that part of Labrador which is part of Rupert's Land.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Very good, my Lord. I am putting it too high obviously.

Lord SUMNER : I do not quite see that you have gone far enough yet.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I am only putting it as it occurs to me. So often under examination one's points do not seem so good as one thought them. When I read that I thought it was perhaps better than it is. It is rather interesting to follow out the posts mentioned, described as being in Labrador and Rupert's Land perhaps erroneously. Fort Nascopie, we know, is the Fort inside the green, just at the corner. Then we have Fort Chimo, shown on my learned friend's map just at the bottom of Ungava Bay. There can be no doubt it is well inside Rupert's land. The South River outposts are well to the west of the height of land. Your Lordship sees Koksoak

Lord Sumner.

River flowing into Ungava Bay. If you follow up that river, just after the confluence with a river coming in from the south-west, the South River Outposts are there—well to the west of the height of land.

Viscount FINLAY : Whereabouts is it with reference to Fort Chimo ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Map No. 1 of our Atlas shows it.

Lord SUMNER : They are all in the Koksoak basin.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes.

Lord SUMNER : Whale River and George River are not actually in the Koksoak basin, perhaps, but they run next to it into Ungava Bay. Chimo and the place you have just mentioned are actually in the basin, are they not ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord. Then George's River and Whale River are also both to the west of the watershed. Then North's River, on the other hand, is to the east of the watershed. North River is marked on the map near the Moravian settlement of Okak.

Lord WARRINGTON : Are you quite sure that those two are the same. It is called North's River in the document you showed us just now, and this is North River. Are you sure it is the same ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Well, my Lord, it is the only one I know.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I think it is the same, my Lord. It is not a case where concession is of any value, but we think it is the same.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord Warrington.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : North River settlement is there, and my learned friend is good enough to say that he agrees, just to the east of the watershed. Then False River is just at the bottom of Ungava Bay, practically at the mouth of the Koksoak River. The only importance of that is that that is to the west of the watershed.

Lord SUMNER : They are all west of the watershed except North River.

Mr. MACMILLAN : And, if I am right, Fort Nascopie. Would your Lordship bear this in mind. I said this was not a very big point, but it is rather significant. North River is inside the boundary of the Hudson's Bay territory as set down in Mitchell's map, and so also is Fort Nascopie. So that we have here a case where they were surrendering their territory as Rupert's Land—after what your Lordship has indicated I cannot put too much stress upon that—but at least it is a document professing to surrender land in Labrador which is also in Rupert's Land, and which is also within the Hudson's Bay territory. As my learned friend said, the framers of the Proclamation of 1763 accepted that boundary as the Hudson's Bay boundary.

Mr. Macmillan.

My Lord, I leave the Nascopie point, and come to another point on the height of land. The question of the position of the height of land arose in the Ontario–Manitoba case of 1884. May I explain how it arose. The main contest in that case was between the Dominion of Canada and the Province of Ontario. The Province of Ontario desired that its boundaries should be fixed well to the north. The Dominion of Canada desirous of retaining as much land unallocated to any Provinces as it could at that stage, contended that the northern boundary of the Province of Ontario was the southern boundary of the Hudson's Bay Company, and that the southern boundary of the Hudson's Bay Company was the height of land. Therefore, said they, Ontario cannot legitimately claim any territory north of the height of land because, were it to do so, it would be claiming half of the Hudson's Bay territory under their Charter. Lord Haldane's recollection is no doubt being revived on this point. The contention of Canada, my clients to-day, was that the old Province of Quebec, which included Upper and Lower Canada, was by the Quebec Act of 1874, which your Lordships have had put before you, described as bounded on the north by the southern boundary of the Hudson's Bay territory. They said : How can you, Ontario, claim to pass over the height of land ? If you do, you pass into Hudson's Bay territory. Therefore, it was argued, Ontario has no legitimate right to anything north of the height of land. Ontario replied : Whatever be the southern boundary of the Hudson's Bay Company, we maintain that we are entitled to pass over and beyond any such line, and claim territory to the northward of the height of land. I do not wish to go into the thing in detail, because it is a complicated story, but I am giving, I think, an accurate outline of it. They said : If you will look at other documents not less important, you will find on the left side of the map there is a line up to the Lake of the Woods, which was the boundary between the United States and Canada, and upon the other side there was a line which went up to James Bay in Hudson's Bay.

Viscount HALDANE : Was that the Albany River ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : The Albany River was the left side of James Bay.

Viscount HALDANE : Where did the Albany River flow ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : It flowed into James Bay from the west. In that case Canada maintained the sanctity of the height of land as the boundary of the Hudson's Bay territory with might and main. I have looked through the pleadings of the parties, and a wealth of learning is expended upon this question of the height of land. Every form of learning is ransacked. I am glad to say we have been spared here writers on international law, hut authors on international law are quoted in that case, and the whole topic of the height of land is put forward with great vehemence, not so forcibly as put forward now by my learned friend, but as well put forward as it could be, and put forward as a natural and proper boundary. It is so interesting to find almost all the epithets applied to the height of land boundary at that time repeated now. It was put forward as a natural and proper boundary, and all the rest of it. But what did the Privy Council do ? They entirely disregarded the height of land. They gave a boundary to

1 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord Warrington. Ontario which transcended the height of land, and carried the territory of Ontario right up to James Bay ; and it came round the south shore of James Bay to the mouth of the Albany River, and so to the west, and included in Ontario, therefore, a large amount of what would ex hypothesi have been Hudson's Bay territory, because it was north of the height of land. It is true, of course, that they did so, not moved merely by the question of the ascertainment of the point of the height of land, because there were these other very cogent considerations which controlled the situation—the point about the Lake of the Woods, and the other line at the other end. But what is of significance is the attitude taken up by your Lordship's predecessors at that time on this topic of the height of land, urged as it was upon them with every circumstance of urgency. and with a great apparatus of learning. My Lords, it received, I may say, scant courtesy. There are a few references to that question which I propose, with your Lordships' leave, now to refer to.

Lord Warrington. Lord WARRINGTON : Would you mind telling me what were the Privy Council doing then ? Were they ascertaining where the boundary was in fact fixed, or were they fixing a boundary as arbitrators ?

Mr. Macmillan. Mr. MACMILLAN : They were considering the validity of an award which had been pronounced in Canada. The matter had been arbitrated in Canada first of all, and it came over here on the question, among others, of the binding character of the award.

Lord WARRINGTON : It came over here as an appeal ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, my Lord. It did not come as an ordinary appeal. It came as a special reference also.

Lord WARRINGTON : But still as a reference of a different kind to that which we have to deal with.

Mr. MACMILLAN : My Lord, I would like to give the actual terms of the reference in a matter of this sort.

Lord WARRINGTON : You see what I mean. If they rejected the height of land on the facts ,it may be of one importance ; but if they merely refused to adopt it for the purpose of fixing a boundary, it may be of quite a different importance.

1 Nov., 1926.
Mr. Macmillan. Mr. MACMILLAN : Your Lordship is concerned to know whether it was a declaratory process such as we are engaged in here, or whether it was one in which they had the right to say another boundary would be an expedient boundary.

Lord WARRINGTON : Yes.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Subject to correction—my learned friends might check me upon this—it looks to me as if it was a declaratory process like this, because I see that the Special Case which was put before the Privy Council is this. “ The Province of Ontario claim that the western boundary of that Province is ”—not should be—either so—and—so, or so—and—so, “ and the Province of Manitoba claim that the boundary of that Province and the Province of Ontario” is so—and—so. “ It has been agreed to refer the matter to the Judicial Committee of Her Majesty's Privy Council, and an appendix has been prepared.” Then here are

Sir John Simon.

p. 483

the questions. “ The questions submitted to the Privy Council are the following:—(1) Whether the award is or is not under all the circumstances binding ; (2) In case the award is held not to settle the boundary in question then what, on the evidence, is the true boundary' between the said Provinces ?” Therefore the task on which they were engaged is the same as now.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount FINLAY : Did they hold the award binding ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, they held it not binding.

Viscount FINLAY : And they declared the boundary ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : They declared it.

Sir JOHN SIMON : The third question was whether, in case legislation is needed to make the decision in the case binding or effective, certain legislation already passed would do it.

Mr. MACMILLAN : And I think they passed an Act afterwards.

Sir JOHN SIMON : The whole thing was disposed of finally by Act.

Mr. MACMILLAN: And we may need an Act here possibly ; we do not know. My Lords, there they were as here, in search of a legally existing boundary assumed to exist at some place. The attitude of the Board to the Ontario claim is, I venture to say, rather instructive. Volume V, page 2135, contains “ Extracts from proceedings before the Judicial Committee of Her Majesty's Privy Council in the Ontario–Manitoba Boundary Case re ‘ Watershed ’ contention, taken from the transcription of notes.” What is of, interest to note is the effort of Counsel for the Dominion. The effort of Counsel for the Dominion was to persuade their Lordships that the height of land was the boundary on the north, and could not be transcended, and for that purpose a considerable amount of law was invoked which I respectfully think has little to do with the question, and upon which I was rather relieved to notice that friend Sir John did not rely in his opening in support of the watershed theory. If we get into the region of international law we get into a mare magnum on these matters, and my submission would be that there is no accepted doctrine of international law on the subject. I have read a considerable number of authors, and found they differed with even more acerbity than usual on this topic. Counsel on behalf of the Dominion was insisting there as a doctrine of law that “ the discovery of a coast line, and the occupation of that coast line, give to the discoverer an entire right to all the territory that is drained there.” That is page 2136, line 14.

1 Nov., 1926.
Mr. Macmillan.

It submits as a doctrine “ the international law on the subject is this, that the discovery of a coast line, and the occupation of that coast line, give to the discoverer an entire right to all the territory that is drained there.” That doctrine is really remote, even if sound, from our present question, because we are dealing with an alleged discovery of the coast here and what right it gives to the discoverer, what depth of land it gives him a right to. We are dealing with the interpretation of land. It was invoked there as being in some way helpful to the contention that the height of land was the sacrosanct boundary, and the doctrine submitted was the doctrine which I have just read. Then it is suggested that it is in accordance with reason and law. These strong words appear at the top of page 2137. The same type of submission was made upon it. The Lord Chancellor, who was then Lord Selborne, intervened at line 20, on page 2137, and said : “ There seems to be about as much foundation for the one idea as for the other. If you say that because you take possession of a few miles of the coast of Africa, you take possession of all the country which is drained by a river which goes three thousand miles, it is so absurd that I cannot conceive it to be laid down by any writer on international law. However, it has very little bearing upon this question. (Sir Robert Collier) : Whether it is so or not is of very little consequence. (The Lord President) : What do you conceive to be the bearing of all this ? (Mr. McCarthy) : The bearing of all this is that the charter did give to the Hudson's Bay certain definite limits. If it did not give to Hudson's Bay certain definite limits, the charter was void for uncertainty. Now what were those limits ? (Sir Robert Collier) : I am speaking about that charter, under which was the only possession that the English had in all this north country. The Hudson's Bay Company represented the Crown of England, and the charter purported to give them all the lands which drained into the Bay.” The very case is being put there. “ Now, either it was void for uncertainty, and a piece of waste paper—and I am not required to admit that—or it did give to the Hudson's Bay Company certain definite limits. Where are those definite limits ? Can my learned friends on the other side suggest any definite limits to the Hudson's Bay grant.” The familiar device of putting your adversary in a difficulty was regarded, and this point was strongly made, that it was a doctrine of law as much as of reason, that if you had a right on the coast, that gave you a right to the entire hinterland up to the height of land.

Viscount HALDANE: That arose from certain contentions which the German Government were putting forward at that time.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I think the first real inception is when Mr. Monroe put it forward in 1805 in the Louisiana case. Be that as it may, I should humbly agree that it is not relevant here, but what is sought ? The learned Chancellor characterises the doctrine, as claimed, as perfectly absurd.

Sir JOHN SIMON : The thing that is perfectly absurd is not quite this proposition.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord Warrington.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Not your proposition ; no. I do not suggest that for a moment, but I do suggest this, that the attempt (so to speak) to bolster up the height of land as the legal and just boundary because it has the support of international law as well as of reason, failed in that case. It is put again with an insistence which I am afraid we Counsel too often exhibit on page 2139, for Mr. McCarthy, returning to the charge, says : “ I mean this, and your Lordship will say whether I am to go on or not.” Counsel is getting into difficulties, and is anxious to ascertain whether he is to go on with his topic.

Viscount HALDANE : Mr. McCarthy was an advocate of immense energy.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I gathered so from the written page. “ I mean this, and your Lordship will say whether I am to go on or not : but what I understand is this, that from time to time nations have agreed upon certain well known rules for settling matters of this kind, and that this question as to the water shed, and as to the territory which one nation that discovers becomes entitled to, has in that way—by conventions, by arguments adduced at those conventions, by settlements made upon references—been so firmly established that it may be accepted as a well known rule of international law.” That is not at all unlike what my learned friend Sir John is putting forward, that it is an accepted legal view that the height of land is the boundary which you are to adopt.

Lord WARRINGTON : I do not think Sir John put that forward at all as an accepted legal view, that the height of land was to be adopted.

Mr. MACMILLAN : My impression was that he said it was founded in both reason and principle.

Mr. Macmillan.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I must answer for my own argument, and I know of no reason why I should answer for Mr. McCarthy's.

Mr. MACMILLAN : My Lord was asking me as to your argument. I thought you had submitted that it was a boundary founded in both reason and principle. I may have misquoted. If it is both unprincipled and irrational, I will not trouble with it.

Viscount FINLAY : If they agreed to it, there it is.

Mr. MACMILLAN: At page 2144, on the sixth day, the Lord Chancellor says this, and this is on the Hudson's Bay question you will notice : “ Then, when different nations are disputing about boundaries, they have recourse to abstract reasoning and certain principles, and so on; but to represent that as a rule of international law—and especially

p. 486

as a rule of international law which had any existence or was imagined by anybody at the time we have to consider in this inquiry—is surely a proposition which cannot be maintained. You might just as well go back to the time at which the Pope was supposed, by international law, to be able to give away whatever districts in the world he pleased. Those words ‘ international law ’ are very misleading. There are certain principles generally accepted amongst nations ; there are particular reasons which have been constantly resorted to when disputes have taken place, about boundaries or otherwise, between nations, as the best available means of settling those disputes ; but to say that there is any general international law that gives to the first discoverer of the mouth of a river and a certain line of coast, as against all other nations, whether he occupies it or not, or without regard to what extent it is occupied or not, a right to all the country that is watered by any of the rivers that come in there, is a proposition which no amount of modern books will prove. (Mr. Robinson) : Well, I am not desirous for one moment of arguing this question at length, or expressing any opinion of my own. All that I can say is that I find it laid down in the clearest language in the book which my learned friend has referred to, and your Lordship will find that confirmed. (The Lord Chancellor) : We really cannot have the laws of the world made by gentlemen, however learned, who have published books within the last twenty or thirty years.” I do not know whether that is Sir Travers Twiss or Sir Robert Phillimore. Then Lord Aberdare makes an interposition which is rather interesting : “ It must be borne in mind that Charles II was utterly unaware of the enormous bearing of such a proposition as yours.” My Lord, I suggest that in 1763 the framers of this proclamation were utterly unaware of any suggestion that by putting the coast of Labrador under the “ care and inspection,” they were inherently invoking a doctrine of reason which subjected the whole territory up to the height of land to the Governor. The Lord Chancellor says : “ It is quite certain that France never recognised any such idea, nor can I perceive that it was ever suggested on the part of the Hudson’s Bay Company in the early stages. We first meet with it in the Selkirk grant of 1814 ”—my Lord, 41 years after the proclamation which, according to my learned friend, gave the Governor of Newfoundland the whole territory of Labrador up to the height of land upon the east side.

Viscount Haldane.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount HALDANE : Mr. Christopher Robinson was an admirable advocate, but he was not at all combative, in my recollection ; he gave the thing up.

Lord Sumner.

Mr. MACMILLAN: I do not know whether you commend that example to me, or deprecate it.

Lord SUMNER : Whether he gave it up or did not give it up, made no progress with it.

Mr. MACMILLAN : The only point about that is this. My learned friends in their Pleadings appear to rely upon the Manitoba ease. It is referred to at some length in their Pleadings, although my learned friend has not made a point of it. I invoke it in turn for this purpose as showing that a sacrosanct height of lands boundary of the Hudson's Bay received very scant commons at the hands of the Privy Council in the 1884, and although at that time it was sought to be supported with learning (no doubt inferior to that of my learned friend, but at that time the best learning of the day) it did not succeed.

Lord Sumner.

Lord SUMNER : I do not think I understood Sir John Simon to be resting his height of land upon any legal principle. I understood it roughly to be this, that when you have two administrations, both under the British Crown, who between them divide somewhere a great unexplored and savage tract, you get a boundary at some time or other, and in default of agreement on the parallel and longitude or something of that kind, what is there better than a watershed which at any rate can be discovered if you are sufficiently self-sacrificing to spend a few winters in this appalling climate.

Viscount Finlay.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN: It would have been more formidable for me to meet it had it been put in that form, but I think it was put much higher. It was put in this way, that there was a boundary of Hudson's Bay and a boundary of Newfoundland, coincident boundaries, meeting on the height of land. It was put in that form against me.

Viscount Finlay.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord SUMNER : So I understood. Assuming there was nothing intervening and they did join with one another somewhere, it is none the worse for the fact that learned Counsel advised that the height of land is the right one ; but still, the point as I understood it was that where you come to the end of Hudson's Bay you begin the Labrador part.

Viscount FINLAY : Would you read the terms in which the question is put ? Is not it : Where, having regard to the effect of the various documents referred to, or some of them, is the boundary to be fixed

1 Nov., 1926.

Mr. MACMILLAN: What is the location and definition of the boundary as between Canada and Newfoundland in the

Mr. Macmillan.

Labrador Peninsula under the Statues, Orders in Council and Proclamations ?

Viscount FINLAY : We are not to find out what a good boundary would be; we are to say whether or not a certain boundary has been laid down by these documents.

Mr. MACMILLAN: That is exactly it, my Lord ; the same point in the Ontario and Manitoba ease. There also the Privy Council was ascertaining a legally existing, though unknown, boundary.

p. 488

Viscount HALDANE : That was the reference to arbitration in Manitoba, was it not ?

Viscount Finlay.

Mr. MACMILLAN: The arbitration award was brought up here on the question of its validity. Question that it was invalid ; then what was the true boundary ?

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount HALDANE : So the substantive question was raised ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : The substantive question was raised.

Viscount HALDANE : The Committee departed from the findings in Canada.

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, my Lord, they confirmed the award of the arbitrators.

Viscount FINLAY : Must it not ultimately resolve itself into a question of agreement ? Did the parties agree on this? Can you infer from these documents that their agreement was that the boundary should be so and so ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : If one were in the region of contract, but this is not a case of the two parties contracting with each other. It is a case of a regime imposed upon a territory, and therefore the construction is very much the same question, no doubt, but it is a question of what was done.

Viscount FINLAY : I agree ; but the question must be : “ Was this boundary fixed ?”

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord.

Viscount FINLAY : In that way ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes.

Viscount FINLAY : Or at any time. It might be done at any time, of course, by agreement.

1 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : We are agreed, fortunately, here among many things in disagreement, that the root of title (I use advisedly my learned friend's expression) of Newfoundland is in Graves's Commission. The case is sought in the proclamation. I think one may reconcile these two by saying that the combined effect of the proclamation and the commission constitute the title which this honourable Court is now interpreting.

Lord WARRINGTON : The commission is really the operative document

p. 489

Mr. MACMILLAN : The other is recital.

Lord WARRINGTON : It refers to the result of the commission having been effected.

Mr. MACMILLAN : One has in a sense to carry them together, because what was done in the proclamation was done in the light of what had been done under the commission, and therefore one is dealing with the disposal of this whole problem there and then. As I say, my learned friend and I are in agreement that there is the centre of this controversy ; what was done then ; what was in the minds of those who, in 1763, disposed of this territory ; how did they do it ?

Viscount FINLAY : What do the words which they used fairly mean ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : What did they effect by the words they used ? What is the true interpretation of those words ? I have been concerned up to this time to contest, to the best of my ability, the height of land point. My Lord, if I have established two points they are, if I may say so, very vital to the case against me. If I have established, first of all, the presence of Indians to whom the proclamation related, I have introduced the tertium quid into this area which my learned friend so strenuously combated. If I am able further to show that the height of land, the blue line coming down from Cape Chudley, was not in the minds of those who framed the proclamation or the commission as the boundary of my learned friend's interests on the main land, whatever they were, that the height of land was not known at that time even as a contention in that district, and was advanced at a much later period in consequence of the opinion obtained in 1814, then I have got a long way to show your Lordship that when the coast of Labrador was put under the care and inspection of the Governor of Newfoundland, and when there was added in the Commission to Captain Graves the coast of Labrador within certain termini upon the coast of Labrador, there was no intention whatever, and upon a sound construction of the language used there is no necessary inference that what was intended to be done was to include the whole area right up to the height of land ; and if my learned friend's case is right, actually to take from Hudson's Bay part of Hudson's Bay territory, because the land drained across on the inset map of Mitchells falls short by a long distance of Cape Chudley, and what he got was a jurisdiction, in my submission, on the shores of that district, but did not get a jurisdiction extending inland. Nevertheless, putting together these two statements of my learned friend (1) that Newfoundland went to the height of land, and (2) that the authors of the proclamation had before them as the boundaries of Hudson's Bay the diagonal line across Labrador, the result is that my learned friend's case drives him to this : that they actually gave Newfoundland part of the Hudson's Bay territory in 1763. My Lords, on those two matters, I submit that I have given your Lordship ground or material for holding that my learned friend is not entitled to the blue line. The significance of that, if I am right, is enormous. It makes a complete breach in the case against me.[sic] because the moment that my learned friend has to depart from the height of land, his problem, like mine, is the ascertainment of the depth of the coast. It not being the height of land, where else is it ? Of course, my learned friend may have much larger ideas as to what is meant by “ the coast,” as a second part of his case. We have not heard that yet but we shall hear it in reply, possibly. But, if it is not the height of land, my learned friend, has to find a meaning for “ the coast ” also, and he and I are in pari casu in the problem what is the true extent of coast which was placed under the care and inspection of the Governor of Newfoundland, and included in Captain Graves' Commission as a new element.

Now I should like to pass to a rather different topic, but, I venture to think, an instructive one. Why is it that in 1763, this critical year, when the Government was considering the disposal of these territories and these fishery rights, they selected the Governor of Newfoundland as the person to whom they would entrust whatever they did entrust to him ? My suggestion to your Lordships has been this, that although in certain of the later Acts—and, indeed, early on, because I think it is in the Proclamation too—you find language used which connotes territorial jurisdiction, the primary intention of the whole thing was the regulation of the fisheries. I am not going back upon all that I have said with regard to that matter, but I want now to suggest to your Lordships why it was that the Governor of Newfoundland was the person selected for this task, whatever that task was.

Now, my Lords, what was the state of Newfoundland at this time ? It is very interesting to consider it. The State of Newfoundland at that time, I venture to think, justified completely the wisdom of the selection of the Governor of Newfoundland as the custodian of the coast of Labrador and its fishery interests. It was perfectly natural that Captain Graves should be selected for this task. It would have been quite unnatural to select him as Governor of Indian territories and of large areas extending far inland.

The history of Newfoundland is a very peculiar one, and much of it is told with a considerable degree of accuracy in the printed papers for Newfoundland itself. We have a historical sketch in Volume IV at pages 1667 to 1690, for which I claim no inspiration, but which professes to be based upon documents, and your Lordships will take it with all reserve as a summary of the historical position. But I have some contemporary material here which can put before your Lordships. There are a good many papers, which are of such value as your Lordships may be pleased to attach to them. We have a very interesting description in Volume IV at pages

Mr. Macmillan.

1847, of the kind of Government that went on in Newfoundland.

Lord WARRINGTON : That is an extract from an Act.
p. 491

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is headed: “ Extract from ‘ An examination of the Act of Parliament relative to the trade and government of the American Colonies,’” and it is by James Abercromby.

Viscount FINLAY: Is that the one that begins: “ Having thus stated the different and particular constitutions of Government” ?

Viscount Finlay.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord, that is exactly it. This is interesting, because it says : “ This treatise was prepared for the use of Pelham, First Lord of the Treasury, and Granville, President of the Council, and contains an elaborate survey of the charter and constitution of each of those Colonies.” Therefore, this account of the Colony was prepared by some person who had a special duty to investigate it. He was writing in May of 1752, and he describes the Newfoundland Government thus: “ Having thus stated the different and particular constitutions of Government in all these Colonies, For as to that of Newfoundland tho. Rank'd amongst the Best, and first, In point of Property belonging to this Kingdom, from the Discovery thereof by Cabot, for Henry the 7th in the year 1497; Yet the object of that Government relates to a kind of Police amongst Fisher Men, and to them only.”

Then in the same volume, at page 1908, you have a picturesque description of it in the evidence given by one William Knox, before a Committee appointed to enquire into the state of trade to Newfoundland in the year 1703. This gentleman says : “ That the Island of Newfoundland had been considered, all former Times, as a great English Ship moored near the Banks during the Fishing Season, for the Convenience of the English Fishermen. The Governor was considered as the Ship's Captain, and all those who were concerned in the Fishery Business, as his Crew, and subject to Naval Discipline while there, and expected to return to England when the Season was over.” Then it says : “ The English had then no Rivals,” and so on. There is a picturesque contemporary description of the sort of person that the Governor of Newfoundland was regarded as being.

1 Nov., 1926.

Viscount Finlay.

Viscount FINLAY : It is impossible to take that as being a complete description. No doubt the fishery started it, but Newfoundland came to be a colony in every sense of the word.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Not at this time, my Lord.

Viscount FINLAY : It was coming to be that.

Mr. MACMILLAN : There were the most resolute efforts made to prevent it becoming a colony.

Sir JOHN SIMON : It was called a colony by Abercromby.

Mr. MACMILLAN: I shall give your Lordships the passages on that subject later on ; there is any number of them.

3 U

p. 492

Viscount FINLAY : It is perfectly correct as regards the inception of it, but at what particular time it transcended the conception which is a mere fishing station, is a question of particular enquiry.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord.

Viscount HALDANE : I think it was in eighteen-fifty—something, that it got its status. Was there not some Act ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : It was rather earlier than that, my Lord. I think it was in 1832 that it got a Representative Assembly.

Mr. Macmillan.

Sir JOHN SIMON : That was not by Act of Parliament, I think.

Viscount FINLAY : But apart from representative government altogether, when did it become a settled community as distinguished from a mere fishing station ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : I cannot say, my Lord. It will be necessary to look at the historical account here.

Viscount FINLAY : That seems to be the point of this. Perhaps it is in the account that begins on page 1667.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord.

Viscount HALDANE : It was a military and fishing establishment for some time.

Mr. MACMILLAN : May I just give your Lordships a reference which may help, which is page 1943. Here is a letter from the Earl of Bathurst addressed to the Attorney and Solicitor-General, from Downing Street, on the 4th of March, 1825. It says this : “ Gentlemen, You are aware that the Island of Newfoundland was long regarded merely as a Fishing Station, and that in order to prevent Colonization there, various provisions were made by Parliament to insure the Return of the Fishermen to England at the close of the Fishing season. In consequence of this Policy, the Island was for a great number of years destitute of all these civil Institutions which have been generally established in the other Colonial possessions of the Crown. There has never been any internal Legislature, nor until a comparative recent period, was there even a Court of Civil Justice. Indeed the peculiar system of Maritime Government, and Maritime Jurisdiction, which was so long maintained in Newfoundland, cannot be said to have been abolished before the Enactment of the Acts of the last Session of Parliament, 5 Geo. 4th C. 51, and 67." I am not quite sure what year that was.

Sir JOHN SIMON : 1824.

Viscount Finlay.

p. 493

Mr. MACMILLAN : 1824: So that in 1763, which was 60 years before this, the system was a peculiar system of Maritime Government. Nothing could be more authoritative than this, because this is a case for the Attorney and Solicitor-General on the very topic of the Acts of Parliament in force in Newfoundland.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount HALDANE: That is in the case for the Lords.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is a letter by Lord Bathurst addressed to the Attorney and Solicitor-General and dated the 4th of March 1825, my Lord; and he there describes the position, I think accurately, and answers the point put to me by Lord Finlay, when he says that down to the last session the peculiar system of Maritime Government, and Maritime Jurisdiction, persisted.

Viscount FINLAY : That is directly on the point to which I was calling attention; but what is there said may be qualified by other parts of the case.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord, no doubt.

Viscount FINLAY : But that directly bears on the question.

Mr. MACMILLAN: Yes. my Lord ; and your Lordships will see that this is an independent document altogether, and it is not one which emanates from either of the parties here.

Now we have a somewhat racy witness on this subject in the Chief Justice of Newfoundland, who gives evidence in 1793 before the Committee appointed to enquire into the state of trade to Newfoundland. This is how he describes Newfoundland. I am not going to read very much from his evidence, but on page 1916 in Volume 4 there is a passage to which I should like to refer.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : This is Mr. Reeves.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord, the Chief Justice of Newfoundland. I am going to pick out a sentence or two. In the fifth line on page 1916 he says : “ Notwithstanding the Increase of Inhabitants, Newfoundland is still nothing but a great Ship, dependent upon the Mother Country for every Thing they eat, drink, and wear, or for the Funds to procure them ; the Number of Inhabitants seems to me rather to increase this Dependence, inasmuch as their Necessities are thereby increased.”

My Lords, at the foot of that page after discussing questions about the inhabitants and what that resulted in he said : “ I take the Liberty of doubting whether this Reason was a good one. I never can be brought to think, but that placing a Governor there, whose Business it should be to prevent People settling, would have been a more probable Method of preventing it than continuing the present floating Government, which has no regular Authority to send Persons Home, and which departs from the Island just at the Time when the Seamen and Fishermen are hesitating whether they shall stay the Winter or not, and might be easily turned in their Resolution by the Apprehension of any Interposition from Authority. The Consequence has been, that Newfoundland has been peopled behind your Back ; you have abandoned it to be inhabited by any one who chooses, because you thought appointing a Governor would constitute a Colony and encourage Population. The Western Merchants, who found out the Reason that ‘ a Governor would make a Colony,’ knew perfectly well what they were about in urging it ; they knew that the Presence of a Governor would interfere with their Plan, winch was to go on without Inspection or Control ; they over reached those who heard them, and succeeded in the only object they proposed themselves.” In the meantime they, among the rest, proceeded to take all the advantages they could by adding to the Number of Residents every year. Just look at at this comment at line 19: “ The present floating Government seems to me so constituted, as to confer the least possible Advantage of a Government. The Governor's Appointment continues for Three years, the Term of his Station ; the Captains of the Squadron, who are his Surrogates, are often changed during the Station. It happens, therefore, that the Governor has One Year to see and learn, another to execute his Authority with some knowledge, and a Third Year with some little more.” I observe Mr. Burke's description of him is : “ A military gentleman living on board a Man-o-War.” That is quoted from Volume III, page 1139. That was the kind of person so far from being as General Murray or Governor Carleton was to be, a person on the spot, Governor in the ordinary sense with a territorial jurisdiction, the Governor of Newfoundland was a person who was only there from April till October. He lived on board a ship, and his period on his station was coincident with the period of the fishing. That was the kind of person who was seeking to be Governor of whatever was given into his hands by the Commission of 1763 on the coast of Labrador.

p. 494

My Lords, I think I am entitled to say that the gentleman to whom the coast of Labrador was confided was a gentleman of certainly a maritime character. He lived on a ship ; he was a Captain ; he came to and fro during periods which coincided with the fishery and he escorted the ships out and saw them home with their catch at the end of the season. If it were desired to do what I humbly submit it was desired to do, to secure after 1760 (a) that the French should be prevented from encroaching beyond the terms of the Treaty in the matter of fishery in the Gulf of St. Lawrence on this coast and on the Islands, to ensure (a) that, and (b) on the other hand that our own fisheries on this coast were developed under proper control and some regulation the choice of the Governor of Newfoundland for such a task was dictated by every consideration of common sense and propriety. He was already engaged in controlling fisheries, his business really was that of a fisheries Patrol Officer of a somewhat exalted kind, and therefore he was a person eminently fitted to discharge the duty of being Governor of a fishing coast, but, my Lord, was he a fit person to be selected for the purpose of governing Red Indians with their hunting grounds inside this great territory up to the height of land ? Do you not find, my Lords, the case adequately met by my submission which is that the Labrador coast was given to this gentleman primarily from the point of view of having a fishery upon that coast regulated by an appropriate officer who knew about these things, and who, being already engaged in a business of the same sort would find there a congenial occupation and be able to see on the one hand that the French were kept out and that we were kept in, and we had an industry under such control as was necessary. My Lords, I suggest that is an attractive conception of the position, and notice now how the thing all seems to fit completely. You have Hudson's Bay on the one hand, you have Quebec, the settled portion with its established government there, and a landed Governor, though he had certain responsibilities in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, you had the hinter land of the Indians in the centre, then you had this coastal jurisdiction concerned with what ?—concerned with the control of this great cod fishery along the Labrador coast, and the land, if any, that went with it was just so much land as was necessary for the purpose of conducting a fishery industry.

Mr. Macmillan.

The conception, my Lord, of rights upon land with no defined boundary in the way of depth was quite familiar in this part of the world at that period. The French had important fishing rights in Newfoundland, but, my Lords, they had also a right to land upon the coast and dry their fish there. There was no territorial limitation on that right, they could land on the coast, and these people were quite familiar with the type of right, namely, a right to fish plus a right to use land, a right of disembarkation on the land, and there carry on the uses of the land which were necessary in connection with fishing. Would anybody suggest that because the French had the right to use what after all is the territory of this country for a fishing purpose, to land there and dry their fish, that would have given any right to these Frenchmen to walk 50 miles inland searching for the height of land in Newfoundland and say : Oh, well, I am entitled to land on this coast and I am entitled to land for the purpose of fishing, and there is nothing to say how far inland I may go ; I propose to pursue my promenade to the height of land where I shall meet Sir John Simon ; an attractive vista, but not, I think, what was in the minds at all of the framers of any such regulation. The importance of it is this, of course, I am taunted, I mean properly taunted, it is a good advocate's point, that we do not suggest any precise territorial line along the coast. “ You are driven to say a mile,” but then the familiar device is used : Why not say half a mile or two miles. I have often employed that device, it do not carry you very far, but there are many cases in which the law has chosen to leave matters in that position, for example, in the use of the fishing coasts of Labrador, it left it exactly in that position, and was, therefore, quite well known in this area which we are dealing with, it was perfectly familiar to those dealing with it ; a right to fishery, coupled with a right to use land of indefinite extent inwards, but

Lord Sumner.

the extent inwards was measured by the use and if a Frenchman could show he was using the land for the purpose of drying his fish, and for purposes incidental to that, no one could say him nay ; this charter, indefinite though it be, nevertheless gave him the right to assume usufruct of the land for that purpose. No one said it was void because it was indefinite, nor did anyone suggest it took him up to the height of land, but everyone understood it was bounded outwards by the sea, and as long as he used it for fishing, no one could say him nay. They could have come before your Lordships to know what are the inward bounds, how far may the Frenchman go and dry his fish, if he conceived it to be desirable to go further inland, he wanted to cure the fish he was smoking, he might find it necessary to go, within limits, further inland, a question may have arisen, how far should he go in. It would have been a question then for your Lordships to determine, or whatever competent Court there was to determine the question : Well, what was the extent of this strip which the Frenchmen may use for this purpose. The criterion of its width would then be the necessities of the case ; what is a reasonable coastal area to place at the disposition of the French fishery-men to enable them to carry out the purpose of the grant to them, the grant to carry on the fishing industry and use the land so far as it was necessary for that purpose. Therefore I do not in the least flinch from the suggestion or from the criticism that because I cannot say exactly how broad it is and because I say that the breadth of it has to be measured by the use of it— I do not in the least flinch from that criticism because it is a criticism which might have been levelled at other grants in this district. It makes it more difficult to find the boundary than if you were to take a geographical boundary like the height of land, as my friend would suggest, but it would not deter your Lordships from considering the question where the boundary should be.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord SUMNER : Is there any comparable instance of a grant of territory, roughly a parallelogram, bounded on the one side and not bounded at all except by a point on the coast on any of the other sides ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : I do not think I know of any.

Lord SUMNER : I quite follow your analogy, and the same observations might be made to the matter of bathing on the foreshore, that does not prevent you from drying yourself by walking inland, but when it comes to territory within which the Governor is to arrest and imprison criminals, and within which he is to be entitled and bound to collect customs and to prevent poaching, and maintain a close tie, and all those things which are done by the Governor of Newfoundland, and you are told the sea is there, and rights upon the actual sea-coast are there, and all the rest which is undefined and deliberately so, it is a little difficult to understand how that is to work to begin with.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is interesting to see how the Governors addressed themselves to it, perhaps I may indicate to your Lordships to-morrow how the Governors addressed themselves to their task.

p. 497

The LORD CHANCELLOR : You are going to deal no doubt to-morrow with the language of the Acts of 1774, 1809, and 1825 ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is very important, my Lord.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Also the Moravian question ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord, these are the main things left for me to do. I am afraid I have dwelt very long on 1763. I have done so as far as I could, from our aspect of it, to put your Lordships in possession of all the contributory considerations.

MORNING SESSION.

Mr. MACMILLAN : In answer to my Lord Haldane's question yesterday, I have now ascertained that the Prime Minister between the years 1855 and 1858 was Viscount Palmerston, he was preceded by the Earl of Aberdeen, who held office from 1852 to 1855, and was succeeded by the Earl of Derby, who held office from 1858 to 1859.

Now, my Lords, at the conclusion of yesterday's proceedings, my Lord Sumner was good enough to address to me a question as to whether I could instance any other case where jurisdiction, civil and criminal, was given over a territory without some definition of the area within which the jurisdiction was intended to operate. I answered his Lordship by saying I could not give an instance, but I had hardly said that before it occurred to me that in the present case we have an example very comparable in the instance of the Hudson's Bay Company itself. The Hudson's Bay Company, as my Lords may remember, had a title under their Charter of 1670, the material passages of which will be found in Volume II, at page 367, in which the area was not defined by metes and bounds, but by descriptive words, and, indeed, the controversy has raged practically from that day down to the present, of the Hudson's Bay Company's jurisdiction, as to the precise line of demarcation. Now, in that instance my Lord, you had confided to the Hudson's Bay Company, the adventurers, a very extensive jurisdiction, a civil and criminal jurisdiction, as well as an administrative jurisdiction, and the extent of that jurisdiction was left to be inferred from words of general description. In that case the words, however, were, of course, much more extensive than the words which we find in the case of Newfoundland, because the description of the territory, although it was not described by boundaries, was very comprehensive. You remember the grant was of "the sole trade and commerce of all those seas, straits, bays, rivers, lakes, creeks and sounds, in whatsoever latitude they shall be, that lie within the entrance of the straits commonly called Hudson's Straits, together with all the lands, countries and territories upon the coasts and confines of the seas, straits, bays, lakes, rivers, creeks, and sounds aforesaid, which are not now actually possessed by any of our subjects, or by the subjects of any other Christian Prince or State.” The Charter proceeded to give the property of the same territory to the Hudson's Bay Company. It made them “ the true and absolute Lords and proprietors of the same territory, limits, and places aforesaid.” There is a contrast, and a contrast upon which I rely, between the words which were used in the case of the Hudson's Bay Company and those which were used in the case of Newfoundland. It must, I think, logically be so, that the content of the words used in the case of the Hudson's Bay Company on the content of Newfound– land must be the same as the content of the words used in the Proclamation and Commission, because on the one hand, as it is maintained, the Hudson's Bay description takes them to the height of land from the west, it is equally maintained for Newfoundland that their description takes them to the height of land from the east, and, therefore, logically, Newfoundland is constrained to argue that the description of the Hudson's Bay Company, which takes them to the height of land, may be equiponderated with the description of Labrador, which takes Newfoundland to the height of land, but when you contrast the language of the Hudson's Bay description, which it is said takes them to the height of land, you find very different language, indeed very comprehensive language, describing as has been put, the basins of all these rivers. On the other hand, Newfoundland only gets something that is described as the Coast of Labrador, and yet these two descriptions are said both to have the same effect, they take the one party to the height of land from the one direction and the other party to the height of land from the other direction.

2 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

p. 501

My Lords, there is rather a curious result, because if proceeding on the east side, the title of Newfoundland carries them to the height of land, the whole of the height of land on the east side is coast, by parity of reasoning, the whole of the land upon the west side is equally coast, and the result is, upon my learned friend's submission, this entire Peninsula of Labrador consists of two coasts, and two coasts only, because there is nothing but coast ; in short, in this entire peninsula, there is no interior in the ordinary sense of the term, there is an east and west coast and nothing else, and the language described in the Hudson's Bay Charter, and the language in the Commission and Proclamation which must be equiponderated for this purpose are entirely distinct. There are other illustrations of somewhat indeterminate boundary being given in the cases of the Colonies upon the Atlantic Coast, the old Colonies of Virginia and other Colonies down there, because you may remember those Colonies were bounded originally by so much of the sea–coast, and at different times different extents inland, and ultimately it became from sea to sea, but the language was used in the widest possible way there, and at this time it was not apparently so unusual to use language of large extent.

My Lords, it is of some interest in connection with this matter, to follow up the conception of an area which is described in terms of the use to which it is to be put, but not by boundaries. I instanced yesterday the ease of the French rights in Newfoundland, prefacing, of course, that instance with the caution that there you were not dealing with a territorial right but were dealing with what might be properly described as a servitude or easement, really a right of resort to the shore incident to the rights of fisheries. An attempt was made, I had forgotten it at the moment, to delimit the territory, the shore territory appropriate as an appendage of the sea fishery. Would your Lordships be good enough to take iii your hands for the moment Volume V, in order that I may bring before your Lordships the discussion on this topic. There are extracts given from Official correspondence at page 2185 of Volume V. Negotiations were on foot at this time for the purpose of defining inter alia on the Newfoundland coast the depth inland that should measure the rights of the French on the Newfoundland shore. At page 2185 you have first an extract from a memorandum from Newfoundland on the fishery negotiations, July 21st, 1852, by Sir Anthony Perrier. “ Sir A. Perrier will therefore submit to Her Majesty's Government the expediency of his making a counter proposal embodying all the conditions contained in Lord Aberdeen's instructions of March 14th, 1846. He will also suggest that he be instructed to hold out (in the event of refusal to entertain the English proposal, or of the French Government insisting upon the removal of British settlers within the French limits) that Her Majesty's Government will enforce the strict observance of all the stipulations of the several treaties which concede to France a temporary right of fishery upon certain parts of the coast of Newfoundland; that the French will be restricted from fishing, curing and drying, and to board Stages and Huts necessary for these purposes, that they will be prevented taking Salmon or any other fish, in any part of the rivers, streams, or other water not bona fide on the coast.” Then there is an asterisk giving Johnson's definition of coast : “ The edge or margin of the Land next the sea ; the shore. It is not used for the Banks of less waters.”

p. 502

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Is that in the original ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is in the original, my Lord. The author of the paper had apparently added a footnote. Then comes an enclosure with Confidential despatch of the 19th of August, 1853. “ Colonial Office, Downing Street, 4th June, 1853. Sir, In pursuance of the instructions given to us by the Duke of Newcastle, to take into consideration the project of Treaty which you have suggested for negotiation with France, in reference to the Newfoundland fisheries, and communicate with you on the subject, we transmit to you, herewith, a statement of such amendments of the project as we think, after the discussions which we have had with you, to be advisable, together with observations in explanation of them.” Then comes in parallel columns : “ Project of proposal to France for the Settlement of the Newfoundland Fishery Question.” on the left hand column and on the right hand column suggested amendments. It is very interesting to see how the topic was approached. “ 2nd—The term coast (the literal meaning of which is the shore or margin of the sea) being vague and open to contradictory interpretation, it is proposed to determine its signification with reference to the fishery rights in question, as follows : The word Coast, so far as it relates to French fishing, curing, or drying, and erection of scaffolds and huts for fishery purposes at Newfoundland, shall be understood to mean the strand and the ground extending inland one quarter of a mile from high-water mark ; and where any river, creek, arm of the sea, or other opening, less than three miles wide, intervenes, then a straight line drawn from headland to headland, across this aperture, shall be considered as equivalent to high water mark.” Upon that the comment, the possible modification, in the column on the right runs thus : “ We would suggest, in place of the first part of this proposition, Article 3 of our separate papers. This latter part of the proposition would shut out the French from several of the harbors now used by them. But as between Cape John and Bonne Bay there are no large river, nor any in which we understand the tide flows beyond a short distance, we suggest, instead of this latter passage, the insertion of a provision that the right of fishery shall in no case be enjoyed by the French in any creek, river, or stream, the flow of the tide, and shall be limited to salt water only, as in Article 2 of the separate paper. The following further concessions may be agreed to by Sir A. Perrier, if he can thereby bring his French Colleague to a final adjustment of this question :—1. Half a mile to be the Coast limits instead of a quarter of a mile.” Comment on the right hand : “ A quarter of a mile appears to us sufficient, but we see no particular objection to half a mile if desired by the French.” Then there is a third enclosure in that letter I think I might read the third paragraph of at line 22 : “ The operations in connection with the fishery, which the French shall have a right to conduct on shore, shall be limited to a strand bordering upon the waters in which the French shall have a right to fish as above defined, and extending inland a quarter of (or half) an English mile from high water mark. The French, however, shall be allowed to cut wood for the purposes contemplated in the British Declaration, attached to the Treaty of 1783, upon unoccupied land at such further distance inland from the strand as may not be inconvenient to the British Government.” Then there is an extract from a Despatch by the Rt. Hon. H. Labouchere to Governor Darling, dated 16th January, 1857, relative to the Convention between Great Britain and France of January 4th, 1857. “ The remaining stipulations of the Treaty may, as I believe, be classed not as concessions or alterations of existing rights, but as an endeavour to put into as definite a shape as the subject admitted, the right which usage, founded on the above-mentioned Treaties and Proclamations, has already sanctioned.” There was a legal right, but what was necessary to do because of controversies which had arisen was to convert the general terms into specific terms, and then you find on page 2188 and page 2189 : “ Extract from Convention between Great Britain and France”—I need only refer to Article X on page 2189 : “ The strand reserved for French exclusive use for fishery purpose shall extend to one-third of an English mile inland from high water mark, from Rock Point to Bonne Bay, inclusive, and at the four reserved harbours, south of Bonne Bay ; and from Bonne Bay to Cane St. John, to half an English mile inland from high water mark.” My Lord, that Convention never became operative because, it was not ratified, but so far as I can trace the reasons for its non-ratification did not depend at all on this Article. However, I cannot invoke it as a concluded and ratified Convention. It was agreed I take it between the Plenipotentiaries or between the representatives but did not become an International Convention, but it is very interesting, my Lords, because those engaged in this matter at the time were concerned in delimiting by measurement a right which under Treaty was not bounded at all but which was being delimited here in terms of use.

The LORD CHANCELLOR: It was only a temporary right of fishery that was in question. There was no territory put under the French Government.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord. It is rather striking, it caught my eye as I read it. “ A temporary right of fishing.” That echoes down from the terms of the Lords of Trade's Report where they said all that is contemplated is a temporary right of fishing in Labrador. It actually happens to be as far as I remember the very words that were used there.

The point was put to me as a difficulty that I was seeking here to suggest a boundary which had no precise physical definition. I submitted respectfully that that is no obstacle, that many rights have been conferred, even the Hudson's Bay Charter itself, one of the most important in our history, was conferred without any boundary at all, and the boundary becomes a matter of ascertainment as and when it is necessary to ascertain it, and the criterion for its ascertainment when the question does arise is to be found in the use—the necessity and use—you look at the nature of the grant and give all that is necessary to make the grant effective, which is the ordinary principle of interpretation of law, and you also use the practice and possession which has followed upon a grant, both of these are indicative of the extent of the grant which was proposed to be given, and as an illustration I suggest the French rights are interesting. My Lords, throughout those papers before your Lordships there are various distances indicated as the distances above high water mark necessary to be reserved for fishery purposes.

I might give two instances, one from the Instructions to Governor Elliot of Newfoundland in 1786, Volume II, page 549. That document from which I am about to read is the Instructions for John Elliot as Governor and Commander in Chief in and over the Island of Newfoundland, dated 2nd June, 1786, and in Article 7 on page 548 there is a recital that persons have been claiming “ as their private property large Tracts of Land and Beaches commodious for the Fishery upon the Coasts, and within the several Harbours and Rivers of the said Island and the islands adjacent contrary to Law. In order therefore, to prevent such unwarrantable practices in future ; It is Our Will and Pleasure that you do not upon any pretence whatsoever allow any Person or Persons to take as private property any Land, Rivers, or Islands on the Island of Newfoundland or the Coasts thereof,” between certain limits, “ and you are to take care that the Ancient Ship Rooms and Fishery Rooms do continue under the provisions of the Act of Parliament passed in the 10th and 11th Years of the Reign of King William the Third Cap 25 for the encouragement of new Adventurers,” and so on. May I pass now to the top of page 549, “ And it is Our further Will and Pleasure that the remaining

p. 505

Shores of Newfoundland shall be held by such of Our Subjects resorting thither from Our Dominions in Europe who shall first arrive and take possession of the same, for the like purpose of carrying on the Fishery in proportion to the number of Ships and Boats they shall employ, and they shall continue to hold the same in like manner and for the like purpose, so long as they shall continue to carry on the Fishery there” : the right on land is an appurtenant to the fishery ; it ceases when they cease to fish.

Viscount HALDANE : They there distinguish between “ Island ” and “ Coasts.”

Viscount FINLAY : It says “ the shores.”

Mr. MACMILLAN : The actual words here are, “ the remaining Shores of Newfoundland,” but up above, your Lordship is quite right, they refer to the Islands, “ to take as private property any land, Rivers, or islands on the Island of Newfoundland or the Coasts thereof.”

Lord WARRINGTON : That is confined to Newfoundland.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Certainly my Lord ; I thought that was quite clear. This is for the purpose of showing that the problem of delimiting the area necessary for the purpose of carrying on a fishery was no new problem.

Lord Sumner.

Sir JOHN SIMON : This was in 1786, when Newfoundland, of course, had not got any Labrador at all.

Mr. MACMILLAN: Yes. “ And you are not to allow or suffer any Buildings to be erected (except Fishing Stages, Cook Rooms, Ship Rooms and Flakes or such erections as shall be absolutely necessary for curing, salting, drying and Husbanding of Fish) within 600 Yards distance from High Water Mark, and you are not to allow any possession, as private property, to be taken of, or any right of property whatever acknowledged in any Land whatever even beyond that distance.” Now that was the position of the Governor of Newfoundland at this time.

2 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord SUMNER : It would appear there that the word “ Coasts ” of Newfoundland is treated as equivalent to “ Shores.”

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is my Lord, I think.

Lord Sumner.

Lord SUMNER : Because they use the word “ Shores ” on page 549. Of course, the presence of a word like that in this instrument would have a much more limiting effect.

Mr. MACMILLAN : No doubt, my Lord.
p. 506

Viscount HALDANE : There was a reason for it, it was for the drying and curing of fish.

Mr. MACMILLAN : And getting wood, and water also. I am not putting this as a case where you will find a stretch of shore territory delimited by the use to which. it was proposed to be devoted. The area is still further restricted in Governor Gower's Instructions in 1804, in the same Volume at page 621. This time we are in 1804, but this time the distance is fixed at 200 yards from high water mark.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord SUMNER : It comes to this, does not it : That when the Governor was instructed to deal with private persons with the object of defining what the private person may do, they find it necessary to give an actual limiting distance, but it does not carry one any further with regard to the Instructions of the Sovereign to the Governor on whom he is confirming jurisdiction, criminal and civil, and subsequently, I suppose, fiscal, over an area within which alone he is authorised to exercise it.

Mr. MACMILLAN: No, my Lord.

Lord SUMNER : It may be that it was not found necessary to be so particular in that case as with a fisherman who was given an area in which to fish ; but they surely must have regarded the words “ Coast of Labrador ” as something that would tell the Governor how far he could pursue a criminal and where he could arrest him, and bring him to St. John's for trial, and where they must recognise him as having a place beyond his jurisdiction.

Lord Sumner.

2 Nov., 1926.

Lord Sumner.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That was the difficulty Judge Pinsent felt ; he said in his correspondence ; I have got a criminal to deal with and the plea is taken that it is not within my jurisdiction and I have to consider what is the meaning of the word “ Coasts.” I am sure your Lordships will appreciate the purpose for which I am citing this. It is said, Why a mile ? Why not two miles ? Why not 50 miles, or why not half a mile ? I am merely for this purpose citing instances in which you get the criterion of measure. When a strip of shore is required as an appurtenant of a fishery right it is no new problem to have to delimit the extent of shore which is appropriate to be reserved for the fishery.

Viscount FINLAY: That is the essential thing, but it is a pendant to the fishery right.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Certainly.

Lord SUMNER : I can quite understand if there is a grant to private persons in these terms you might say, “ It is void for uncertainty ” ; but when you come to an instruction to one of His

p. 507

Majesty's Governors, subsequently adopted as the phraseology of a Statute, when you use that expression in a Statute it is hardly open to you to say it is void for uncertainty, it is only difficult to construe.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is the position which I would humbly accept : It is difficult to construe ; I am not submitting it is void for uncertainty.

Lord SUMNER: At the same time it is put to us to construe, and it has a construction which we have to express.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is so. Of course, the difficulty of defining a boundary of that sort was nowhere better exemplified than in the case of Hudson's Bay where also there was an implicit boundary, that no one has yet discovered, and it has been the subject of much legal investigation ; now it will not require to be defined ; the end of the controversy was that it was not defined. It is my unhappy lot to argue to your Lordships how these things should be defined.

Lord SUMNER : I do not know that yours is the unhappy lot.

Lord FINLAY : We have to find out how it has been determined.

The Lord Warrington.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is what it is, to ascertain something which is physical by means of language which is not physical.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I think it was proposed at one time to determine the Hudson Bay Boundary in this Court.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It was, my Lord. Your Lordships appreciate exactly where I am trying to put it, I hope neither too high nor too low, I want to get it poised in a proper point of view in order that your Lordships may be in a position to pass judgment on our rival contentions with a full appreciation of our rival implications. For the moment I was dealing with the topic of the difficulty of defining a boundary when called upon to do so by something which in the text is not defined but is described, and I use the distinction advisedly : something which is not defined, but described, and what is to be done here is to elicit from a description the definition.

2 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

The Lord Warrington.

Lord WARRINGTON: The thing they are dealing with here is not so much the boundary, but they are delimiting the extent of the right which is conferred by the right of fishery, delimiting what is incidental to the right of fishing.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I accept that.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord WARRINGTON : In this Commission, we have administrative powers granted to the Governor, which is not quite the same thing.

3 Y

p. 508

Mr. MACMILLAN : I only used that language because it accorded with the language of the question put, which is “ the location of the boundary between Newfoundland and Canada,” therefore for the moment I slipped into that language, but your Lordship is quite right ; when one is looking at the grant to Newfoundland, the question is : what did Newfoundland get.

Lord WARRINGTON : It is very much like if I had a servitude, an easement or right to fish on another man's land, and I asked him to define with me what things there are I can do incidental to that right ; amongst other things it might be : How far into his land am I entitled to go.

Lord Sumner.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is a type of problem that I am sure the Courts have often had to deal with. May I leave it in this position : If my learned friends is not able to satisfy your Lordships—I mean satisfy your Lordships conclusively—that the height of land inwards is the boundary, or is the measure of the grant, putting it in either form, this height of land for which he contends, if I can dislodge him from that position, and if your Lordships are not satisfied that 1763 that was implicit—my learned friend's word was “ inherent ”—in the grant ; if your Lordships are not satisfied that it was inherent in the grant to Newfoundland in that accepted view, that this height of land line was the Westward limit of Newfoundland, then my learned friend and I will become engaged in exactly the same question, we will both be persons determining the extent of the coast, it not being limited by the height of land, but being limited by some other criterion. If my contention hitherto has affected your Lordships mind at all, in the direction of displacing this height of land, as the then, the 1763, contemplated boundary, then your Lordships will have to consider the problem from Newfoundland's side and from Canada's side with no criterion except the criterion of what is the amount of coast which was intended to be given to the jurisdiction of Newfoundland, what was put under the care and inspection of the Governor of Newfoundland in 1763, having regard to the purposes with which he was installed there and having regard to the extent of the use and exercise of powers in the territory which was confided to him.

Lord SUMNER : Let me see if I follow. If you get rid of the height of land to the West, then you have the whole limit between that line and the sea shore in which the boundary is latent, and always has been latent since 1763, and we have to bring it to the surface. We have no guidance, apparently, except the convenience or the requisiteness of a particular line for the fishery upon the sea shore as from the sea, and we are somehow or other to venture into a wilderness which we have never seen, and which the eye of civilised man has only very imperfectly seen, and discover where in 1763 they caused a line to be latent in the Proclamation and Commission.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord Sumner.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN: The height of land is said to be latent in 1763.

Lord SUMNER : It is there, but the line seaward is still more latent, because where it was in 1763 we do not know.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is not for me to contend with your Lordship, but I can only suggest : take the case between France and Britain with regard to the shore rights. they are not proprietary rights, but rights with regard to which, had we not been able to come to some agreement, there might have been a casus belli, and an equally serious tribunal might have had to consider the question of delimiting the sufficiency of the margin of Newfoundland to answer the rights which the French had there.

Lord SUMNER : Under a different form of reference we might have had to do it, and could have done it if we were Boundary Commissioners, or geographers, by parallels of latitude and longitude ; but here we have to say what was meant in advance, by people who did not know where it would be convenient for the line to go back, because the fishery along there was a thing which was new as far as the Governor was concerned—where they conceived it to be latent. It is like the famous black hat in a dark cellar which was not there.

Lord Sumner.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I do not belittle the difficulty of the problems, but on the other hand I do not think it would be legitimate to seek refuge in my learned friend's contention merely because it happens to be an easier one to adopt. I admit the attractiveness of it presented as attractively as it was. After all, if you take the Hudson Bay case, there there was a latent boundary also, a latent boundary which has never been discussed and which down to 1814, when the Opinion was obtained, was considered to be elsewhere; and indeed prior to 1763, as the Newfoundland case tells us itself, it was not regarded as the height of land.

Lord SUMNER : In that case they were able to show it.

2 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

The Lord Chancellor.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It re-appeared again in the Ontario-Manitoba case; it was insisted on there with vigour as it is insisted on here, and it was answered : No, it shall not prevail against possession, there have been French possessions beyond the line ; that was one of the considerations. There was also the consideration of the Lake of the Woods point and the other point ; but these things had the effect that the Hudson's Bay height of land boundary had to give way ; they said, “ You have not proved that is the Hudson's Bay Boundary.”

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord SUMNER : What is the evidence of possession here ? If what we are seeking was latent in 1763, how does the possessory exercise of this by the Governor of Newfoundland operate ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Only in this sense, that if the grant be indefinite in extent, it may be necessary to render it definite, then you are entitled, as in the case of prescription, to resort to the extent of the possession as the badge of the ownership. I am only invoking that doctrine.
3 Y 2

p. 510

The Lord Chancellor.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : It depends on what the possession is ; it depends on what the nature of the grant is, I suppose ; although, of course, the possession down to modern times might be used.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Your Lordship recalls the terms of one of the Opinions I read yesterday where the point was put quite clearly that you must have regard to possession, and then came the Opinion of the Law Officer, Mr. Bethel, as he then was, where he said that you must have regard to claims that were put forward at the Treaty of Utrecht and Ryswick and 1750 ; all these are relevant matters in considering what is the territorial boundary of Hudson's Bay. All that shows, does it not, that the relatively easy refuge of the height of land, however attractive it may be, is not necessarily conclusive of this matter, and that the mere difficulty of ascertaining and bringing to the surface a latent boundary by the use of those criteria, which I suggest, namely, the purpose of the grant and the possession had under the grant—

The LORD CHANCELLOR : It does not mean that the whole of the land claimed must have been possessed in the ordinary sense of possession but rather that there are acts of possession.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Your Lordship corrected me quite properly. It is not quite like private ownership, where you are describing the content of private properties. In territorial possession it is true certain acts of possession may be treated as the badge of a much larger acquisition ; and one has in mind certain much canvassed doctrines of international law on that subject, which we are not relying on here ; but I am much concerned with this aspect of the case, because I see how your Lordships are impressed with it : the contrast, on the one hand, with the suggestion which is inherent in this, ab initio, that it was an ascertainable boundary of the height of land although such a boundary was not mentioned and though the terms, in my humble submission, were not apt to designate that—

Viscount FINLAY : It has not been urged that the possession up to the height of land was necessary for the fishing rights ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, it was not put that way ; it was put this way with much force: you must assume an interior boundary, because it is conceded that this is not merely a notional mathematical line. We start in agreement there, that there is some depth. Then I am confronted with this : “ Well, it being common ground that there is some depth inland, what is to arrest my progress as Governor of Newfoundland until I reach the height of land. May I not proceed in my own Government until I reach the height of land ; what else is there to stop me ?” and since that it is said that this physiographical boundary was inherent or implicit in the language used in 1763, and that if that had been written at large it would have been “ That you shall be Governor of the Coast of Labrador from the Sea Coast to the height of land.” That is as the grant is now expounded. Are your Lordships minded to hold that if the problem had been presented in that way to the framers of Captain Graves' Commission in 1763, that his Commission would ever have been framed in such language ; that he was to be Governor from the sea coast to the height of land ? My Lords, it is certainly curiously inconsistent with the terminology of the Proclamation. The Proclamation you may remember excludes two things from this territory, it excludes Quebec and it excludes Hudson's Bay ; and Hudson's Bay at that time, according to the Mitchell Map which was before them, cut off a considerable bit of the North End towards Cape Chidley, yet there is no exclusion of Newfoundland at all, although, ex hypothesi[SIC], Newfoundland has got that grant, which is now being invested with all the authority of a territorial grant, which may be still of equal validity with the Hudson's Bay grant seated in this place at the time the Proclamation is made. There is no exception of anything ; you have given jurisdiction to Newfoundland.

The Lord Chancellor.

Mr. Macmillan.

The Lord Chancellor.

Mr. Macmillan.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I feel great doubt about that map being before them. I think if they imagine that Hudson's Bay had jurisdiction some distance down from Cape Chidley, they could hardly have put that part of the coast under the jurisdiction of the Governor.

Mr. MACMILLAN: One can find support for almost any point in these volumes. I can answer your Lordship, if I may say so, almost to the letter on that question, if any Lord will be so good as to pardon me trying to answer your Lordship's point.

2 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I remember your reading it from the case for Newfoundland, but I feel some doubt whether that particular sentence could justify it.

Mr. MACMILLAN : May I try and do it in an altogether different way, not that way ; this is again one of those small things which are often significant. Will your Lordship turn to Volume III for the moment, to see if I can answer it. As your Lordship has raised the point, I should like to see if I can do it. If you turn to Volume III, page 1080, what is happening there is that in the year 1773, and we are just at this period therefore, the Lords of Trade are considering an application by one John Agnew for a grant of minerals on the Coast of Labrador. Would your Lordships look at the second paragraph of that document. Perhaps I should read first what he asked for.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I read it.

p. 512

Lord Warrington.

Mr. MACMILLAN : But the significance of it, I think, was not brought out, and I did not intervene when it was being read. On the “ Coast or country of Labrador between the River St. Laurence and Hudson's Streights at a certain limited distance not exceeding 60 miles from the sea”—now that is what Agnew wanted. This is the reply : “ That the proposition contained in the Petition, which your Lordships have referred to our consideration, does not in the general view of it appear liable to objection : we beg leave however to observe to your Lordships, that the description of the limits, within which the petitioners propose the Grant to be made to them, appears to us, so far as it regards the Labrador Coast, to be attended with some difficulty ; for, as on the one hand the proposing the River St. Lawrence as the Boundary to the South is not sufficiently precise ; so, on the other hand, by extending the Grant Northward to Hudson's Streights, they will take in a very large part of what has been already granted to the Hudson's Bay Company,” now observe the significance of that ; this is the attitude of the Lords of Trade at this time, in 1773. What is before them ? An application for a coast grant from the River St. Lawrence to the Hudson's Streights.

Lord WARRINGTON : And 60 miles inland.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : And 60 miles inland.

Lord WARRINGTON : May it not be that it was the 60 miles inland which would encroach on the Hudson's Bay territory, up at that top part ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : With great respect that part at the North there chimes exactly with Mitchell's Map.

Lord WARRINGTON : If you look at the scale, if you go south from Cape Chidley 60 miles would take in the whole of that promontory and rather more. I only suggest it may be explained by that.

Sir JOHN SIMON: That was the suggestion I made at page 195 of the Shorthand Notes ; we look at it from that point of view.

2 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Would your Lordships look at it from my point of view for the moment. My point of view is that there was an authoritative map hanging in the King's Library at that time which shows that boundary which—I do not hold my learned friends to their Pleadings too much—but which they at least thought was in the minds of everybody at the time, and which fits exactly with the idea expressed in 1773. If you are going up to Hudson's Straits you will take in a very large part of what has already been granted to the Hudson's Bay Company, “ who are entitled by their Charter to all mines and minerals within the territories granted to theme.” That would be exactly so if Mitchell's Map was the map these gentlemen were looking at ; because

p. 513

Lord Warrington.

the moment they look at Mitchell's Map they would see the inset map which shows that would necessarily take in a large part of what Hudson's Bay had.

Viscount HALDANE : What was the exact date of Mitchell's Map ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : 1755, but it was brought down to date by all those additions marked upon it ; it was used, so to speak, as the basis map by which His Majesty was informed from time to time of what was going on.

Viscount HALDANE : This was after the Treaty of Utrecht.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes. Oswald's line is marked on it also.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord WARRINGTON : That was after the Treaty of Utrecht, and after the discussion had taken place in consequence of that Treaty, when certain proposals were made with regard to the boundary ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Your case is that in 1763 there was granted to Newfoundland the whole of this very area.

Lord Warrington.

Mr. MACMILLAN : A coastal strip, yes, my Lord.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Which they thought was under Hudson's Bay.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : They thought that, my Lord, and you will see, in a moment, why they thought it, because at this time, my submission is going to be, the Lords of Trade were thinking in terms of “ care and inspection ” only, and were not thinking in territory at all. I shall be able to vouch that, I think explicitly, from certain of their reports I am coming to. However, your Lordship asked me if I could suggest anything better than the map, and I humbly offer that for my Lord's consideration.

Lord WARRINGTON : Then there is the act of 1774 ; Parliament, in 1774, thought there was a good deal more than “ care and inspection ” involved.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is for your Lordships to judge. In order to complete my account of Newfoundland I should give your Lordships a reference to three documents in Volume IV. My Lord Finlay asked me yesterday to indicate when Newfoundland really changed over from the fishing station idea to the idea of a residential colony and I gave, you may remember, a letter of Lord Bathurst's, which your Lordship was good enough to say dealt with the point ; but you will find in the Reports of the Lords of Trade at this period, some very striking observations about Newfoundland which indicate, as I have said, the whole aspect of the Governor of Newfoundland. What was in the minds of the Lords of Trade was the aspect of him as a person in charge of fisheries, and that Newfoundland's interests were really fishery interests.

Then at page 1848 there is a representation from the Lords of Trade to His Majesty, which is dated the 29th of April, 1765. There your Lordships will find a discussion. I am not going to read it, because it is too long ; but I will content myself with giving your Lordships a reference to it. You will find a discussion on the position of the fisheries, and of Newfoundland itself.

Then at the foot of page 1850, after the discussion, you will find a recommendation at line 42, and the recommendation is : “ That Your Majesty's Governor should be instructed not to allow any exclusive Possession to be taken of any Lands, Rivers or Islands, as private Property, in the northern Parts of Newfoundland, upon Pretence of the aforesaid Proviso in the Act of Parliament”—the proviso related to fishing places on the shore—“ or of Grants from Governors, who never had any Authority by their Commission to make such Grants ; and that he take Care, that the fishing Ships do choose their Stations as they respectively arrive, and do take up, subject to his Controul, such Space only of Beach as shall be proportioned to the number of their Boats ; conformable to the Directions of the Act of King William ”— that is the Act of 1699. Then passing down to line 18 on the same page it says : “ The Consideration of what may be ultimately proper to be done for establishing the whole of this valuable Branch of the national Commerce and Possessions upon such a Basis, and under such Regulations, as that Your Majesty's Subjects may derive all the advantages they are capable of affording, is of very great Extent, and depends upon a great Variety of Facts and Circumstances, which have as yet been but little known or understood ; and therefore it will be our Duty to proceed to lay before your Majesty as briefly as possible, what appears to be in general the present State of the Island of Newfoundland.” Now, my Lords, there you find set out the present state of the Island of Newfoundland, and of the territories lately annexed thereto, and of the fisheries belonging to each of them respectively.

Viscount HALDANE : Line 31 is rather instructive, and the three or four lines which follow it.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord. The whole thing will be found there, but I do not delay over it because it is more or less familiar to your Lordships.

Lord WARRINGTON : This is in the year 1765 ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes my Lord, 1765, at which time Newfoundland had a Labrador coast.

p. 515

Lord WARRINGTON : The expression “ the territories lately annexed thereto ” means Labrador, whatever the extent of it may be.

Mr. MACMILLAN: Yes. my Lord, I think so that ; phrase is frequently used.

Then it goes on to tell you what is the state of matters there, and about the ships coming, and that they are to go back and all the rest of it. Then they say that the original scheme because to some extent encroached upon by people upon staying on the island ; and after setting out the state of matters there, they say, at line 29 on page 1853: “ Such, may it please Your Majesty, is the melancholy Picture, which Your Majesty's Governor draws of the State of the Island of Newfoundland, and we fear, in most parts of it hears but too just a Resemblance ; this alone therefore we trust is sufficient to evince the Necessity of an immediate Attention to so important a Part of the national Interest,” and so on.

The Lord Chancellor.

Then they say : “ The Principles, upon which the Newfoundland Fishery was established and carried on under the great Western Charter and which the Act of King William attempts to restore, are, as far as they extend, so true in Policy, and the Arguments in Support of that Plan are so plausible, that it should seem at the first View of it to admit of no Competition ; since by confining the Fishery to Ships from Great Britain, and requiring those Ships to take out and bring back a certain Number of Green Men every year, it not only supposes a large Increase of Sea Men, but also offers to ensure to these Kingdoms the exclusive and immediate Supply of every Article of Consumption in this Branch of Trade.” That is all the cod fishery, the sea fishery.

Mr. Macmillan.

Then it goes on to point out that the scheme had failed in its execution because it was impracticable by regulations to prevent that inhabitancy which was beginning to take place in the island.

The LORD CHANCELLOR:. It is a question of altering what has been called the Palliser policy, is it not, and allowing settlement in some parts of the island ? Is not that the point that they are discussing?

2 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : They are discussing that, my Lord, but they are discussing whether, there having been a departure de facto to some extent from the regime, it should be made legitimate. They do not give their commendation to it there, but they say that it is a difficulty. But in their next report of the 17th March, 1786, which is to be found on page 1868, they go further into the matter and become more precise. In passing, will your Lordships just kindly note page 1861, where you find Governor Palliser's remarks on the present state of management of the Newfoundland fishery, because there I find the expression, " the open and free fishery," which you may remember is the language used in the Proclamation as evincing the object of it. If I may read from page 1861 at line 6. it says this : " Upon the Whole, if no Inhabitants were allowed, but the Fishery to be laid open and free to all the King's

p. 516

Sir John Simon.

Subjects, and carried on by Ship Fishers, or even if the Ship Fishery were only restored to the original Footing, as directed by the Act of the 10th and 11th of William the Third, it most certainly would occasion double the Quantity of Fish to be taken, a Yearly Return of more Men to England than now returns to France, instead of Two or Three thousand Men, as at present, we should have, in Time of Danger, a Yearly Return of 30,000 always ready for our Fleets ; this Addition of Wealth and Strength to the State would always be increasing." You observe how the Governor is looking at the matter: his concern is to preserve the regime under which Newfoundland was made a nursery for seamen for the British Navy, and the fishery he is speaking of, and which he thinks should be open and free, is the open and free fishery which it was the purpose of the annexation to Newfoundland to effectuate.

Sir JOHN SIMON: He is talking of Newfoundland itself.

Mr. MACMILLAN: Yes, Newfoundland itself, at that stage. —well, I am not absolutely sure, Sir John. Is he? It is in 1765, when you had some of Labrador, you know. It may be so. I think he is speaking of the fishery generally, but for my present purpose it is not material. Then I think that they come to rather closer grips with the question.

Mr. Macmillan.

Sir JOHN SIMON: If I may interrupt for one moment, the reason why I thought so was because in this document, as in the previous one, you get an indication as to the population. If you look at the bottom of page 1858, in line 29, you see that it says : " We have, according to the Accounts I have collected, 16,000 People remaining in that Country during the Winter, but I am satisfied they are 20,000 of which 10,000 are Men who are all totally lost, for they (a very few excepted) have no Employment During the Winter," and so on. I think that must have meant the island of Newfoundland.

Mr. MACMILLAN: Yes.

The LORD CHANCELLOR: There is a reference to Labrador on page 1860.

Sir JOHN SIMON: An incidental one, yes, my Lord.

Mr. MACMILLAN: What I am concerned with at the moment is depicting the state of Newfoundland.

Then on page 1868 the Lords of Trade recur to the matter, and this time they have considered it with some precision, because a Bill has been brought in the House of Commons in the last Session of Parliament to make more effectual an Act made for the encouragement of the fisheries carried on from Great Britain Ireland and the British Dominions in Europe; and they went into this matter very closely.

p. 517

On page 1869 you get the considered opinion of the Lords of Trade in the year 1786, with regard to the Newfoundland Fishery position. Perhaps I ought to read from line 29 on the preceding page, where it says : “ And the Committee having perused and considered a Representation of the Lords Commissioners for Trade and Plantations, made to his Majesty King George the First in 1718, which gives a very full account of the State of the Newfoundland Fishery, previous to that Period, and of the Policy which the Government and Legislature of this Kingdom had from the First Establishment of that Fishery adopted and pursued in respect to this great Object—do concur in General in the Opinions entertained by the said Lords Commissioners on the following Points : First. That the Newfoundland Fishery ought to be carried on as much as possible by Ships fitted out from Your Majesty's European Dominions; that by the Yearly Return of the Sailors and Fishermen to the said Dominions, Your Majesty may have it in Your Power to avail Yourself of their Services for manning Your Royal Navy, when Occasion may require. Secondly”—now, my Lords, I venture to ask that this may be underlined—“That your Majesty's Subjects who may from Time to Time reside in Newfoundland, ought never to be allowed to form themselves into a Colony, and with that View to possess in Fee any Landed Property there. Thirdly. That the Shores of Newfoundland, the Beaches, and other convenient Fishing Places, ought to be carefully reserved for the Accommodation of Your Majesty's Subjects, resorting thither from Your Majesty's European Dominions, for the Purpose of carrying on the said Fishery. And Fourthly. That Your Majesty's Subjects who so resort Annually to the said Island of Newfoundland should be induced and compelled, by every wise and proper Regulation, to return to Your Majesty's European Dominions at the End of every Fishing Season.”

Now, my Lords, that is the kind of policy which was in the mind of this country with reference to Newfoundland at this period when the Governor of Newfoundland was selected to be the Governor of the coast of Labrador. He was a person whose policy in Newfoundland was to be governed by a series of considerations deliberately adopted. There was to be no Colony in Newfoundland; there was to be no possession in fee of any landed property at all—

2 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount HALDANE: Some of them were to remain during the winter to keep the thing going.

Mr. MACMILLAN: Yes, my Lord, there was a permission to do that, but there was to be no property acquired by any British subject in Newfoundland in fee at all. There was to be a carrying on of the Newfoundland fishery, and the shores of Newfoundland were to be carefully reserved for the accommodation of His Majesty's subjects.

Now will your Lordships look again, if I may suggest it respectfully, at how that chimes in with the conception that I am endeavouring to place before your Lordships. A Governor whose system of administration was such as this, has an extension, has something added to his governorship. It is the coast of Labrador. According to my learned friend, it is a territory extending right in to the height of land, when the matters which this Governor was concerned with were to see that nobody settled and that no property was acquired, and he was to superintend the fishery and the carrying out of the Regulations of the Act of 1699. No civil government seems to be contemplated there at all in that policy.

In this connection, it is interesting to notice on page 1870 at line 28 that they “ advise Your Majesty to give Your Governor of Newfoundland the following Instructions on this Subject: First. That the ancient Ship Rooms and Fishing Rooms should continue under the Provisions of the Act of Parliament passed in the 10th and 11th Years of the Reign of King William, Cap. 25, for the Encouragement of new Adventurers, that they may be sure of finding proper and convenient Places for curing, salting, drying, and husbanding their Fish, whenever they resort thither”—that is cod fishing again. “ Secondly. That the remaining Shores of Newfoundland should be held by such of Your Majesty's Subjects, resorting thither from Your Majesty's European Dominions, as shall first take Possession of them, for the Purpose of carrying on the Fishery, in proportion to the Number of Ships and Boats they shall employ; and that they shall continue to hold the same for the like purposes, and in like Manner, so long as they shall carry on their Fishery there; but that in case they shall neglect so to carry on their Fishery there for One entire Season, such Shores, or Parts thereof, as shall be so neglected or deserted, shall be held for the like Purpose and in like Manner, by any other of Your Majesty's Subjects resorting thither from Your Majesty's European Dominions, who shall first occupy the same for the purpose of carrying on the Fishery, and that the Governor should put and maintain such Person or Persons in Possession thereof. Thirdly. That the Governor should not suffer any Buildings to be erected (except Fishing Stages, Cook Rooms, Ship Rooms, and Flakes, or such Erections as shall be absolutely necessary for curing, salting, drying and husbanding their Fish) within Six hundred Yards distance of High Water Mark, and that Care should be taken that no Right of Property be acknowledged in any Land or Building, even beyond that Distance,” and so on. Then at line 30 on page 1872 it says : “ And it is still more necessary not to depart from these Distinctions with respect to Newfoundland, as it would tend to encourage Residence there, which, as before stated, it has ever been the Policy of the Government of this Kingdom to prevent.”

Then there is one more Report of the Lords of Trade on page 1876, which is dated the 10th May, 1790. There is a complaint by traders there that a Court had been established in the Island of Newfoundland by Vice Admiral Milbanke, His Majesty's Governor of the Island, and the question comes up from consideration by the Lords of Trade. Curiously enough, it does not come up upon a complaint that there is no Court, but upon a complaint by the merchant adventurers that there is a Court there.

Viscount HALDANE : Is there anything to show by what law that Court was set up ? Was it a Court established by the Lord High Admiral ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : I think it purported to be a Court of Vice-Admiralty.

Viscount HALDANE : And it probably was. Was it called a Court of Common Pleas ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord, consisting of four Commissioners.

Lord WARRINGTON : The original Commission authorised the setting up of a Court.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord.

2 Nov., 1926.
Viscount Haldane.

Viscount FINLAY : Apparently the Court was kept open daily for the constant interruption of the fishery trade by continually issuing orders.

Viscount Finlay.

Mr. Macmillan.

Sir John Simon.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord; this obnoxious Court seems to have caused a good deal of trouble. I think the legality of the Court was questioned, and its existence at all; but I have not got the reference to that now, and I may be mistaken about it.

Mr. Macmillan.

Now, my Lords, the Committee came to be of opinion at page 1878, line 10, “ that a proper Court of civil jurisdiction should be established in the Island of Newfoundland, specially constituted for the Purpose of trying such Questions as are not now provided for by any Act of Parliament ” —

2 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Sir JOHN SIMON : The answer to the question put by my Lord Haldane I think must be that by the terms of the successive Commissions to the Governors of Newfoundland, one of their express authorities, delegated to them, was to appoint Judges and Courts ; so that it was within the terms of the Commission, both before the Commission extended to Labrador and afterwards. Is not that so ?

The LORD CHANCELLOR : And I think in the Instructions also.

Sir JOHN SIMON : In the Instructions also, my Lord.

Viscount HALDANE : The Court of Common Pleas created by Vice Admiral Milbanke may be just a Common Law Court.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Probably so, my Lord. I am afraid I am not sufficiently familiar with it. He was to appoint Commissioners of Oyer and Terminer.

p. 520

Sir JOHN SIMON : Here is the passage : “ appoint Judges and in Cases requisite Commissioners of Over and Terminer.”

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes. Mr. Attorney and Mr. Solicitor were consulted by the Lords of Trade, and at the foot of page 1878 you find this : “ Mr. Attorney and Solicitor-General are desired to take Notice, that the Government of this Country, having always considered the Trade of Newfoundland merely as a Fishery, to be carried on solely by the Subjects of His Majesty's European Dominions, it has always been the Wish of Government to bring back the Fishermen at the End of every Season to the Ports of the said Dominions, and to prevent their establishing themselves as a Colony in Newfoundland. With this View no Civil Commission was given to the Governor, who goes out Annually, till about the Year (blank), and no Court was established for trying Crimes of any Sort till about the year (blank), but all Criminals were to be brought Home to Great Britain, to be tried under the Authority of the Act of 10th and 11th W. III. Ch. 25. That of late Years a greater Number of His Majesty's Subjects continue to reside at Newfoundland during the Winter, after the Fishing Season is at an End, than formerly. That the Committee of Privy Council see this Circumstance with Regret, thinking it contrary to ancient Policy, and the true Interests of this Country, and wish to prevent it as much as possible. The Attorney and Solicitor General are desired also to take Notice, that much the greater Number of the Fishermen are extremely poor and ignorant, and thereby very much exposed to be defrauded by those with whom they deal.” Now the learned Lord Officers returned an opinion, and it is rather interesting to see what their opinion was. This was what I had in my mind : “ That the Court of Common Pleas erected last Year by Your Majesty's Governor is not founded on any Authority legally given to the said Governor, and cannot be supported or justified by Law.” That is on page 1879. I thought there was something about it. So that the Merchants were justified in complaining of being brought to a Court which, in the opinion of the Law Officers, had no jurisdiction at all.

2 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount FINLAY : They wasted their time.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes. It was a Court which had no authority, according to the Law Officers of the Crown. I thought there was a passage to that effect, but I hesitated to state it categorically until I had had it verified; but here one lights upon it by accident : “ That the Court of Common Pleas erected last Year by Your Majesty's Governor is not founded on any Authority legally given to the said Governor, and cannot be supported or justified by Law. That they do not find that any Court of Judicature is established in the Island of Newfoundland, excepting in the Special Cases mentioned in the Acts of Parliament 10th and 11th W. III. Ch. 25; and 15th and 26th of Your Majesty, Ch. 31 and 26; And that as Your Majesty is not precluded, by any Provision in the Acts before mentioned, nor by any other Acts with which they are acquainted, from so doing, Your Majesty may, by virtue of Your Royal Prerogative by Commission under the Great Seal, establish a Court of Civil Judicature for the Purpose of hearing and determining all Questions that may arise of the Nature hereinbefore mentioned. And they further report”—This is the Law Officers—“ They further report, that after paying due Attention to the peculiar Policy of this Kingdom, with respect to the Territory of Newfoundland, which has always been directed to discourage the Subjects of these Kingdoms from establishing themselves in that island, and to encourage the Return of the Fishermen and Seamen to these Kingdoms, they had prepared, conformably to the Directions of the Committee, a general Outline of a Court of Civil Judicature, in Cases not yet provided for by any Act of Parliament which is as follows” ; then they set out a plan for a Court, and they say that it may be advisable to erect a Court of Civil Jurisdiction.

Your Lordships might just note, along with that, a reference to page 929 in Volume III. This is the 25th November, 1763, after Governor Graves had got his Commission. This is addressed by the Lords of Trade to the Committee of the Privy Council for Plantation Affairs, and it says : “ My Lords,—Pursuant to your Lordships Order on the 31st of December 1762, we have considered the Memorial of Richard Gridley a reduced Captain of General Shirley's first Regiment of Foot, now on half pay, praying that His Majesty would confirm to him by grant his possession of the Islands of Madelaine in the Gulph of St. Lawrence Where he alleges to have made an Establishment, and improved a considerable Fishery for Seals and Sea Cows; and we beg leave to report to your Lordships, that tho' we think that all possible encouragement ought to be given to every usefull undertaking of this King, and that the petitioner may have merit in the improvements he has made, yet, as His Majesty has not thought proper to establish any Form of Civil Government in the Lands and Islands comprized within the Commission of the Governor of Newfoundland, it does not appear to us to consist with propriety to make for the present the grant prayed for by Captain Gridley.” You will notice there that the Island of Madelaine was one of the islands that had been annexed to Newfoundland in 1763.

Lord Sumner.

2 Nov., 1926.

Lord SUMNER : What is the inference which you draw from that ? That is two months after the Proclamation.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord.

LORD SUMNER : The other was antecedent to the Proclamation.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord.

Lord Sumner.

LORD SUMNER : What is the conclusion to be drawn from it ? Is it that he should not have the grant which he asked for, namely, confirming him in his possession of the Madelaine Islands, because His Majesty has not thought proper yet to establish any civil government ? Is that because the whole territory, islands and all, was to be regarded as a sort of camp occupied by armed forces, and therefore, it would be out of place.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I rather thought this, that it was to be a place to which fishermen should resort, and the Government was the government of the Governor of Newfoundland, confined to keeping order among the fisherman there during the period when they were there, and, of course, incidentally, regulating the disputes which must have arisen among them with regard to their rights along the coast of Labrador. There was to be no private property at all, but there must be somebody there to prevent rows breaking out among the people as they arrived there and planted themselves on the coast for the season.

The Lord Chancellor.

Lord SUMNER : It may mean that it is premature to give a civil proprietary grant until there is a civil government to enforce it, and able to protect him.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : But it was added to Newfoundland, and I have read the passages where it stated that there was no proper civil administration there at all, and one Court which was set up was held to be illegal.

Lord SUMNER : But that is the representation, that until there is a civil government, it is no use giving a proprietary grant ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Is it not rather confirmed by the previous letter, which is even closer to this case ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Page 928, my Lord.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : The letter where they speak of Labrador, and say : “ There is yet no civil government established in this country.”

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord, and apparently none could be. I rather underline the words “ comprised within the Commission.” The Commission does not authorise the setting up of a system of civil government in the Islands.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Surely the phrase “ comprised within the Commission ” governs “ lands and islands,” does it not ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Well, it is not a large point, but there it is. I propose now, having given your Lordships a picture of the Governor of Newfoundland to the best of my ability, and clothed him with the powers that he has, and indicated to your Lordships what was the purview of his task in the Island of Newfoundland, and that he was a person who was selected to have the Coast of Labrador handed to him, to suggest the motive of doing that, which was the motive expressed, and that motive—to the end the fishery may be carried on—abundantly justified the selection of the Governor of Newfoundland, and there was extended to him the charge of the fisheries, with rights on the land comparable with those which were extended to him in his original jurisdiction on the coast of Newfoundland.

Now I want to pass to another question which is rather an interesting one. The Commissions and Instructions which were given to the Governors of Newfoundland at this critical time have been alluded to by my learned friend, and I, in my turn, want to make one or two comments upon them. Your Lordships will remember that the first Governor of Newfoundland, under the new regime was Captain Graves. His period of office was so short that we have practically no record of what he did, because his Commission, which is to be found in Volume I, at page 149, was dated the 25th April, 1763, and he came out on his ship and remained on his ship, and in October, 1763, he returned to this country; so that in that year he had barely time to address himself to his task, and, therefore, there seems to be very little record of what he did.

But his successor in office was a person of much vigour. Hugh Palliser obtained his Commission on the 9th April, 1764, and that is to be found in Volume II, on page 411. For the next four or five years after that he annually went out to Newfoundland, and remained there in the usual way throughout the fishing season. He was Governor until 1768, and he must have left Newfoundland for the last time, as far as I can gather, in October 1768, because the Commission to his successor is in the following spring, the year 1769. He was there for a long time. He had a rather troubled reign, because he came into conflict with Quebec at a very early stage of his career, and there is an exchange of amenities between him and the Governor of Quebec. But the instructions which were given to Governor Graves, and which were repeated and amplified in the instructions given to Governor Palliser, contain some matter of interest. My learned friend made his text on Governor Graves's Instructions, but you will find corresponding articles in Governor Palliser's Instructions. I am taking Governor Graves's Instructions first of all, because that was that series to which my learned friend alluded. The Instructions to Governor Graves are to be found in Volume II at page 391. This document has been before your Lordships more than once, but I have to take up a point or two with regard to it, lest it should be thought that I have overlooked my learned friend's comments about it. I have already referred to these instructions for the purpose of showing that the prime consideration, the first topic which was dealt with, was the enforcements of the provisions of the Treaty of Utrecht. That was a purely fishery matter, as your Lordships see, and was the matter upon which attention was concentrated before the Lords of Trade addressed themselves to the territorial question at all. My learned friend drew attention to Articles 7 and 8 in particular, and I must in passing controvert, or at least suggests that it is possible to controvert, the suggestion of my learned friend with regard to line 30 on page 393.

My learned friend seems to think that Davis's Inlet and Lake Melville or the Hamilton Inlet were being confused there. That was the suggestion. It is enough for me at this moment to say that I respectfully differ, because on the maps at this period you find both Davis Inlet and Esquimaux Bay, which is Hamilton Inlet. I only say that in passing lest it be taken that I have admitted my learned friend's interpretation, but it is not for that purpose that I have alluded to this.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord. There is a very interesting little bit of history attached to it. One knows the anxiety which was felt in maritime circles at that period to see if it was possible to get a North–West passage; and any opening on the North Coast of America was always hoped to be an avenue to the North–West passage. Indeed, there are Acts of Parliament at this time, two of them, offering a reward of £20,000 to anybody who would find a North–West passage. It was made a matter of parliamentary sanction at this time.

This Naval gentleman is told to “ visit all the coasts and harbours of the said islands and territories,” and so on, and make maps and surveys of them. It seems to be a most excellent task to give to this Naval officer. Then he is to see if he can find out if Davis's Inlet be or be not the North–west passage. But the matter is of a very maritime flavour indeed.

My learned friend commented upon Article 8, and his comment was this. May I read it first ? It is on page 393 : “

You are also to enquire and report to Us, by our Commissioners for Trade and Plantations, whether any or what further Establishment may be necessary to be made, or Forts erected in any part of Newfoundland, or the other Islands or Territories under your Government, either for the Protection of the Fishery, the Security of the Country, for the establishing and carrying on a Commerce with the Indians residing in or resorting to the said Islands, or inhabiting the Coast of Labradore.” The comment that my learned friend made upon that was this : “ Here you have a reference to a commerce with the Indians residing in or resorting to the said Islands, or inhabiting the Coast of Labrador, and from that he inferred that this Governor was instructed to deal with matters relating to the interior part of the country. It is rather curious that stress of argument appears to have necessitated a certain inconsistency of attitude as to the Indian position in the interior. When it was desirable to show that under the proclamation of 1763 no Indians in the hinterland of Labrador were being considered and protected by the constitution of an Indian reservation there, the inhabitants of the interior were described by my learned friend as a few Esquimaux. Now the emphasis is a little different, because it is desirable, when you are construing Captain Graves's commission, to suggest that there is a commerce with Indians in the interior and something important, therefore, for the Governor of Newfoundland to deal with. From the one point of view it is desirable to minimise, as I say, in the stress of argument, the Indian element; from the other point of view it becomes equally important to emphasise it. When it was necessary to minimise it, there were a few Esquimaux ; when it was necessary to emphasise it one finds that this is what was suggested. It is asked on the publication of Article 8 whether it is going to be said that the Indians contemplated there were Indians squatting on the coast; I think they were the words; the inference rather being that that was an unfounded suggestion, that these Indians were persons squatting on the coast, but that plainly it referred to Indians in the interior. I will get the exact words in a moment.

Viscount FINLAY : Are you quoting from paragraph 8 ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord.

Viscount FINLAY : The words there are—

Mr. MACMILLAN : Indians inhabiting and residing on the coast of Labrador. It was desirable there, of course, to suggest that that could not mean merely a strip of sea shore, and the point was put as a submission that this could not apply ; “ Is it going to be said ”—I think was the expression—“ that this applied to Indians squatting on the shore of Labrador ? ” the inference being : “ Of course not ; it applied to Indians in the interior. ” The curious thing is this : that when you come to Palliser's activities you find that he had no doubt at all what these Indians were; they were the Esquimaux. My Lord once or twice asked me yesterday as to whether I could say that the terms “ Indians ” and “ Esquimaux ” were used as mutually inclusive. They are not; they are sometimes used in combination, and sometimes as distinct; but that there was a profound distinction between the two type is, of course, absolutely plain. I asked leave to refer to one or two passages in Volume III, first of all to Governor Palliser's proclamation of the 1st of July, 1764, which is to be found in Volume III at page 930. I have now fortunately found the reference to the precise words which I was dealing with. It was at page 40 of my learned friend's address when commenting on Article 8. After reading these words : “ The security of the Country, or the establishing and carrying on a Commerce with the Indians residing in or resorting to the said Islands, or inhabiting the Coast of Labradore,” my learned friend said : “ I do not know whether it is going to be said that on the selvedge of the sea there was a population of Indians squatting on the sea shore of course, there was nothing of the kind.” Here is Captain Hugh Palliser, with his commission in his hand, proceeding to deal with the situation. First of all on page 930, on the 1st July, 1764 (that is the first year of his office) as one of the first matters to which he addresses himself, we find him dealing with the Esquimaux Indians. The proclamation of 1st July, 1764, runs : “ By His Excellency Hugh Pallisser Governor and Commander in Chief in and over the Island of Newfoundland in North America, etc., etc. Whereas many and great Advantages would arise to His Majesty's Trading Subjects”—I submit there, as always throughout, the trading subjects are fishery people—“ if a Friendly Intercourse could be Established with the Esquimeaux Indians, Inhabiting the Coast of Labradore and as all Attempts hitherto made for that Purpose have Proved Ineffectual owing in a great Measure to the Imprudent Treacherous or Cruel conduct of some People who have resorted to that Coast by Plundering and killing several of them from which they have Entertained an opinion of our Disposition and Intentions being the same with respect to them, as theirs are towards us that is to circumvent and Kill them; and whereas such Wicked Practices are most contrary to His Majesty's Sentiments of humanity to his Conciliating their Affections and his Endeavours to induce them to Trade with his Subjects. In Conformity to these His Majesty's Sentiments, I hereby Strictly forbid such Wicked Practices for the Future, and declare all such as are found offending herein shall be Punished with the Utmost Severity of the Law. And whereas I have taken Measures for bringing about a Friendly Communication between the said Indians”—that is the Esquimaux Indians inhabiting the coast of Labrador—“ and His Majesty's Subjects and for removeing those Prejudices that have hitherto proved obstacles to it. I hereby Strictly enjoin and require all His Majesty's Subjects, who meet with any of the said Indians to treat them in the most civil and friendly manner.” My Lords will appreciate there that that language is, of course, entirely inappropriate to the Red Indians. The Red Indians were people who had been in communication with white men. The Montagnais and the Red Indians had been in communication with French traders for generations. These are the Esquimaux Indians inhabiting the coast of Labrador, and his proclamation is issued with reference to them, and his language plainly applies to them. But we come nearer to it, my Lord, on the next page. On the 1st September, 1764, in the first year of his governorship, he reports to the Lords of Trade giving an account of his proceedings to establish friendly relations with the Esquimaux Indians, and this time I am able to attach it to the very article which my learned friend construed as he did, because the Governor, at line 9, proceeds to say : “ In obedience to the 13th and 14th Article of His Majesty's instructions”—these were Pallisser's instructions, and the 13th and 14th articles of Pallisser's instructions correspond to Graves's 8 and 9, and therefore you have here an exposition in fact by Pallisser of his interpretation of Article 8 of Graves's commission, and the corresponding Article 13 of his own commission. Here is what he says he did in obedience to that article, the article which my learned friend said in fact referred to a population of Indians squatting on the sea shore : “ In obedience to the 13th and 14th Article of His Majesty's Instructions for endeavouring to Conciliate the Affections of the Esquemeaux Savages on the Coast of Labrador without the Streiglits of Bell Isle, and to Introduce a cornmerce with them ; before I left London meeting with a Mann Named Hans Harven one of the Brothers of the Moravian sect who has lived some years amongst the Savages of Greenland, and talks their Language, which very probably is the sanie with the Esquemeauxs, and finding in him a Strong disposition (to a degree of Enthusiasm) to undertake to introduce some knowledge of Religion amongst these Savages I encouraged him in it, and to come out here, where I have also encouraged some Merchants to send a Vessel with him to that Coast, (having none of the Kings to Spare this Season) and in case he should be able to Converse with those Savages, I have furnished him with a writing to be explained and distributed amongst them, to serve as an Introduction to Encourage them to Trade with us.” Then you will find on the next page, 933, a further reference to those Esquimaux subjects; it turns out that this Moravian, to the great astonishment of the Esquimaux, was able to talk to them. The language of Greenland which this Moravian could speak was found to be the same language on the Labrador coast, and therefore the Moravian was able to converse with the Esquimaux subjects and was a means of communication. Then he goes on to say : “ I am of opinion Measures may be taken for opening a friendly Communication with them, for gratifying them with what they want in the way of traffick and thereby”—again observe the motive—“provide a Security for our Fishers for Cod, Whale and Seal upon that Coast. Every encouragement to a Ship Fishery there and the North part of Newfoundland seems to me a Consideration worthy of Attention.” My Lord, he was setting about this : he was setting about establishing a friendly communication with the Esquimaux because, so long as they were upon the coast of Labrador and were hostile, they constituted a menace to the ship fishery, which was under his charge. It was the Esquimaux Indians to whom he directed himself at once, on his own contemporary interpretation of Article 8, that he was to establish a friendly communication with the Indians. These were not Red Indians. You required no Greenlander to communicate with the Red Indians. The language of the Red Indians was entirely different. He gets a Moravian, who knows Esquimaux language, to put him in touch with the Esquimaux. He says : I am obeying His Majesty's instructions in trying to establish a trade with the Esquimaux and get on a friendly footing with them. Why ? Because if I do not conciliate the inhabitants on the coast I shall find myself embarrassed in regulating the ship fishery under my charge, and it will be discouraged. In those circumstances can I not justly say there was a population of Indians squatting on the shore in the way Pallisser understood it—Esquimaux Indians. He goes on at page 934 in his own report. The matter becomes abundantly plain as one proceeds. These are fairly long reports, and though there may be other matter which

p. 528

I should read, may I read the passage I have selected on page 935 : “ Having said a fishing Colony is best defended by a Naval Force, which is supposed to spring from it, I take leave to add my humble Opinion, that under the present Management of our extensive one at Newfoundland it does not afford that annual Return of Seamen to England that is generally imagined, not near the Number it might, nor scarce above half the Number the French have from their limited Fishery which I have explained in my Answer to the 16th Article and as appears by the general scheme of the French and English Fisheries for this Year sent herewith. Upon the Coast of Labradore, which is inhabited by Savages, some Posts, I judge, will be necessary as well for introducing a Trade with them for Fur, &c.”—these again I submit are the Esquimaux—“ as for securing our People from their Attacks and Plunder and I am informed those inhabiting the Coast within the Streights of Bell-Isle are a docile People much inclined to traffick; those along the Coast Northward without the Streights have never been in Friendship with any Nation, but from the Interview had with them this Year, as mentioned in my letter of the 9th of October, I am of Opinion a friendly Intercourse might be easily introduced and I would recommend an advanced Post as far to the Northward as possible for a trucking Place, where those Savages may be stopt from coining further Southward by supplying them there with what they want or will be most useful to them and we may procure what we want of them and thus keep the rest of the Coast open and free for our Adventurers”—the same language, “ open and free ” fishery—“ to try whether it affords a Fishery which I have good Reason for believing it does, both for Cod and Whale, and also for Seal which is said to be here in great Abundance.” There it is plain that he is considering the relationship with the Esquimaux.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I do not know whether my learned friend would read the next sentence, if it does not inconvenience him.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Certainly. “ The whole Trade for fur and the Fishery, upon that part of the Coast lying within the Streights of Bell-Isle”—that is round the corner—“ are carried on by a few Merchants from Quebec, who having had grants from General Murray for exclusive Privileges for that whole Coast, have prevented any other Adventurers that way. They employ none but Canadians in that Trade and Canadian Vessels having Passes from the Governor of Quebec to come to the Fisheries.” These people are the people whose presence necessitated the passing afterwards of the Acts of 1774 and 1825.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I wonder if you know how far in the Esquimaux did live. I was rather struck by the map which you produced to us, the aboriginal map attached to the Report of the House of Commons Committee. That shows that the Esquimaux inhabited a tract of considerable depth.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is very difficult to say. Of course, that is only washed; it is not done by a precise boundary.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : There is also a dotted line marked.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I had not noticed that, my Lord.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : It is taken right round the coast into Hudson's Bay. I was wondering if you had anything to throw light upon that. It is in your atlas, but it is clearer here.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord ; that is why I ventured to ask my Lord to look at it yesterday.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : This map shows the whole of Hamilton Inlet included in the Esquimaux region.

The Lord Chancellor.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : There were certainly at one time some Esquimaux settlements within the narrows. I have some evidence of their having been inside the narrows.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : By “ narrows ” you mean the Straits of Belle Isle ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, my Lord, within the Straits of Hamilton Inlet. My Lord there is a good deal of evidence as to the habits of the Esquimaux and their residence. It is difficult to summarise the thing fairly without exposing oneself to criticism, but I think it might be fairly put that their main life was spent upon the Lighlands along the Labrador shore, and on the shore—I use the word “ shore ” advisedly—of Labrador; that they were at constant enmity with the Indians in the interior, that their language was so different that there could be no communication between them at all; that they took every opportunity of murdering each other when they met. The Esquimaux sometimes went inland to hunt. I found one passage where it said they went after caribou, but they were liable to receive a very hot reception when they did so, from the Red Indians who regarded that territory as their province. The diet of these people was quite different and their habits were quite different. They were a totally different kind of person from the Red Indians who lived in wigwams and were hunters. Governor Pallisser at page 949 has an interesting paragraph upon this. He is still talking about his experiences with the Indians whom I will venture to call the population of Indians squatting on the sea shore.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Only Esquimaux on this point. “ For enabling me to make proper reports in Order to your Lordships forming a Judgment of the nature and Disposition of those People”— who are those people ? Those are the people whom he was attempting to conciliate in the execution of His Majesty's instructions—“ of the nature and Disposition of those People and of what Advantages His Majesty's Subjects may hope to reap from that Coast, I went there myself, and met with a party of between four and five hundred of those savages”— these were Esquimaux, my Lord—“ who come yearly from the north down to the Streights of Bell Isle and by means of the Brethren of the Unitas Fratrum I had many interviews and conversations with them, for an account of the informations we got from them.” As interpreters they could speak Esquimaux.

Viscount HALDANE: I suppose these Brethren were Protestants ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, Lutherans. They were not Catholics, of course, and they did not know the Indian language. They could not speak the Red Indian language. Their mission was to the Esquimaux on the coast ; not to the Indians of the interior. You will find in some of their records they say they were very sorry they could not propagate the Gospel among the Indians because they did not know their language.

Viscount Haldane. Lord WARRINGTON : “ Unitas Fratrum ” is another word for Moravians.

Mr. Macmillan. Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord. Here we have these identified absolutely. We have these 400 or 500 Savages, the people he was to conciliate, as he conceived it, under his instructions to conciliate Indians ; they came down to see him, and he was able to communicate with them through the Moravian, because the Moravian had learnt Esquimaux in Greenland, and the language was found to be so similar that he was able to communicate with them, and he had the advantage of talking to the Esquimaux. “ I refer your Lordships to a narrative of what passed at the interviews I had with them, which I shall lay before you at my return to England ; therefore will here only add my opinion that those people who have hitherto been so much dreaded may in a very short time by kind treatment and fair dealing be made exceedingly usefull people to His Majesties Subjects, they are expert whale catchers and naturally fishers, are almost amphibious creatures, living constantly on little Islands along the coast, and subsist almost wholly upon fish.”

2 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount HALDANE : That is rather instructive. They use the islands to live upon, they live on fish, they are almost amphibious, they are what we hear of Esquimaux being elsewhere, where they live on the ice a good deal, and they belong essentially to the coast line.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I cited that in answer to my Lord Chancellor's question as to whether I could give any indication of the extent of the Esquimaux inhabitants on the coast. I cannot do so by any measure—ments, I can only do so by a description of their habits ; and here is Governor Pallisser's description of the kind of people he is dealing with, and here are the people whom he conceived it to be his duty to conciliate under his instructions, because if he does not do that, then they will be a constant menace to the carrying on of the open and free fishery which it is his duty to foster. I do not think anything could be more descriptive than that, because that is telling you what the people were without any particular motive one way or the other, and that is his description of those people.

p. 531

Lord SUMNER : Have they changed ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, my Lord, except I think that they have diminished. The unhappy thing is that they are diminishing like almost all aboriginal races.

Lord SUMNER : It is their fate.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is their fate to be exterminated. I am in my Lord's judgment upon this : Is it not abundantly plain that this is nothing to do with the Red Indians at all ? This is all Esquimaux ; and Pallisser is talking of the Esquimaux alone. He did not know the Red Indian language ; he had not any interpreters in the Unitas Fratrum. Throughout the Moravians were a Protestant Mission to the Esquimaux on the coast of Labrador. They expressed their interest when they had one or two visits from Red Indians, but they could not speak to them, and only wished they could, because there was a new field for the propagation of the Gospel. The demarcation was not only a line of demarcation ; it was a linguistic demarcation ; it was a line of demarcation marked out by all ethnographical distinctions and differences in habits and everything else. No two tribes could be more distinct.

Lord SUMNER : I thought the Indians, properly so-called, were then Christians.

Mr. MACMILLAN : The Moravians were Protestants, and the Indians were Catholics. They record their Catholicity is of the very primitive type, and does not do them much good. They got one or two of them into their mission rooms, and they were greatly interested in looking at a sewing machine, but the Jesuits, as usual, were extra-ordinarily active, and they were wonderful explorers in those days. Passage after passage establishes that the Red Indians of the interior, the Montagnais, were Catholics, and they came down to be ministered to by the Jesuit Priests in the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

Viscount HALDANE : Besides the Montagnais were there any others who were Catholics ?

p. 532

Mr. MACMILLAN : The Naskopis too. They were further away to the north, and were in the upper part, and it appears were less civilised than the Montagnais, who, for a long time, long before we came on the scene, had been in constant contact with the Quebec merchants.

My Lords, I have recited these passages, if I might, in order to show that there is another aspect of this instruction given to Graves and Palliser as to commerce with the Indians, from that which was suggested by my learned friend. I am courageous enough to suggest that there is on the selvedge of the sea a population of Indians squatting on the seashore. This Governor found them there; he calls them the Eskimo Indians, and he proceeds, in the execution of his Commission, to try to establish commerce with them and to try to conciliate them, with the objective which was always the objective in mind, in order that free fishery might be carried on without the menace of Eskimos on the shore who might at any time raid their temporary fishing establishments along the coast.

Your Lordships have never, I think, had occasion to look at the Act of 1699, which is the key to the whole position in Newfoundland. That Act is printed in Volume I at page 250, and I do not delay over it, only desiring to emphasise that this is an Act dealing with Newfoundland trade. It is referred to over and over again in the instructions to the Governors of Newfoundland.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Yes, we did look at this.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Your Lordships have considered it already ; my learned friend Mr. Barrington-Ward referred to it. It has certain aspects which are worth bringing to the surface, which I do not think have been noted. The Act is “ An Act to Encourage the Trade to Newfoundland.” I said a little earlier this morning that when the word “ trade ” is used in relation to Newfoundland, one must be careful not to confuse it—it is attractive to the counter contention to confuse it—with furring and things of that sort, commerce at large. The trade that is referred to in relation to Newfoundland is the codfish trade ; and you see the preamble begins : “ Whereas the Trade and Fishing at Newfoundland is a beneficial trade to this Kingdom, not only in the employing great numbers of seamen and ships, and exporting and consuming great quantities of provisions and manufactures of this realm, whereby many tradesmen and poor artificers are kept at work, but also in bringing into this nation, by returns of the effects of the said fishery from other countries, greater quantities of wine, oil, plate, iron, wooll, and sundry other useful commodities, to the increase of His Majesty's Revenue, and the encouragement of trade and navigation.” The trade and fishing at Newfoundland, which is described as a beneficial trade, is the cod fishing. Then it goes on to say : “ It shall and may be lawful for all his Majesty's subjects residing within this his Realm of England, or the Dominions thereunto belonging, trading or that shall trade to Newfoundland, and the seas, rivers lakes, creeks, harbours in or about Newfoundland, or any of the islands adjoining or adjacent thereunto, to have, use, and enjoy the free trade and traffick, and art of merehandize and fishery, to and from Newfoundland, and peaceably to have, use, and enjoy, the freedom of taking bait and fishing in any of the rivers, lakes, creeks, harbours, or roads, in or about Newfoundland, and the said seas, or any of the islands adjacent thereunto.” Now no doubt it will be said that rivers and lakes are referred to there, and it will be said that my knowledge of natural history must be very deficient if I suggest that cod are to be found in rivers and lakes. Of course they are not to be found in rivers and lakes; but when you look at these terms here they are all controlled by the idea of carrying on the trade and fishery of Newfoundland; and no one has suggested that this Act has an application to inland salmon fisheries or to any other fisheries but cod fisheries, and the extensive enumeration of terms had reference, of course, to this, that you had got an indented coast, you may have river mouths, and so on, and there is to be no question about the maritime area in question. I equally retort that you do not take bait for cod fishing in lakes and rivers. Then it continues : “ And liberty to go on Shore on any part of Newfoundland, or any of the said Islands for the curing, salting, drying, and husbanding of their Fish, and for making of oil, and to cut down Woods and Trees,” and so on. All that language is applicable to the cod fishing industry and to no other. You do not get oil from salmon, and all this is to be done as something useful or advantageous to their fishing trade.

2 Nov., 1926.
Mr. Macmillan.

Then comes a whole series of provisions which constitute really the code of Newfoundland. It contains all the provisions about boats and the Admirals and what rights they are to have when they come, and throughout this is really the instruction that the Governor of Newfoundland gets. You will find records throughout these volumes of the Governor of Newfoundland being instructed to take this Act as his guide. This contains all the regulations that he has specially to attend to, and his Commission expressly says that he shall do nothing repugnant to the Act of 1699. That is his instruction with regard to administration; it is all about ballast and harbours and by-boats, and all manner of things related to the cod fishing, and to nothing else. It is rather interesting that there is jurisdiction given under it, a statutory jurisdiction, because this is in the Act of 1699. Now here is a jurisdiction as to which it might well be said that it was of a somewhat vague type. This is on page 255, Section XV : “ And be it further enacted by the Authority aforesaid, That in Case any Difference or Controversy shall arise in Newfoundland, or the Islands thereunto adjoining, between the Masters of fishing Ships and the Inhabitants there, or any By-boat Keeper, for or concerning the Right and Property of fishing Rooms, Stages, Flakes, or any other Building or Conveniency for Fishing or curing of Fish, in the several Harbours or Coves, the said Differences, Disputes and Controversies, shall be judged and determined by the fishing Admirals, in the several Harbours and Coves : and in Case any of the said Masters of fishing Ships, By-boat Keepers or Inhabitants, shall think themselves aggrieved by such Judgment or Determination, and shall appeal to the Commanders of any of his Majesty's Ships of War, appointed as Convoys for Newfoundland, the said Commander is hereby authorized and empowered to determine the same, pursuant to the Regulation in this Act.”

Viscount HALDANE : It was an Admiral's ship.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes. Now Palliser was not quite sure whether this applied to the coast of Labrador, because you see it is in terms Newfoundland. Labrador had been annexed to him and he was in some difficulty to know whether these regulations applied in terms, and he wanted an Act of Parliament passed to extend the Act of 1699 to the coast of Labrador; but his Commission had told him to apply it to the coast of Labrador, and, if I remember aright, he did not get an Act of Parliament. Perhaps my friend can remember whether there was an Act.

Sir JOHN SIMON : No ; he pressed for it, but did not get it.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Because it was already in his Commission.

Sir JOHN SIMON : That would not have been a good reason as against a complainant.

Mr. MACMILLAN : The interesting thing is this. He has not sure whether these regulations applied or not, although his Commission told him to do nothing contrary to these regulations, and he wanted an Act of Parliament to clear it up, and he did not get it—for what reason we do not want to inquire further.

Mr. Macmillan.

This, then, is my submission upon these Commissions. I am still completing the picture of the Newfoundland position. You have got the Governor of Newfoundland armed with these powers, placed in the care and inspection of this coast, with its native Indian inhabitants who were Esquimaux, with no contact with the interior Indians, with whom he was unable to communicate because he did not even know their language, and concerned with the coast and subordinating everything that he did to this purpose of maintaining the fishery on that coast. It only emphasises the intent and purpose as expressed by the Proclamation that this whole transaction is to the intent that the open and free cod fishery of Newfoundland may be extended to this coast, and may be extended to this coast under a person already conversant with this class of business and suited, therefore, to carry on a coastal administration over a temporary fishery such as this was.

My Lords, I now propose to leave that chapter altogether and to come on to the next legislation. I have dwelt so long upon 1763, for this reason, that we are all agreed that that is the critical year. We are all agreed that from the language employed it is that we are to find out the extent of the jurisdiction of Newfoundland, and to get the key to the answer to the question proposed to my Lords ; and we are further agreed that it is the subject matter—we will call it X — of the Commission and Proclamation, which was in turn bandied back and fro between Newfoundland and Quebec, maintaining throughout its identity ; because it has always been by reference, it is always the same thing which is passing from one hand to the other : if we find out at the start what that thing is, or at least find sufficient indicia to enable us to define it, then one approaches the subsequent Acts with this in mind : What is the subject matter of the 1763 transaction ? Because whatever was that subject matter was also the subject matter of the subsequent Acts of 1764, 1809 and 1825. Therefore one has to proceed to those other Acts, bearing in mind that throughout, this X, this unknown quantity, to which the territory of Newfoundland on the mainland, had been defined in 1763 ; the root of title was in 1763 ; the others were all documents of transmission, not documents of origination.

p. 535

I approach, therefore, now the next episode in this history, the Act of 1774, the Quebec Act. There is a most important Order in Council which heralded the passing of the Act of 1774. That is in Volume III, at page 1075, and its recitals contain so complete an account of the reason for the passing of the Act that I find myself absolved from the necessity of going into it otherwise to any extent.

Your Lordships recall that the jurisdiction which had been given to the Governor of Newfoundland extended, as we are all agreed, from the River St. John to Cape Chidley. The Governor of Newfoundland proceeded to frame regulations for his fishery (these are in the volume), regulations which were adapted to the enforcement of the Act of 1699, and he proceeded most rigorously to enforce these along the coast within his jurisdiction. In the course of doing so he encountered on the coast the sedentary fishermen who carried on seal fishing and to some extent also salmon fishing on the shore of the St. Lawrence, and who held grants, some of them from the French period, and some of them grants made by General Murray ; and their indignation at Palliser's action in seeking to enforce a cod fishery régime applicable to temporary fisheries and with maritime inspection of these people who were seated on the shore with their grants and carrying on the sedentary fisheries, was so great that a large amount of trouble arose over that matter and it came to be recognised that this confiding of that part of Labrador to the Governor of Newfoundland was a complete mistake ;

2 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

because he was a gentleman who was well adapted to protecting cod fisheries and had all the means and energy to do that, but his regulations, which he was bound to conform to, were quite inappropriate to deal with the sedentary population of seal fishers entitled to remain there during the winter, because they held actual titles, they held grants, and his jurisdiction was totally unsuited for the sedentary fishermen who exercised the seal fisheries on that coast. Consequently great complaints were made and the result was that they took from Newfoundland the whole of the Labrador Coast ; but as subsequently appears, they went too far, because the grants held by those people along the south coast did not extend away up to the north coast, and the north coast was a proper place for a cod fishery. The mistake was, as seems to have been recognised in subsequent legislation, to hand the whole of it over ; because that was overdoing the thing ; the remedy was too large ; a less drastic remedy would have been sufficient ; and it just happens that at the end you have the matter brought to the position that it should have been brought to earlier. The way they did it was this. I draw particular attention to the Order of His Majesty in Council. It is a most important document, for this reason, that it shows the attitude of the Government at home to the position and the attitude of Newfoundland. You will notice, as I proceed to read it (because I am going to take it a little slowly) that the conception of the Governor of Newfoundland, in the minds of the Privy Council, was not a conception of a territorial magnate in Labrador at all, but of a person looking after cod fishing on the shore.

Now I have to vouch that, and I propose to ask my Lords to read it and see if I am right. This Order of His Majesty in Council is on page 1075. It is dated the 22nd April, 1773, the year before the passing of the Quebec Act. “ Your Majesty having been pleased by Your Order in Council of the 8th of July 1772 to refer unto this Committee a Representation of the Lords Commissioners for Trade and Plantations, dated the 24th of June, 1772, Setting forth, That they have had under their Consideration a Paper Communicated to them by the Merchants of Great Britain interested in the Trade Seal Fisheries on the Coast of Labrador and their Lessees ; as also of the possessors of certain Seal Fisheries on that Coast under Grants from the Governor of Quebec, describing the particular nature and Circumstances of those Fisheries, and Stating the great Loss and Detriment which have ensued, by those fisheries being made Subject to such Rules and Regulations, as the Governor of Newfoundland has thought necessary to be laid down for the Fisheries of Cod and Wale, since the said Coast of Labrador has been annexed to that Government.”

2 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

My Lords, those regulations are printed at page 937, if my Lords care to note it in the margin ; and you will see that they are regulations of that type—cod and whale regulations. “ That they have likewise taken into their Consideration a Memorial presented to Guy Carleton Esquire, Your Majesty's Governor of Quebec, and signed by Sundry Inhabitants thereof, Subjects of your Majesty, to the like Effect, Where upon the said Lords Commissioners represent That while Canada remained in the Hands of the French, and the Coast of Labrador was considered as a dependency thereupon, a Fishery for Seals was amongst other objects of National concern, attempted and brought to a Degree of perfection, and the returns from this branch of the Exports of Canada amounted annually to about Ten thousand pounds Sterling ; In consequence of these Attempts, Grants of several Islands in the River and Gulph of St. Lawrence and some Tracts on the Main Land, with the exclusive Privilege of Seal Fisheries &c. were made in times past by the Crown of France to certain persons and the rights of Property thereby vested in them have passed as Inheritances, and been Sold and Leased to Tenants at pleasure ; Various other Species of Claims have been exhibited as derived from French Tenures, which it is needless now to Enumerate and which have passed by Succession through different Hands ; and since the Cession of Canada, these fisheries[sic] have been again taken up, & sundry of your Majesty's Subjects have Possessed themselves of Posts, and Settlements, either in virtue of Leases from proprietors under French Titles, or by Grants from your Majesty's Governor of Quebec for a Term certain, or until such time as your Majesty's pleasure should be known ; In Confidence of the validity of these Tenures, it is stated that many Adventurers have followed the Established practice of Canada by Purchasing from the former Grantees the whole of their Dwelling Houses, Fishing Implements, Utensils and Warehouses, appropriated to particular Posts or passes, and large Sums are said to have been employed in re-establishing these fisheries[sic] ;—That the Fishery for Seals it is asserted, cannot be prosecuted in the Open Seas, and made general like those for Cod and Whales, but is practised in a manner widely different from any other fishery[sic] in the Gulph or River St. Lawrence, and requires much judgment and circumspection, it is chiefly formed by the contiguity of small Islands or Rocks to the main Land, which Occasion Strong Currents called Passes, where only such fisheries[sic] can be exercised and to which the make and Contexture of the Nets must be particularly fitted ; it is chiefly followed in the winter Season, and the immediate Operation of Catching these Animals commences in December and lasts only about fifteen Days ; but the fishers[sic] employed in the Business must be at their Station in the course of the Month of September, and cannot get away from it before the end of May. That this is in brief the nature of the fishery[sic] for Seals, and these the Circumstances of the People engaged in that Business, that by your Majesty's Royal Proclamation of the 7th of October, 1763, Your Majesty thought fit to put all the Coast of Labrador from the River St. John to Hudson's Straits together with the Islands of Anticosti and Madelaine, and all other smaller Islands lying upon the said Coast, under the Care and Inspection of your Governor of Newfoundland, to the End as your Majesty therein graciously declares, that the open and free ffishery[sic] of Your Majesty's Subjects might be extended to, and carried on upon the said Coast of Labrador and the adjacent Islands, and from this period the Posts and Settlements on the above Coast and ffisheries[sic] thereupon depending were detached from the Government of Quebec, and became Subject to the Ordinances and Regulations of Your Majesty's Governor of Newfoundland.”

My Lords, I attach great importance to that passage. Again, you find at this contemporary period that the Privy Council, when they are seeking the origin of the rights of the Government of Newfoundland, say that the rights are derived from the Proclamation ; and they recite the Proclamation. Therefore, when I have thought fit several times in the course of my address to speak of the Governor of Newfoundland as a person having the care and inspection, that was not merely an advocate's device of repeating a phrase frequently in order to impress it ; it was using the contemporary language of the Privy Council as they themselves used it when they were describing the position of the Governor of Newfoundland at the time.

Viscount HALDANE : It was an explicit policy.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes. my Lord. I cannot sufficiently emphasise the point there ; because here you have a different type of fishery in existence upon these shores, the sedentary fishery, and you have brought in contact with this class of person the Governor of Newfoundland. You have a reference to the Proclamation, and what the Privy Council are pleased to say is : “ That this is in brief the nature of the ffishery[sic] for Seals, and these the circumstances of the People engaged in that Business, that by your Majestys Royal Proclamation of the 7th of October 1763 Your Majesty thought fit to put all the Coast of Labrador from the River St. John's to Hudsons Straits together with the Islands of Anticosti and Madelaine, and all other smaller Islands lying upon the said Coast, under the Care and Inspection of your Governor of Newfoundland.” That was what the Privy Council conceived to be the position ; that was not a territorial jurisdiction to the height of land, as I humbly submit. It is : “ Under the Care and Inspection of your Governor of Newfoundland, to the End as your Majesty therein graciously declares, that the open and free ffishery[sic] of Your Majesty's Subjects might be extended to, and carried on upon the said Coast of Labrador and the adjacent Islands, and from this period the Posts and Settlements on the above Coast and fisheries thereupon depending were detached from the Government of Quebec, and became subject to the Ordinances and Regulations of your Majesty's Governor of Newfoundland ;” not in order that there might be constituted a new territorial administration to the height of land in Labrador, but for a specific and Limited purpose, and the primary ambit of his duties was care and inspection ; so at least thought the Lords of the Privy Council at the time. Then they went on : “ That from the foregoing Account of the nature and Circumstances of these Posts and the fisheries[sic] depending thereon it will, as the said Lords Commissioners conceive, appear, that to Subject them to the same Rules and Regulations, as may be well adapted to the fisheries[sic] for Cod and Whales, is in effect to destroy them : That the Seal Fishery being of necessity a sedentary fishery[sic], requiring great Expence, Nets of a particular quality and Construction, immediately fitted to the pass they belong to, employing materials of a bulky nature, and requiring Houses for wintering the fishers[sic], cannot be made open and general in the manner of fishers[sic] above mentioned.” You cannot have an open and general seal fishery : therefore the Proclamation was inappropriate to this part of the territory altogether, because the Proclamation said that the annexation was in order that an open and free fishery can be carried on. You cannot have an open and free seal fishery according to the Privy Council. “ Nor can the Posts Occupied by Adventurers in the Business be quitted at pleasure, or Transferred to first Comers, as is practised in the Newfoundland ffishery[sic] ; and accordingly they find not only from the papers under present Consideration but from various other Documents in the Plantation Office, that many and great Complaints have been preferred against the Rules and Regulations, which have been extended to this Coast, since it has been annexed to the Government of Newfoundland ; and which rules being calculated with a view to encourage the two great ffisheries[sic] for Cod and Whale, and contrived to Quicken the Activity and emulation of Adventurers of Great Britain, by laying the several Posts and Passes open to the first Arrivers, have been found absolutely incompatible with the principles on which the Seal ffishery[sic] can alone be conducted ; to prevent therefore any further disturbance to Individuals in their private Claims and Possessions and to save the Mother Country the Advantages to be drawn from this branch of Commerce, which seems to be no inconsiderable object : The said Lords Commissioners Submit whether it may not be advisable for your Majesty to cause to be reannexed to Your Government of Quebec such parts of the said Coast of Labrador, as are situated between the River St. John's and the Straits of Bellisle, together with the Islands of Anticosti and Madelaine, and all other smaller Islands lying upon the said Coasts” ; then, my Lords, note the following words—“ for altho' your Majesty, from such information as was before your Majesty, when the Proclamation of the 7th of October 1763 was published, did, upon the gracious motives therein Set forth, and with the Advice of Your Privy Council” (the same people who are now speaking) “ think fit to put that part of the Coast of Labrador under the Care and Inspection of Your Governor of Newfoundland ; yet the experience of succeeding times, and the various inconveniences, which have since Occurred, and which could not at that period be foreseen, have, as the said Lords Commissioners conceive, reversed the policy of that Measure, and made it for Your Majesty's Service and the welfare of your Subjects to restore the said Coast, so far as the Streights of Bellisle, to its' dependency on the Government of Quebec, leaving for the present at least that part of the Coast of Labrador, which lies between the Straits of Bellisle and Hudson's Streights, and where there are very valuable Cod fisheries, under the Government of Newfoundland.”

My Lords, again I cannot refrain from drawing attention to the incongruity of all that, with the idea of a great territorial district extending to the height of land. These are the people concerned in the framing of the documents we have been pursuing of 1763 ; here they are revealing to us the whole policy of the matter and what they have in mind ; and they accordingly think that as there are very valuable cod fisheries up this coast it would be better not to re-enact the whole thing, not to put the whole thing into Quebec.

My Lords, it does not end there. “ The Lords of the Committee in

p. 540

Obedience to your Majesty's said Order of Reference, did on the 19th of December 1772, take the said Representation into Consideration, and thought proper to refer the same back to the Lords Commissioners for Trade and Plantations, to conferr with Your Majesty's Governor of Newfoundland, on the Subject of the said Seal Fisheries carried on upon the Coast of Labrador, and Report their Opinion to this Committee, how far the Seal Fisheries on the said Coast, may be relieved from the great loss and detriment, which are represented to have ensued by those ffisheries[sic] being made Subject to such Rules and Regulations as the Governor of Newfoundland has thought fit to be laid down for the Fisheries of Cod and whale, since the said Coast of Labrador has been annexed to that Government.”

I pause again; he could not put in force any rules and regulations, because his Commmision required him to conform to the Act of 1699, which was an Act relating to the cod fisheries. Then they go on : “ Without prejudice to those Considerations of Policy which induced your Majesty by Your Royal Proclamation of 7th October 1763 to put all the Coast of Labrador from the River St. John's to Hudson's Streights together with the Islands of Anticosti and Madelaine and all other smaller Islands lying upon the said Coast under the Care and Inspection of the Governor of Newfoundland.”

Again, the Lords of the Privy Council say that it was done by the Royal Proclamation, although it would be more strictly accurate to say that it was done by the Joint Commission. But this is their conception of the position; it was done by the Royal Proclamation, and the considerations of policy to which they allude are those disclosed in the Royal Proclamation, and it was in consequence of them, what was done, that the coast was placed under the care and inspection of the Governor of Newfoundland.

“ Whereupon the said Lords Commissioners have reported to this Committee. That they have in pursuance of the said Order re-considered the proposition made for re-annexing to the Colony of Quebec such part of the Coast of Labrador, as lies between the River St. John and the Streights of Bellisle, with the Islands thereunto belonging, and having conversed with your Majesty's Governor of Newfoundland on the subject of the Seal Fishery carried on upon the said Coast of Labrador the said Lords Commissioners are clearly of opinion that the regulations, which have been made for the encouragement of the fisheries for cod and whales, are in their present state incompatible with that permanent residence and continued possession, which are essential to the Seal and Salmon Fisheries, and that those fisheries cannot be relieved from the loss and detriment, which the proprietors of the different posts upon that Coast complain of, whilst the regulations above mentioned are continued in force ; It was not however upon this ground altogether that they recommended the annexing to Quebec, that part of the Coast described in the Representation above mentioned ; for, when it appeared upon examination, that a great part of it was claimed as private property under Grants from the Government of Canada, and that your Majesty was bound by Treaty to admit those claims, the consideration of policy was out of the question.” Then they said : “ These claims do not appear upon further examination to comprehend all the Coast between the River St. John and the Streights of Bellisle, and that they extend no further than the Ance des Espagnols or Bay Philippeaux ; whatever therefore lies to the eastward of that limit may very properly continue within the Government of Newfoundland.”

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Which is the Ance des Espagnols ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : It is practically Brador Bay. It is at the corner.

Mr. MACMILLAN : “ Whatever therefore lies to the eastward of that limit may very properly continue within the Government of Newfoundland, and the disadvantage in point of fishery, of re-annexing the remainder to the Government of Quebec (if any) will be the less. as by far the greater part of it is rocky and inaccessible, and therefore can be of no use to the Cod Fishery ;—The Lords of the Committee upon mature consideration of this matter, do humbly report to your Majesty, that they concur in opinion with what is proposed by the said Lords Commissioners for Trade and Plantations, and to that end, do agree humbly to advise your Majesty to direct your Attorney and Solicitor-General, to prepare and lay before your Majesty in Council a draught of an instrument proper to be passed under the Great Seal of Great Britain, for re-annexing to the Government of Quebec, such parts of the said Coast of Labrador as are situated between the River St. John and the Ance des Espagnols or Bay Philippeaux, together with the Islands of Anticosti and Madelaine, and all other smaller Islands upon the said Coast.” There you have the genesis of the Act of 1774, and if I may say so, it throws a flood of light upon what was in the mind of those who framed the Act of 1774.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : But the Act went much further.

Mr. MACMILLAN : The Act went much further. It went so far that the balance had to be redressed later on. I now ask attention to the Act itself.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount HALDANE : Does the Act of 1774 authorise a grant under the Great Seal ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, my Lord. The Act of 1774 re-annexed. It simply ousted Newfoundland.

Viscount HALDANE : But it does not do it by authorising a grant ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : No. It simply ousted Newfoundland altogether. That was too radical a cure, because in doing so Parliament really contravened the recommendation of the Privy Council, who said there is a cod fishery to the North which ought to be under the Government of Newfoundland, and therefore we do not recommend what ultimately became to be the law, we recommend something much less drastic and radical, namely to take from the Governor of Newfoundland this south of Labrador where his code, which he has to administer, is entirely unsuitable and leave him to his proper province, the cod fishery on the northern part of this coast. That is the language plainly of persons who are thinking in terms of a coast, and not thinking in terms of a territory at all, whose eyes are upon the cod fishery and nothing else.

p. 542

Viscount HALDANE : That was the coast between the River St. John and Ance Sablon ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes. There were there these seal fisheries many of them with very ancient rights.

Viscount HALDANE : Quebec people.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, who bitterly resented the Governor of Newfoundland coming along with his cod fishery rights, and who said they had no business to stay there. He tried to oust some of them, and burned a lot of their possessions, and did other unkindly acts of that sort. I want now to come to the Act itself.

Sir JOHN SIMON : The Act was a much more elaborate document.

Mr. MACMILLAN : But I think at this stage my Lords were considering this aspect of it only.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Quite true.

2 Nov., 1926.
Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It was a very comprehensive Act, and very important. The 1774 Act is in Vol. 1, page 158. “Whereas His Majesty by his Royal Proclamation, bearing date the seventh day of October, in the third year of his Reign, thought fit to declare the provisions which had been made in respect to certain countries, territories, and islands in America, ceded to His Majesty by the definitive Treaty of Peace, concluded at Paris on the tenth day of February, One thousand seven hundred and sixty-three”—that is the Proclamation which set up the Quebec Government—“And whereas, by the arrangements made by the said Royal Proclamation, a very large extent of country, within which there were several Colonies and Settlements of the subjects of France, who claimed to remain therein under the faith of the said Treaty, was left, without any provision being made for the administration of civil government therein ; and certain parts of the territory of Canada, where sedentary fisheries had been established and carried on by the subjects of France, inhabitants of the said Province of Canada, under grants and concessions from the Government thereof, were annexed to the Government of Newfoundland, and thereby subjected to regulations inconsistent with the nature of such fisheries”—subjected, as I suggest, to a cod fishery regime—“May it therefore please your most Excellent Majesty, that it may be enacted ; and be it enacted by the King's most Excellent Majesty, by and with the advise and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal, and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that all the territories, islands, and countries in North America”—and then follows a description showing they were bounded in certain ways. At page 159, line 12, it says : “And also all such territories, islands, and countries, which have, since the tenth of February, One thousand seven hundred and sixty-three, been made part of the Government of Newfoundland, be, and they are hereby, during his Majesty's pleasure, annexed to, and made part and parcel of, the Province of Quebec.” Anything that Newfoundland had got since the 10th February, 1763, was to be resigned to Quebec.

p. 543

Lord WARRINGTON : Territories, islands and, countries.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I use even a stronger term. It was intended to cover anything there could possibly be on any conceivable interpretation of that grant. They were to resign everything. It was proper to use, therefore, the most extensive language when it was designed to cover everything that could possibly be pretended by Newfoundland. I omitted the intervening description of the new boundaries of Quebec because it is very important to determine under what title Quebec got, as we submit it then got, this important territory in Labrador. My learned friends say that at that time the operative effect of the Act of 1774 was to annex to the Government of Quebec the whole of the green area as comprised within the expression “ all such territories, islands and countries which have since the 10th February, 1763, been made part of Newfoundland.” My friend says that I have to invoke those words in order to give me from 1774 onwards a title to the green area, the hinterland of Labrador, in so far as it was hinterland. My submission is quite different. My submission is that the hinterland of Labrador was handed to Quebec in terms of the descriptive boundaries which precede, that we got the interior of Labrador to the north under the actual description of the new boundaries of Quebec. I refer, my Lords, to line 12, of page 159, where you will see that the draughtsman, beating the bounds of the new Province, concludes on his return journey by giving you the northward boundary thus : “ Northward to the southern boundary of the territory granted to the merchant adventurers of England, trading to Hudson's Bay.”

Sir JOHN SIMON : You do not mean that, surely.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I mean that precisely. That was contended also in the Manitoba case, and it is a well known contention. My submission upon that is that you have clear language there that the northern boundary of the new Province of Quebec is the southern boundary of the territory granted to Hudson's Bay.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I see what you mean. I thought you said the word " northward " indicated a northern boundary. It would not in itself.

Mr. MACMILLAN : If you please. That is quite true. I was not so exact as I should have been.

Lord SUMNER : From the point where Hudson's Bay territory ceased to have a southern boundary and had a boundary which was roughly north and south, or somewhere between north and north-east, what becomes of the back land ? Is it that Quebec acquired under this a mere shell from the River St. John along the line of the coast to Cape Chidley, and that the back land, until you come to Hudson's Bay territory again, is not assigned to it or to anybody ?

2 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, my Lord, that is not my interpretation.

Sir John Simon.

Lord Sumner.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord SUMNER : Then under what words is it that that back land between the Atlantic coast and the more or less north-and-south Hudson's Bay boundary is now, under this Act 1774, given to Quebec ?

Lord Sumner.

The Lord Chancellor.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : There is implicit in your Lordship's question the suggestion that there was a north and south boundary of Hudson's Bay. With great submission, there was no such boundary. There was the boundary which you see in Mitchell's map at that time. At that time the accepted line of Hudson's Bay was that which went off to Grimington Bay, and all southward of that passed to Quebec.

2 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord SUMNER : I was thinking that the boundary of Hudson's Bay might be described roughly as north and south. Taking it from the corner to Grimington Island, that leaves a large triangle of back land between that line south-east and the two seashores down to the Strait of Belle Isle, and then round the corner as far as the River St. John. How has that triangle got into Quebec under the words of this Act ?

The LORD CHANCELLOR : You imply the words " and thence along the southern boundary of Hudson's Bay." You imply those words ; they are not found there.

Lord Sumner.

Mr. MACMILLAN : May I express it in this way. If you take the map, it is much easier. According to this map, what are you to take ? You begin like this. All the territories, islands and countries in North America within certain boundaries are to come in. May I read just them. On page 158, it says : “ All the territories, islands, and countries in North America, belonging to the Crown of Great Britain, bounded

p. 545

Mr. Macmillan.

on the south by a line from the Bay of Chaleurs.” What is happening is the draughtsman is going round, and he comes up the Mississippi, and then comes northward, and he strikes the Hudson's Bay boundary and he say : “ northward to the southern boundary of the territory granted to the merchants adventurers of England, trading to Hudson's Bay.”

Lord SUMNER : May I take the answer briefly. You refer to the southern boundary, and by implication you say, “ and thence along that southern boundary.” That means up to Grimington Island ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes.

Lord SUMNER : Very well. It is not an east and west line. Hamilton inlet, for example, is in a space which, in your view, never was included in Labrador, and it is not included in the Hudson's Bay so-called southern boundary. Is that left unassigned ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, my Lord. I am afraid I have not yet made my meaning plain. When I get to the southern boundary of the territory granted to the merchant adventurers of England trading to Hudson's Bay, I then follow that southern boundary. It is true it diverges to the north-east, but I follow it till it strikes the sea. It is all the lands and territories within that.

Lord SUMMER : You are treating that southern boundary as going right up to Grimington Island ?

Mr. MACMILLAN: Yes. It is not strictly accurate, according to the points of the compass, to call it the southern boundary ; but it is a great bight which is taken as the southern boundary.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Then you say along the coast back to the Bay of Chaleurs. That may well be implied.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It may well be implied, for this reason. If you do not imply that, you leave a curious gap.

2 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Yes, you would have a territory with only two boundaries—south and west.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I have to take a boundary. When you take the boundary of Quebec, it says it is bounded by the River St. John. It also says the southern boundary of the Hudson's Bay territory. What is always in mind is that there is the Hudson's Bay territory to the north—I do not know quite where—but it was assumed to be at that time up to about Grimington Bay. That of course cannot be brought into Quebec, but once we have reached the Hudson's Bay southern boundary we are home, so to speak. After that there is a boundary already in existence, and that is described as “ northward to the southern boundary of the territory granted to the merchants adventurers of England trading to Hudson's Bay.” Of course if I stop there, I have not defined a boundary at all, and I assume : “ and thence along that southern boundary.” That southern boundary runs up and issues ultimately at the sea at Grimington Bay. Therefore I have got here the transference to Quebec of the whole of this area. Observe how this fits my theory. Your Lordships may find this to be all wrong, but it is at least consistent. Then they say, we must remember that Newfoundland got something along this coast ; at least the coast was put under the care and inspection of the Governor of Newfoundland, and he has some territorial claim along there. We must not forget that. And therefore they say : “ and also all such territories, islands and countries which have since the 10th February 1763 been made part of the Government of Newfoundland.” After all, we did give the Governor of Newfoundland some locus there, and lest we have omitted anything, as we have now encountered the Governor of Newfoundland at this part, they say, “ and also anything he had is taken from him.”

p. 546

Viscount HALDANE : All the territory.

Mr. MACMILLAN : All the territory.

Viscount HALDANE : And all the rights taken away ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Everything was taken away except what was given back to him. No legal rights were given back to him, but he was told to continue patrolling the coast because he could do it better than Quebec.

Viscount HALDANE : But only as Admiral.

Mr. MACMILLAN : One of the reasons why Newfoundland got it back again was because a ship was taken, and there was no Vice-Admiral at the Court of Newfoundland with jurisdiction, and Quebec was far away, and inaccessible during a large part of the year, and it was said, here is an embarrassment in carrying on this coastal jurisdiction why should not Newfoundland get back this bit of coast ? And it got it back. Therefore you see my interpretation of this. Again it can at least be said of it, cannot it, that it does not offend any canon of interpretation. If my theory be accepted, I have at least the merit of consistency, because I account for the whole thing on this principle: that the new territory of Quebec is defined in language apt to include the whole of this hinterland of Labrador.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount HALDANE : And to sweep away all that was given in 1763.

p. 547

Mr. MACMILLAN : Precisely. Notice what is to come in : “ All the territories, islands and countries in North America belonging to the Crown of Great Britain”—bounded in such and such a way. If the boundary of the Hudson's Bay territory were, as my learned friend suggests, the height of land, why did the author of this description—who quite well knew how to describe the height of land when he desired to do so, and did so, when he described what my learned friend called the spine of the Gaspé Peninsula a few lines before, with precision as a watershed line for a boundary—when he came to the northern part and got into Labrador, why did he not say “ and bounded there by the height of land” ? He said no such thing. He chose to select as his boundary there, not the height of land, although he had just been seeing how appropriate it would be, and had applied it in the south. But when he came to the north, when my friend says he applied a height of land boundary, really he did nothing of the sort. He selected the southern boundary of Hudson's Bay. According to my learned friend, the Hudson's Bay boundary was a height of land one, although no-one knew it at that time, and although at that time it was shown on contemporary maps issuing at Gape Grimmington, which was not a height of land at all. But if in fact a height of land boundary, why not say so in terms ? On the contrary it was treated as a conventional boundary, and not as a physiographical one. When they strike the boundary of the Hudson's Bay territory, they say, we have got home now ; here is the Hudson's Bay boundary, and from here onwards it is plain sailing. But then as they come to the coast, they say : here is the coast of Labrador, and we must remember Newfoundland, and they say : “ As also anything that Newfoundland got since 1763 shall be given back.” In the most comprehensive language they say “ All such territories, islands and countries” shall be given back.

Viscount Haldane.

Viscount HALDANE : Does that include the Indian lands too ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord. As far as I can gather the position seems to change after that with regard to the Indian reservations generally, but I have not been able to track that down with anything like the precision I should like to.

2 Nov., 1926.

Viscount HALDANE : There is this obscurity about the Indian lands. The height of land does not appear to have been a boundary against the Indians in any sense. The Indian land title was one of antecedent standing to Hudson's Bay.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes. The nature of their tenure was described by Lord Watson as a usufructory[sic] right under the protection of the King.

Viscount HALDANE : The radical title was in the Crown.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes.

Viscount HALDANE : And it could not be taken from them. It was not an individual right in each person ; it was the right of the tribe

Sir John Simon.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes.

Viscount FINLAY : On what map or maps can one best follow the description that you have just been reading on pages 158 and 159 ?

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Sir John Simon took us round this part on some map.

Mr. Macmillan.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I afterwards called attention to Mitchell's Map, but it is such a big one for the purpose. I think I did as a matter of fact take you first of all through the description with Map No.12 in the Newfoundland Atlas, merely because it enables you to trace the points.

The Lord Chancellor.

Viscount FINLAY : What do you say, Mr. Macmillan, is the best map for this purpose ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : I suggest your Lordship might look at Map No.11 in the Canadian Atlas—Mitchell's Map. Might I suggest for the assistance of the Board that it might be pinned up upon the neutral territory indicated on the large map, so that it might be conveniently displayed before your Lordships.

Sir John Simon.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I should have thought it might be common ground that you got all the territory you speak of by this Act. The point is what you gave back again.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is important under what title I got it.

Sir JOHN SIMON : My friend says he got a tertium quid, which he has never mentioned from beginning to end. He may be right, but that is the argument.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I have gathered my friend does not think much of my contention.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

2 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.
Mr. Macmillan.
Lord Warrington.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I understand the map that has been pinned up is one of the versions of the map of 1755, No. 11. I have not made any point of it, but we have examined it and it does not quite coincide with what is in the British Museum. I do not think, however, the difference is material.

Mr. MACMILLAN : There is nothing material in the difference. It may be used.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Certainly. The difference is not material. But it is not, in fact, the British Museum map without alteration. Here is the British Museum map which is uncoloured. That map contains a lot of lines which are put on, I suppose, for the information of persons who wanted to know about boundaries. We have a great big map without those colours upon it.

Mr. MACMILLAN : May I draw attention to one thing ? There is a diagonal line across Labrador. It is not a line put on, as many of the other coloured lines are put on, as showing somebody's opinion after the map was brought into existence, because on the inset map up in the corner it says " proposed limit of Hudson's Bay." That is the blue and red line traversing Labrador.

Viscount FINLAY : That is part of the original map.

2 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN: Yes. That is in contradistinction to many of the lines put on for information, and reflecting subsequent transactions. In the original map itself this diagonal line is drawn. It is a diagonal line showing the proposed limit of Hudson's Bay. The only point I am making is that that was not one of the lines added subsequently by some person to indicate some subsequent transaction, but it is in the plate. My Lord Finlay was desirous of following the metes and bounds of the new Province of Quebec. If I may say so, I think that my Lord Warrington had perhaps assisted Lord Finlay to do that on the map.

Lord WARRINGTON : We did try together, but so far as I am concerned I got completely stuck when I got down to the words " Forty-five degrees of northern latitude, on the eastern bank of the River Connecticut," and then tried to keep " the same latitude directly west, through the Lake Champlain, until, in the same latitude, it meets the River Saint Lawrence."

Mr. MACMILLAN : May I adopt, as I think I safely may, Sir John's account of this matter as being accurate. Some days ago Sir John took your Lordships round these boundaries, and he and I went on quite happily for a long part of the journey, and we did not leave company till quite late when he began to draw inferences.

Lord WARRINGTON : I thought he went on to talk about getting to Pennsylvania.

Sir JOHN SIMON : That is exactly what this is. I went through every word of this.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I remember your doing so. And I thought you bridged the difficulties, and carried one round very well. It was only as to our inferences at the end that we were in divergence.

Viscount FINLAY : You are just about to take us round again.

Mr. MACMILLAN : We start with : “ All the territories, islands, and countries in North America, belonging to the Crown of Great Britain, bounded on the south by a line from the Bay of Chaleurs.” Will your Lordships start with the Bay of Chaleurs, and then you will be able to follow on the map the description as I read it from the book. “ All the territories, islands, and countries in North America, belonging to the Crown of Great Britain, bounded on the south by a line from the Bay of Chaleurs, along the high lands which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the River Saint Lawrence from those which fall into the sea, to a point in forty–five degrees of northern latitude, on the eastern bank of the River Connecticut, keeping the same latitude directly west, through the Lake Champlain, until, in the same latitude, it meets the River Saint Lawrence : from thence up the eastern bank of the said river to the Lake Ontario ; thence through the Lake Ontario, and the river commonly called Niagara ; and thence along by the eastern and south–eastern bank of Lake Erie, following the said bank, until the same shall be intersected by the northern boundary, granted by the Charter of Province of Pennsylvania, in case the same shall be so intersected, and from thence along the said northern and western boundaries of the said Province, until the said western boundary strike the Ohio ; But in case the said bank of the said lake shall not be found to be so intersected, then following the said bank until it shall arrive at that point of the said bank which shall be nearest to the north–western angle of the said Province of Pennsylvania, and thence, by a right line, to the said north–western angle of the said Province ; and thence along the western boundary of the said Province, until it strike the River Ohio ; and along the Bank of the said River, westward, to the banks of the Mississippi and northward to the southerly boundary of the territory granted to the merchants adventurers of England, trading to Hudson's Bay."

p. 551

Sir John Simon.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : That means up the Mississippi.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I think up the Mississippi. It is called " northward," but northward means generally a northward direction.

Mr. Macmillan.

Sir JOHN SIMON : My friend will remember that was one of the things discussed in the Ontario–Manitoba case. It came up in the course of the discussion that it was really due to the drafting of Mr. Edmund Burke that this arose.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, he was responsible for the boundaries, but it seems to me to have been taken there up the river till it comes to what is called the southern boundary of the Hudson's Bay territory.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I am not at all satisfied really it conics to strike a line which is due east and west there in view of the fact that the map itself shows just above the boundary of the Hudson's Bay territory it traces that rather irregular line along
; it might be a question whether it struck the boundary of the Hudson's Bay territory when it reached the height of land.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I was just inquiring, my Lord, it might be important on that last topic whether that straight line as distinguished from the height of land here was shown on the original plate of 1855, or whether it was one of those lines put on like many of the lines which were put on.

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : There is no doubt it was on ; there cannot be any question about it.

Lord WARRINGTON: The other one is not on it at all.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I am much obliged to my friend because I see now the distinction may be important.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That red line marked as the southern boundary I do not find on the map of 1855.

2 Nov., 1926.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : That is what I should have thought.

Sir JOHN SIMON : You do find, on the other hand, on the original, the bounds of Hudson's Bay, the wavy line, which I ventured to describe as the height of land.

Mr. MACMILLAN : And you also find in the inset map the straight line going right north-east to Grimington Bay.

Sir John Simon.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : On the original ?

Mr. MACMILLAN: On the original.
p. 552

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Is it printed on ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is in the original plate.

The Lord Chancellor.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : That is marked : “ Proposed Boundary.”

Mr. MACMILLAN : Proposed limits of Hudson's Bay.

Mr. Macmillan.

Sir JOHN SIMON : My friend will remember the historical origin of it, it is to be found in the Hudson's Bay documents, which I read to the Board last week in connection with the Treaty of Utrecht.

Mr. MACMILLAN : You referred also to two or three maps which showed the wavy line.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I cannot see the relevance of it. It seems to me whatever was given to Newfoundland by the Commission and the Proclamation was taken away by the Act of 1774, and whatever was taken away by the Act of 1774 was restored by the Act of 1809.

Mr. MACMILLAN : May I humbly suggest the relevance of it is this. The new Province of Quebec is being constituted, this northern boundary is no longer the straight line from the head-waters of the River St. John to Lake St. John, its boundary northwards is now a thing called the Southern boundary of Hudson's Bay and also it includes all that Newfoundland had given to it in 1763. What happened was, as you see on the King's map, you see the old boundaries of Quebec, the 1763 boundary, still surviving in a shadowy form on that map. You see the line of it which was subsequently washed out after 1774, and the whole of the territory north then falls into Quebec. My submission is it does so under the boundary description of Quebec. My friend says : Not at all, you got that under the words : “ and also all that Newfoundland had.” That was the Act of 1774 and what is of the greatest importance in my opinion is the report upon which it proceeded, in which you have the whole policy of this matter declared in those words I have read. I think I am entitled to say this, that the insistence throughout these documents upon the rights of Newfoundland being derived from the Proclamation—because that occurs over and over again—is not without some intention ; The Proclamation is a document of higher importance than the Commission, and I should submit that it ought to be taken as the ruling document in this matter rather than the Commission, the Royal Proclamation is a document of higher authority than the Commission, and that if and in so far as you find any difference of phrasing in them, the Proclamation is the more authoritative undoubtedly, not only in Parliamentary language, but also in the language of the Lords of the Privy Council. This matter is referred for its inception to the Proclamation and not to the Commission.

2 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

p. 553

Viscount HALDANE : The Proclamation was the act of the Sovereign.

Lord Warrington.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, although it is quite true, as I have been reminded more than once by my Lord Warrington, that the Commission is the constituent document, that is not how it is put either by Parliament or by the Lords of Trade. It is what was done by the Proclamation verbally ; of course, it is true that the Proclamation recites it as something which has been done but the authoritative contemporary documents derive the position of the Governor of Newfoundland from the Proclamation and insist in terms that the policy of the whole thing is care and inspection, words which are inappropriate to territorial administration.

Now, my Lords, one has got to the Act of 1774 it becomes necessary to pass on to the next stage, that next step is the Act of 1809, the Act of Restoration, and here we get again a certain amount of information from the preceding documents.

Lord WARRINGTON : May we go back for a moment to the Proclamation, Mr. Macmillan. It rather occurred to me that was merely a recital and the operative part was to be found in the Commission. I am not quite sure that is so.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I must respectfully say that I was attracted by the way your Lordship put it.

Lord WARRINGTON : I am not quite so sure that expression “ We have also thought fit with the advice of our Privy Council ” to put all that coast and so on, is not part of the Proclamation itself, because if you turn back to the Commission you will find the Commission is not issued by and with the advice of the Privy Council at all.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is very striking if I may say so.

Lord WARRINGTON : The Commission is simply issued apparently on the authority of the King himself without resorting to the advice of the Privy Council. What he says is that the Proclamation is with the advice of the Privy Council, the same language as is used with regard to the four new Provinces.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I was just following that up. That is most informative. There is no doubt Quebec derived from the Proclamation—

Lord WARRINGTON : There again that is a little difficult, they derive from the Letters Patent which are to be issued ; it says : “ and by these Presents Do revoke determine and make void the said Recited Letters Patent and every Clause Article” and so on. I suppose technically it was the Letters Patent which did it.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord Warrington.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That would be the Executive instrument.

Lord WARRINGTON : Yes, it looks rather as if the Proclamation was intended to be operative so far as Newfoundland was concerned.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I am much obliged, I had read it, I confess, grammatically as language of narrative rather, that is why I made perhaps what was rather a concession on my part in the early part of my case.

Lord WARRINGTON : It may not make any difference.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Well, it does explain all this, and all those references I have been reading since from Statutes and other documents where it always puts it on the Proclamation as the effective instrument are probably right. If this be the effective instrument, then my Lords will, I respectfully think, go this length with me that if that is all that Newfoundland effectively got it sounds much less impressive than the language of the Commission and contrasts in the most marked way with what was done for Quebec.

Now as to the documents preceding the framing of the Statute of 1809, fortunately there is not very much upon that. I will ask reference to Volume III, page 1194. It began to appear before very long that this annexation business had been over done so far as Quebec were concerned, and that the Lords of Trade had been right when they said that what you ought to withdraw from the care and inspection of the Governor of Newfoundland is that part of the coast from the River St. John to Cape Phillipeaux instead of which Parliament were more generous to Quebec and just handed the whole thing back, then the kind of trouble which had been anticipated arose and at page 1194 you will find a letter from Governor Holloway of Newfoundland to Lord Castlereagh suggesting re-annexation to Newfoundland. There was a difficulty about the American fishing boats resorting to the coast and a difficulty about the want of jurisdiction in Newfoundland, and vessels could not be sent up to Quebec. The last paragraph of the letter is all I need at the moment read : “ The Coast of Labrador was formerly annexed to this Government, and, I understand by my Papers from the Admiralty was removed to Quebec on account of a few Grants to Individuals, which extended but to a small District, I therefore humbly beg leave to suggest to your Lordship the advantage which will arise to His Majesty's Government by annexing the Coast of Labrador to this Command as the most effectual mode of suppressing this Illicit Trade which otherwise will prove a great evil to the Trade of Great Britain.”

Now this illicit trade is the illicit trade carried on by the

Mr. Macmillan.

Americans who carry “ Great quantities of provisions as well as other contraband articles which they sell and barter to the British merchants.” There must have been some kind of bootlegging going on at this time, and it was thought it would be better to transfer the coast of Labrador to this command, the Newfoundland Command, as an effectual mode of suppressing this

p. 555

illicit trade by these ships that were infringing the customs regulations. That was the inception of the re-transfer.

Lord WARRINGTON: I see it was said the offence which was committed on the coast of Labrador was committed without the jurisdiction of the Government of Newfoundland.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, that was the difficulty, Quebec was too far to go.

Lord WARRINGTON : They took an American vessel and they could not deal with it.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That was the trouble as I have already suggested. There are one or two other letters about it. Page 1198 refers to this same matter. It is a letter from Governor Holloway to Cottrell enclosing papers re seizure of American schooner “ Malinda,” and at line 20 it says : “ I therefore have to solicit their Lordships that the whole of these Papers may be laid before Sir William Scott, that he may see the hardship of the case, and decide thereon accordingly, in order that the Captors might be exonerated from any consequences that might be incurred by this unavoidable delay.” Now the trouble is the disposal of this vessel detected in carrying on an illicit trade. Then I do not think it is necessary to delay further, there is very little other material. The result was the Act of 1809.

Now one turns to it next at page 190. This of course as I started with saying is the beginning of the title of Newfoundland's present rights. One has merely been retracing matters back to the references ; now we come to the starting point in 1809, and not much is to be got out of this because after a recital it simply says it is expedient that the said coast of Labrador and the adjacent islands should be re-annexed to the Government of Newfoundland. We are all agreed it is the same subject-matter as we started from which is being handled here and being handed back : “ For re-annexing Part of the Coast of Labrador and the Islands lying on the said coast to the Government of Newfoundland.” Would my Lords look over the page at what is interesting as a matter of jurisdiction, section 15 of the Act of 1809 enacts : “ And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the said Supreme Court of Judicature of the Island of Newfoundland to hold Plea of all Crimes and Misdemeanors committed, and of all suits and complaints of a civil nature arising within such parts of the Coast of Labrador from the River Saint John to Hudson's Streights and the said Island of Anticosti, and all other smaller Islands so re-annexed to the Governor of Newfoundland or on the Islands, Seas and Harbours, to which ships and vessels repair from the Parts of the Coasts of Labrador and the Island and Islands so re-annexed to the Government of Newfoundland for carrying on the Fishery, in the same manner as the said Supreme Court holds plea of crimes and misdemeanors committed." Again you have the same

p. 556

but a shorter recital of the purpose for which this whole thing was being handled, and it talks of the ships and vessels repairing from the parts of the Coast of Labrador, and the Islands so re-annexed to the Government of Newfoundland for carrying on the Fishery. The whole atmosphere of it again is preserved, the atmosphere of a Fishery, and fishery purposes. Then, my Lords, I may go now to the last statute which we have to consider, namely, the Act of 1825. The Act of 1825 has now to be considered and it is in the Red Volume at page 205, at page 211.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Pages 210 and 211, I think.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Pages 210 and 211. First of all, I am going to go through some of the preliminary documents. Would your Lordships first look at page 1218 in Volume III ? This is a Memorandum submitted by James Irvine of Quebec on the 1st February 1821, and he discusses the position which had arisen from the Act of 1809. He is a Quebec person, and he is disturbed by the results of what has happened by the re-annexation of the coast of Labrador to Newfoundland, and at page 1221, after setting out his reasons, he says, " For the reasons herein set forth, and others that might possibly be urged, it is hoped that the said Act, in so far as relates to the Coast and Islands in question may be repealed, and the said Territories re-annexed to the Province of Lower Canada, to which they appear naturally, and of right, to belong." This is the proposal to reverse what had been done in 1809. My Lords, there is just a small sidelight on page 1220, the small print matter is an embargo which was put on by a Proclamation in 1813, and it is rather interesting that that embargo excepts from its operation certain vessels. Reading from the small print on page 1220, " And we do hereby strictly prohibit and forbid the sailing or departure of any ship or ships, vessel or vessels, having on board any of the before-mentioned articles, from any port or place aforesaid, in and within our said Province of Lower Canada, to any such place, Country, Kingdom, Dominion or Territory aforesaid, save and except such vessels having on board so much of the before-recited articles, as may be necessary only for the supply of those parts of the Coast of Labrador, which are occupied as Trading Posts and Fisheries and have recently been annexed to our Government of Newfoundland” ; you have a very good indication there of what were the things that had been recently annexed to our Government of Newfoundland—“ parts of the Coast of Labrador, which are occupied as trading posts and Fisheries” ;—“ and also in like manner necessary for the supply of the settlements of our Island of Anticosti ; in the Gulph of St. Lawrence” ; and if I may go back, just for a moment, to that critical paragraph, which my Lord Warrington was looking at a moment ago, in the Proclamation, and just read that up with this, there, on page 154, it is also “ to put all that coast,” and “ that coast,” is that coast which had been put under the care and inspection of the Government of Newfoundland, and is that coast upon which an open and free fishery may be carried on ; and therefore, the thing which is being handled is a coast on which a fishery may be carried on. It is merely here and there you find it emphasized. This gentleman (who I see writes from Edinburgh, but was a Canadian merchant) asks for the repeal of they Act of 1809, complaining that the jurisdiction of Newfoundland was operating to his detriment. At page 1223, Lord Dalhousie submits to Lord Bathurst, on the 10th March 1824, a despatch in these terms, “ I have the honour to transmit to Your Lordship, copy of an address presented to me by the Legislative Council of this Province setting forth the evils and inconveniences that have arisen from the Separation of a Portion of the Coast of Labrador and the adjacent Islands from Lower Canada of which they once formed a part, and praying that the same may be re-annexed to this Province ; And as I am myself convinced that this representation is well-founded in every respect, I beg leave to give it my strongest recommendation and support” ; and then follows the address of the Legislative Council of Lower Canada to Lord Dalhousie, which I shall not read, complaining of the result of this re-annexation which had taken place. Then on page 1226 there is a letter from Mr. Cochran to Lord Dalhousie on the 25th March 1825, “ My Lord, I had yesterday the honour of receiving your Lordship's letter of the 21st I am obliged now to trouble you with a matter which 'though of very little importance in itself requires your Lordship's decision. It relates to the application made by the Legislative Council, by an address in the Session of 1824, for the re-annexation of the whole coast of Labrador, up to Hudson's Straights, to the Province of Lower Canada. I have drawn up a statement of the pretensions advanced on the part of Lower Canada and of Newfoundland, which I enclose. The question is whether the claims of the former should not be cut down, and confined to that part of the coast lying West of Bay Forteau—Isle au bois, or Ance à Sablon, inclusive.” I may just pause a moment there, because I will not go back to it, on the point of whether Woody Island is included or not, you see there, my Lords, where the word “ inclusive ” came from, “ Isle au bois or Ance à Sablon inclusive,” the word which troubled my learned friend Mr. Barrington-Ward when he was addressing your Lordship on that small point in the ease, “ Isle au bois, or Ance à Sablon, inclusive (it is no matter which boundary is taken) so as to comprehend the last Canadian Fishing post of any importance on that Shore, and to leave to Newfoundland its most Westerly fishing establishments.” What strange language to use if you are dealing with large territorial claims ! This is a matter of relatively small importance, as he said, but there are claims before us, and I suggest that you just cut this bit of the coast in two, and see that you do it in such a way as to give to Canada the last fishing post of any importance on that shore and leave to Newfoundland—what ? : “ Its most Westerly fishing establishments.” Therefore, we are dealing with fishery establishments, and all this trouble had arisen about conflicting jurisdiction among fishing men and fishing establishments, and this is saying : but the thing so as to leave on one side the fishing stations, which properly belong to Newfoundland, which ought to be under the Governor of Newfoundland, and the stations to the West or the Quebec fishing stations, leave to Quebec. There is the foundation of the whole matter as to how it is to be done : you must see that you comprehend the last Canadian fishing post by the point selected to the Eastward, and the most Westerly establishment of Newfoundland is to be left to Newfoundland, and there you get your point. Then the next passage is at page 1231, on the question of the re-annexing of the coast of Labrador. This is from Newfoundland on the 20th May 1825, to the Under-Secretary of State for the Colonial Department : “ Sir, in the absence of His Excellency the Governor, I beg to transmit to your care a Memorial from the Chamber of Commerce to the Right Hble Earl Bathurst relative to the re-annexing the coast of Labrador to the Government of Canada—a subject, which is considered so intimately connected with the welfare of the Trade and Fisheries prosecuted by many of the Inhabitants of the Island that I flatter myself it will obtain His Lordship's consideration, and be a sufficient apology for the trouble I again give to you.” Of course, the Newfoundland point of view was the opposite side. Then comes what is more important for our purpose, the Memorandum by the Colonial Under-Secretary on the proposed Bill, on page 1234. The writer first deals with the question of the feudal position in Canada, and we need not pause over that ; then there is a question as to the form of land tenure in the second article, and then this is the third topic at page 1235: “ Certain parts of the Coast of Labrador, were settled by French Canadians, & the Lands are held upon French tenures.—It is therefore highly convenient that this part of the Labrador Coast should be annexed to the Government of Canada, But the Act of 1747”“that should be 1809—“ annexes the whole of this Coast to Newfoundland. Therefore, without the assistance of Parliament, it is impossible to carry this object into execution.—The Bill therefore provides, that the Coast shall be divided at a point which the Governors of the respective Colonies have fixed upon.—The point of division is the point at which the Canadian Settlements end.” Now my Lords, that is where you get the Ance Sablon point. It was assumed, although as we have since found not entirely accurately, to be the Eastern terminus of the Canadian fishing stations, and all beyond it were Newfoundland fishing stations. I think subsequent investigation has found that was not entirely so, but that was the endeavour of the Legislature at that time : to get the point on the shore where, at one side. you had Canadian fishing stations, and on the other side Newfoundland fishing stations, and thus end this unhappy controversy which had arisen in consequence of the application now of Newfoundland and now of Canadian Legislation to persons who did not appreciate that administration. It was following upon that that there was passed the Act of 1825, and it is Section 9 which is of importance for the present purpose, at page 210 of the red volume. After recitals, the Statute proceeds at line 42, “ and it is expedient that certain parts of the said Coast of Labrador should be re–annexed to and form part of the Province of Lower Canada : be it therefore enacted, that so much of the said Coast as lies to the Westward of line to be drawn due North and South from the Bay or Harbour of Ance Sablon inclusive, as far as the fifty-second degree of North latitude, with the Island of Anticosti, and all other Islands adjacent to such part as last aforesaid of the Coast of Labrador, shall be and the same are hereby re-annexed to and made a part of the said Province of Lower Canada, and shall henceforward be subject to the laws of the said Province, and to none other.” That is at the foot of page 210 and the top of page 211. Now, my Lords, again it is agreed that we are dealing with the same subject matter throughout. What is now being dealt with is what was being dealt with in 1763, and what is being parcelled out here is a part of the same coast, whatever that may mean ; and much stress was laid by my learned friend upon the method in which the line of demarcation is drawn between Canada and Newfoundland. He points to the fact that the line of demarcation is according to the Statute, a line to be drawn due North and South from the Bay or Harbour of Ance Sablon as far as the fifty-second degree of latitude. My Lords, he has, I venture to say, extracted from that much more than it contains. Of course, this has, in my submission, nothing to do with the question of height of land at all. My learned friend sought in one part of his case to suggest that the origin of the fifty-second degree of latitude was in some way associated with height of land. I will have to deal with that a little later, but I wish to keep close to my text for the moment. Where he sought support from this enactment was in the use of the fifty-second latitude, and that the line that was to be drawn from the coast was to be to that latitude; and then, in an admirable figure of speech, he said : It is an odd way to clip a strip, which is only a mile long, to do so by shears which are 10 leagues long ; and in that dramatic form he puts before your Lordships a point with which I have to deal. At the best, it would only take him this length : that, in the conception of those who were framing this Statute, the Coast at that point was forty miles deep inland—at that point. That would not carry him anywhere near his height of land. That would not carry him to his height of land, my Lord, but the suggestion is taken from it : Well, we cannot be legislating about a mere mile, a mere selvedge, if we have, in order to divide a portion of it, to draw a line which is no fewer than 40 miles across, and you are drawing a ridiculous line—indeed my learned friend called any contrary suggestion nonsensical, and several other epithets. My Lords, is it really so ? There is undoubtedly some small territory involved. If your Lordships were confronted with the task of drawing a line upon a coast for the purpose of dividing two rival interests on the coasts—my Lords, will for the moment forgive me using that language ; I am putting my case for the moment—if you were designing to separate off two compartments of coast and to see that on the one side of that line of demarcation, you had the Newfoundland fishermen, and on the other side of that line of demarcation the Canadian fishermen, and both of them were seated on the shore to this extent, that both of them used the shore, you would necessarily have not merely to state the point of division as a point upon the coast, but you would also need to give an indication of the direction of the line which was to divide these two strips, however broad they were. Never mind how broad they are for the moment, if you were going to divide two coastal areas, you would have to indicate the direction which the line is to take, because a point, again, has only position, but no magnitude ; and the Colonial Governors had said the thing to do is to find the point ; not a word about any depth at all. The point was found by agreement at Ance Sablon ; then the draughtsman, because there is not a word to be found in any of the previous documents at all, that there is any proposal to widen or alter the boundaries of the coast, or to define them—in one view this might be taken against my learned friend as defining “ coast ” as only to the fifty-second degree of latitude inland—in that aspect of it it is against him—that “ coast ” cannot be away up into the interior, because it is only to the fifty-second degree of latitude, which I shall show shortly does not correspond with any height of land at all—but my explanation to your Lordships is this, that the draughtsman said : We are dealing not with a mere mathematical point, we are dealing with interests upon the shore, it is necessary to let fall a perpendicular to get a boundary, or else who is to say a yard inshore on which side of the territory you are ? You are dealing here with a strip along the coast, but you must let fall a perpendicular in order that you may get a line. Then I ask myself this question : why stop at the fifty-second degree of latitude unless that had some special significance ? My Lords, if it had simply said a line due North and South here what would have happened would have been this very remarkable thing, that if you drew a line North and South of Ance Sablon you would throw a very large part of the Coast of Labrador into Canada. You draw the line to the first degree of latitude which is encountered, and looking at the map at the time, you can see exactly how it came about ; it is the first degree of latitude North of this point, you drop your perpendicular (this is my nonsensical suggestion) from the point which the Colonial Secretary said was to be adjusted between these two people in order that you may get your line of partition between what is the fishing station of Newfoundland on the one side and what is the fishing station of Canada on the other, but it might have been said : Do that simply by drawing a line North and South and that will be all right ; instead of doing that they dropped the perpendicular on the fifty-second latitude and it ends there, because if you draw it further it would throw a large part of this Coast into Canada.

2 Nov., 1926.

Viscount HALDANE : Why did they go so far ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : It was the first degree of latitude on the maps of the day—the most natural thing to do.

Mr. Macmillan.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Which map ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : If you look at that map which is displayed there.

Lord Sumner.

p. 561

Sir JOHN SIMON : I quite agree.

Lord SUMNER : You say the first parallel of latitude ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Shown on the map.

Lord SUMNER : Not in the inset, or shown in the margin.

Mr. MACMILLAN: It was the first to the North.

Lord SUMNER : It may be the first that was drawn here ; in the margin they are all shown.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I suggest to your Lordship that what he had before him was a map—I do not know whether that one shows it very well or not—

Lord SUMNER : Yes, it is the next degree drawn across, but the others are shown in the margin.

He is going to say now that we can deal wholly with mathematics. The point on the shore is fixed. Then you have got to make your line of partition, and drop your perpendicular from the first degree of latitude which you encounter. As I say, it is a point which, if a point can be double-edged, is rather a double-edged point, because if this was intended to shear off two section of coast, then here we have the long-sought definition of “ the coast ” : it is 40 miles inland from the shore.

Lord WARRINGTON : Just there it is, but at the other end it is a great deal more.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord ; and therefore you really get very little assistance from this at all as to what is really meant by “ the coast.” Apparently all that is interior means “ coast,” according to the view of my learned friend.

Lord WARRINGTON : But it certainly assumes that a big pink strip here was annexed to Newfoundland in 1809.

2 Nov., 1926.

Lord Warrington.

Mr. MACMILLAN : With submission, my Lord, may I suggest another view ? The other view is this, that what was annexed to Newfoundland in 1809 was the coast there, and in so far as it was not coast it already belonged to Quebec, who had got it in 1774.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Then how would it be “ re-annexed ” ?

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : What was re-annexed was again coast only, my Lord.

Lord WARRINGTON : Then, how do you say that the pink ought to be delineated ? Do you say that you should not go along the fifty-second parallel at all ?

p. 562

Lord Warrington.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Certainly not, my Lords. Along the coast.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Then you would go 40 miles along the coast.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Not necessarily that distance at all. I suggest to your Lordships that the line of the first degree of latitude is not a measurement of depth at all, but it is merely a standard of division. It is the coast to the east and west of a line so drawn. In order to get your line, you must get a direction for the line, but “ the coast east and west ” does not necessarily mean that it is far on top of the line. You set up your standard, and you say “ all that is to the east and west.” You see an interesting example of that sort of conception in Map No. 27, which your Lordships have open there.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord WARRINGTON : I still do not understand why, if you only wanted to get a point on the coast, you did not say “ Anse Sablon ” at once. Why draw a line ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : I have suggested a reason, which may not be a good one, of course.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Why not say “ a line north and south,” and stop there ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : You have got a point on the coast. You are dealing here with rights which are not merely maritime, because I have conceded that there are certain rights on the shore. You are desirous of dividing the coast. Having got your point on the coast, how are you going to say, inland, whether you cut the selvedge that way, or cut the sevedge straight, or cut it this way ?

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I could understand their saying

“ a line drawn due north and south.”

2 Nov., 1926.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord.

Mr. Macmillan.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : But I am puzzled by the later words referring to the 52nd degree.

Mr. MACMILLAN : May I take it in this way : I do not assume, for the moment, that your Lordships have thought that that was the right decision, but I have been taking your Lordship on that point for the moment, and taking it that your Lordship says you could conceive of a person who was desirous of dividing the coast line, doing it by

p. 563

Lord Sumner.

drawing a line north and south. But that would not mean all the coast up to the north pole, plainly ; it would merely mean that you would set up that line as your dividing line.

Then you say “ Why pause at the 52nd degree of latitude ? Why not say ‘ north and south ’ ? ” Let us take a line due north and south from Anse Sablon : Do your Lordships see what it would do ? If you said : “ All the coast of Labrador west of a line drawn due north and south from Anse Sablon, it would have put the whole of that coast of Labrador there (indicating on the map) into Canada. That would have been the result of saying : “ All the coast to the west or east respectively of that line.”

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord SUMNER : But if “ the coast ” means a one-mile strip, or a strip of any other distance you like, say half a mile, then by saying, “ so much of the coast as lies to the westward of that line,” you have defined what is transferred, whether your line is 100 yards or ten miles, or ten thousand miles ; because you are saying : “ I give the coast that way to one, and that way to the other, and this is nothing but a strip.” A post would have done quite as well, or two posts, each a mile from the other. But when it puts in “ as far as the 52nd degree of north latitude,” it is a purely vicious and superfluous addition if it merely means to mark a point in a line of coast the width of which is already fixed by the consideration of what “ the coast ” is meant to include.

Mr. MACMILLAN : May I suggest this ? I am fully sensible of the point, of course.

Lord Sumner.

Lord SUMNER: Yes.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : May I suggest that at this time no one knew, any more than we know in this room, where this line was to be. That will not be known until your Lordships have decided this case. At that time what was known was that Newfoundland had interests on the coast. Nobody knew what was the extent of those interests, and nobody could partition them. You could not have put up a post at the interior point, because no one knew where it was. Their method of dividing the coastal interests was to let fall a perpendicular on the nearest latitude, and say that that would make clear where the dividing line was.

Lord SUMMNER : I could understand that if somebody had given instructions by shewing a map and saying : “ Do you see Anse Sablon ? ”—“ Yes.”—“ Well then, where do you run up to ? ”—“ The 52nd parallel.”—“ Very well ; then I will describe this line as marked in pencil on the map.” If they were doing that, I could follow it.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Very possibly your Lordship has reconstructed the situation. One naturally has puzzled very much to find out why this thing has appeared here for the first time, because it is the first time it appears in the history of this matter. Its inception is completely wrapped in mystery.

Lord SUMNER : He evidently had that letter, because he slavishly copied the wording of it when he was doing it.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That was the whole origin of the thing. The Legislature has done it, and it is one of the most puzzling things in the case. Its origin none of us can get at. My learned friend has an ingenious theory, which I shall have to deal with in a moment ; it is one which is well worthy of consideration, of course, as all his submissions are, but for the moment the position is very peculiar. No one has ventured, up to this point, to say what is the depth of the coast. No one has ventured to say that. We have always been dealing with terminii on the coast, hitherto. Now, here is a draughtsman who has fitted himself out with shears of this length for the purpose of dividing this coast, and my learned friend Sir John Simon's suggestion is : “ Here at least is a person who knows how deep a coast is.”

2 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

The Lord Chancellor.

Mr. Macmillan.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I do not think he says that. I think he says : “ Here is a person who knows how deep is the coast which is to be re-annexed to Quebec.”

Sir JOHN SIMON: Yes ; that is what I said.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : And he draws an inference.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Look at Mitchell's Map and you will see it.

Mr. MACMILLAN : How deep is the portion of the coast that is to be re-annexed ? It is a portion of the same thing that we are dealing with throughout. It is always a certain “ X ” ; a thing known as “ the coast.” Its depth is unknown to us just now, but we are dealing with the same thing throughout. I rather thought that it came to this, that in parcelling out this thing, whatever it be, or this coast, whatever be its depth, between us, it was necessary to take a pair of scissors with a 40-mile blade, because otherwise you would not completely sever this coast at this point. That was how I conceived it.

2 Nov., 1926.

The Lord Chancellor.

Viscount FINLAY : Is it necessary that the coast should be of a uniform width ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, my Lord, probably not.

Viscount FINLAY : I thought, from something that you said, that you implied that it should be so.

Mr. MACMILLAN : At this point, apparently, “ the coast ” which these people were sharing between themselves, if the line is of any real significance, is 40 miles deep. I think I am entitled to say that.

p. 565

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I do not understand it. You may be entitled to say so, but I do not understand it. I only understand that they are going to re-annex to Quebec a part of the coast of Labrador which is bounded on the east by this 40-mile line.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : That is how it is treated in all the maps.

Mr. MACMILLAN: They are going to re-annex a portion of the coast.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : But it does not follow that that is the full depth of the coast.

Mr. MACMILLAN : With great respect, my Lord—

The LORD CHANCELLOR: It may be much deeper, and yet they may only re-annex 40 miles of it.

Mr. MACMILLAN : May I suggest to your Lordship that that runs counter to what both of us are accepting here, namely, that the subject of annexation, re-annexation, and re-reannexation is, throughout, the same subject matter.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Indeed it is not. I am assuming that.

Mr. MACMILLAN: If it be the same subject matter that I am getting back a bit of what I had to give away. It is not a bit of a bit of a bit of the thing itself that I gave away that I am getting. It is a bit of the same thing as I gave away.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : A piece of it, certainly.

Mr. MACMILLAN : And as we are agreed that it is the same thing, that may be like this pointer that I hold in my hand, a bit being taken away and then given back again. Then it, is said : “ We know how thick it is, because we can see that the bit that you are going to get back is 40 miles thick, and that gives us an index of the thing that we have been handling all along, the depth of which we did not know.”

2 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I think what Sir John Simon says is that it is at least 40 miles thick.

Mr. MACMILLAN : If it is that thickness, then I did not get back all that Newfoundland got from me, because then we are departing from what has been the keynote of our debate hitherto, that it is one and the same thing. whatever it be that is being bandied backward and forward between us.

4 F 2

Now, your Lordship said that it was conceivable that you could say : “ All that lies to the east and west of a meridian,” or as it would be in this case, “ upon the east and west of a particular line drawn.” My suggestion to your Lordships is that if you had not stopped at the first latitude, and dropped a perpendicular on that, but had simply said : “ All the coast of Labrador east and west of a line drawn north and south of Ance Sablon,” that line would have come very much where my pointer now stands on the map, and it would have thrown into Canada the whole of the coast down to here—(Indicating), all of which is west of a line drawn north and south from Ance Sablon. No explanation has been offered for the selection of that latitude except one, for which, so far as I can find, there is no basis except conjecture.

Just let me examine it for a moment. Your Lordships will recall that my learned friend does not complete his case by establishing the Hudson's Bay watershed on the north ; he has to get a watershed on the south also, in order to complete his line. Now, if one looks at his map, there are two watersheds involved. There is first of all his watershed down through Labrador, and for that he invokes Hudson's Bay. But he has also to get another watershed which is not the Hudson's Bay watershed at all. Perhaps it has not been made sufficiently plain hitherto, that in order to get his triangle, as I may roughly call it, he parts company with Hudson's Bay somewhere down about here in the elbow—(Indicating) : and then he has got to switch himself on to someone else. He cannot here invoke the Hudson's Bay height of land. he has got to get somebody else to guide him along this part. It is a very curious position of matters, as it is now exemplified in the claim. The blue line drawn along this latitude unhappily does not coincide, even on his own map, with the height of land. Your Lordships see this large bulge here in both of these places (indicating), in which my learned friend proposes, if you please, to absorb into Newfoundland a considerable part of the territory which actually drains into the St. Lawrence through Quebec land. So far from the 52nd degree of latitude, this line along here, being a watershed line, it is a purely arbitrary line drawn along there, and it is not related to the watershed at all.

Will your Lordships just take, along with that, Map No. 27, Gibson and Bowen, to which my learned friend referred. There you get a very interesting sidelight upon this matter. That map shows that, so far from the northern boundary of Quebec having been fixed in relation to the height of land, it was not fixed in relation to that at all. For my own purposes I have hatched in a portion in Gibson's map between the pink (which was to be the Quebec boundary) and the height of land. Now this map your Lordships see “Lands height.” That is just to the north of the new Quebec, the pink Quebec.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount FINLAY : Is it that slanting line ?

p. 567

Mr. MACMILLAN : You Lordship sees first of all the pink line, the irregular pink line of the proposed boundary for Quebec. Does your Lordship see this line here ? (indicating)

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Yes.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Then does your Lordship see a line here, away up to the north, as much again away from the St. Lawrence, marked “Lands Height” ?

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Yes.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is the lands height mark shown on the map. So far from the northern boundary of Quebec having been proposed on the basis of that height of land, it is shown that it is only taking about half of what is marked as the height of land into Quebec. Then on the southern margin of the proposed Quebec, where you have the spine in the Gaspé Peninsula, my learned friend said that you have got there an example of how to do it. You take the height of land, and then you get what is the right way of setting about the task. But, unfortunately, when you go up into Quebec and see the proposed boundary, instead of having any relation to the height of land at all, it is miles away from the height of land. What was actually done was not to take the boundary as you see it, because that is a wavy line. I have drawn on my own map (and your Lordships can do the same thing, so as to see what I mean) the real boundary from the head waters of the St. John down to Lake St. John. I have drawn that line, and if your Lordships would just for one moment glance at my copy of the map, that is the line that I have drawn. Therefore, that line as it was ultimately arranged, was not intended to be coincident with the height of land at all, and it was not related to the height of land.

No, my Lords, my learned friend's effort has been this, he has said : “Why the 52nd degree ?” and like myself, if I may venture to say so he has probably been puzzled by the selection of that line. It is puzzling. Why the 52nd degree ? And his search for an explanation is all linked up with this question of the height of land, and it is very ingenious. He says first of all : “In those days they did not really know what the source of the St. John was, and they assume another river, the Romaine which runs into the St. Lawrence, not far from the St. John River, to be, in its upper waters, the continuation of the River St. John. The St. John, of course, in reality falls short in its head waters of the 52nd degree of latitude; but if you pray in aid the head waters of the River Romaine, then you will find that you have got up into the region of the 52nd degree." He cannot say that it is the actual 52nd degree. Then the suggestion goes on to say that that corner of the lozenge was really intended to be at the 52nd degree, and then he says : " Now I get the explanation, because, if I draw the line from the 52nd degree right along, then I come opposite to Ance Sablon and draw down a

Sir John Simon.

p. 568

perpendicular there, and then I shall get a satisfactory explanation of the line." But it is a line which is associated, as he would have it, as far as I can understand it, at any rate, with the height of land.

Sir JOHN SIMON : If I may interrupt for a moment—

Mr. MACMILLAN: I shall be very glad indeed to be helped about this. I am not sure that I really follow it.

Mr. Macmillan.

Sir JOHN SIMON : If I may say so, it is not, as my learned friend says, my ingenuity. As a matter of fact, it is to be seen on the face of the documents. If you look at Mitchell's Map, the one that is now put up, you see the wash which indicates the outline of the lozenge, and you will see that the apex of the lozenge is approximately on the 52nd parallel. Then, if you carry your eye along the 52nd parallel to the east, you will find that you are approximately running along what appears to be the source of the water. That is all it is. It is not my invention, but it is all there on Mitchell's Map.

Lord Warrington.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I thought your intervention was to assist me, Sir John. I have heard your argument, and I have no doubt their Lordships have retained it.

Sir JOHN SIMON : My point was that it really is the Mitchell Map.

Mr. MACMILLAN : In point of fact, there is not a single map which shows the headwaters of the St. John, as then known on the 52nd degree.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord WARRINGTON : Is there any map or document which fixes that angle of the grey on the sketch map ? The angle purports to be actually on the 52nd parallel. If it is on the 52nd parallel one can understand why they ran the boundary of what is called the land to the west, or the coast if you like, the coast to the west of that line, along the 52nd parallel, because it would bring it in accurate connection with the eastern boundary of the then existing Province of Quebec.

Mr. MACMILLAN : My answer to it is, I hope, complete. In the first place, the headwaters of the River St. John are not on the 52nd degree. This map, of course, is conveniently drawn to suggest that they are. You get lost in a broad belt of blue there. I have had these maps most freely examined, and your Lordship may remember at the very start of the case my Lord Sunnier, I think it was, drew Sir John Simon's attention to the fact that the upper waters of the St. John do not coincide on the 52nd. I have gone through map after map for the purpose of seeing how this looks. First of all, let us take this very map. Before look at the map would your Lordship allow me to say one further word of caution : it is nothing to the purpose for my learned friend to say that the geographers of those days were mistaken as to where the St. John was, or that they selected the St. John headwaters as they knew them. It is quite true that the present St. John waters are not nearly up to the 52nd, but the headwaters of another river, the Romain, are up to the 52nd and a great deal beyond it ; whereas the St. John is not up to the 52nd degree of latitude. If you add together a bit of the Romain to a bit of the St. John it is true you will get the 52nd. That would be delightful for my learned friend's point if it would only stop there, but this unfortunate river on the map (and it was the map that they were considering) will not obey logic, and it will persist in coming from a place a great deal beyond the 52nd degree of latitude. My learned friend said that all the maps bear it out. Shall we just look at one or two of the maps, and see ? It is on the map that is exhibited there. If my Lord Warrington would look for a moment at the top apex of Quebec, which my learned friend said several times shows it on the map, you will see that that wash in Quebec is shown, even on that map itself, extending to what, on the scale, is miles beyond the 52nd degree of latitude. (Their Lordships examined and discussed the Map.)

Lord SUMNER : I think if you look at the inset it is not quite so clear.

Mr. MACMILLAN: It is a little difficult to judge from the inset and you do not get the advantage of the wash, as you do here. If your Lordship looks at the wash on that map, it is carried right up beyond the 52nd degree.

Lord WARRINGTON: I forget where it is you get the upper waters of the St. John as fixing the apex of that.

Mr. MACMILLAN : In the 1763 proclamation it is : “ Hence from the headwaters of the River St. John to the Lake St. John.”

Sir JOHN SIMON : I do not want to interrupt my learned friend in his argument, but may I say this while your Lordships are looking at the map. If you take the inset you will observe that the inset itself has the indications of the parallels of latitude quite precisely ; not only is there the 50th and the 55th, but you can pick out at once the 52nd. If you draw a line across joining 52 on either side, you will see how very closely it comes to what is there depicted as the headwaters.

2 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord SUMNER : 52 is about there. You mean joining the two there ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : If you take a small enough scale you can make them coincide. You can make Great Britain and America look only an inch apart from one another, if you make the scale small enough. If you get the big map on which the persons concerned with this matter have actually drawn in the limits of Quebec, you will see there the shadow of the former Quebec on the map, and you will see it running up diagonally past the 52nd degree of latitude, because the River St. John is shown on that map beyond the 52nd.

p. 570

Lord SUMNER : It runs up on the map as far as the river runs.

Mr. MACMILLAN : The point is that it is beyond the 52nd degree. As far as I can find, there is no suggestion anywhere that the 52nd degree of latitude had anything whatever to do with the northern boundary of the Province of Quebec as established in 1763. I know it is a point that my learned friend is most anxious to establish, because I gather from his interest in the subject that he regarded it as vitally important. If you take the maps one after the other (and we have been through, I think, all of them) you will not find that the headwaters of of the River St. John, as depicted on those maps, bear out my learned friend's contention in any way, that the headwaters are the 52nd degree.

Viscount HALDANE : Is there any document that suggests why the 52nd parallel was suggested ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : I do not quite appreciate.

Viscount HALDANE : Is there any document which throws any light upon why they came to the 52nd ?

Lord Warrington.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I can point to none. If there had been any, I am sure the researches of one side or the other would have found it. My learned friend has not found any, and I have found none, and therefore we are each groping for a reason. My learned friend's reason is that that the old Quebec boundary was at the headwaters of the St. John ; the headwaters of the St. John are the 52nd latitude, and therefore if you draw a line along, look how well the whole thing fits in.

Viscount HALDANE : It was not so.

2 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord Warrington.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It was not so in fact on any map shown at that time, and by 1825, my Lord, the old boundary of Quebec had long disappeared off the map, because that boundary washed in there up to the headwaters of the St. John had ceased to be the northern boundary of Quebec in 1774. I think that is right, my Lord. Therefore this idea that in 1825 it was desirable to select a latitude which would bring you to a certain point of contact with the imagined position of the upper waters of the River St. John, which was a terminus of a now obliterated boundary, seems, with great respect, to be a little far-fetched.

Mr. Macmillan. Lord WARRINGTON : Taking the maps as we assume they knew them, and assuming that the River St. John shown on those maps was intended to be, so far as it extended, the eastern boundary of the old Quebec, then it extended, according to those maps, up to at all events the 52nd parallel.
p. 571

Lord Warrington. Mr. MACMILLAN : Not in every case even up to it. The curious thing is that they showed such a diversity ; some fall short of it, and some overshoot it.

Mr. Macmillan. Lord WARRINGTON : Taking it that it extended up to the 52nd parallel, they want to re-annex to Quebec the bit of land which is assumed to be referred to in the Act of 1825, and if they take that 40 miles up to the 52nd parallel, they do not say what the northern boundary is to be—they do not say that at all—but they simply say the coast west of that. They do not say what the western boundary of it is to be, obviously for the reason that when you get far enough you come against the boundary of Quebec. Is it not natural to suppose that what they really meant is what is delineated in the sketch map there as the boundary ?

Viscount Haldane.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is the attractiveness of argument put against me. It is that that I am endeavouring to show is founded on a series of fallacies.

Lord Warrington. Lord WARRINGTON: What do you say they did—take a line from the top where the northern line hits the 52nd parallel and measure 40 miles all along the coast ?

Mr. Macmillan. Mr. MACMILLAN : No, my Lord. My conception of the matter is that all along they were dealing with a strip of coast, and that is what they dealt with there, a strip of coast.

Viscount HALDANE : You are dealing with coast and nothing but coast, and according to you they took a line to bisect it, and it was the coast and the coast alone ?

Mr. MACMILLAN: It was not a line north and south. If you did that you would get it drawn too far. It was a perpendicular line. There is no light to be thrown upon this mystery by any document. If you could only get something from them it might be helpful.

2 Nov., 1926. Lord WARRINGTON : Still, I do not see why they should draw the line there ; I do not see why they should not draw

Mr. Macmillan. the line westward from Anse Sablon.

Lord Sumner. Mr. MACMILLAN : They had the opportunity of saying, the terminus on the west, because they could have said the River of St. John where it debouches on to the sea. No depth of land was specified there, and similarly Cape Chidley is given and no depth is given. It is true they might have said Anse Sablon as a point on the coast, but the draughtsman, for some reason or other discharged his task in that way ; he is the author of the puzzle. But my learned friend cannot find in any contemporary document anything which vouches his theory at all ; and for the moment

I was examining his theory to see whether it was a satisfactory theory which would account for the position. His theory is this : if you draw a line on the 52nd degree of latitude, then you go along to the corner of Old Quebec ; and in that way you will get an explanation, which is at least plausible, of what was done.

Viscount Haldane. Lord SUMNER : Prima facie, as it is a line with a very carefully measured length, it is a dimension. You have first of all to establish that it is nothing but a mode of describing more carefully the meaning, and then you say it is not a dimension at all ; the existence of the line shows nothing one way or the other as to what had been meant previously by the word “ Coast.” I think that is what you have to make out, is it not ?

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord, that is so.

Lord SUMNER : Otherwise you may be faced with the contention that at any rate that portion of the back land which lies eastward of this line up to the 52nd parallel is part of the coast as previously understood in the previous Acts.

Lord Sumner.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord.

Viscount HALDANE : It is not a dimension, any more than the Equator is a dimension. If the Equator had happened to be a convenient line to select, it would have been selected.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It says “ so much of the said coast as lies to the westward of a line to be drawn due north and south.” May I pause there for a moment ? Suppose it had simply been that, I think one could not have said it would have been a dimensional line at all, because no one would suggest that when you are dividing a place by saying “ all that lies to the west of a particular degree,” it does not mean the whole world to the west of it.

Lord SUMNER : It would be such a line as was sufficient for the purpose. A line drawn north and south would be such a north and south line as would be required to divide it into two. When it goes up to the 52nd parallel the Legislature must have had some reason for it.

2 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : There it is, and your Lordship is charitable enough to say that the legislature must have had some meaning.

Lord SUMNER: Not charitable.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Loyal enough to say that ; and we must assume that.

p. 573

Lord SUMNER: There is no logic in it, because you are only dealing with the coast.

Mr. MACMILLAN: It will not do if you are not dealing with the coast, if you are dealing with the interior. I do not think Sir John is going to say—he disclaimed it when I suggested it some time ago—that the coast is 40 miles deep only and they are going to gain only a bit of the selvedge back and not the whole selvedge. If you are to interpret the word “ coast ” as used in 1763 onwards then if it is not as I said, what is it ? The scissors are only 40 miles long in the shear and the scissors are not going to cut the whole coast. Therefore the only aid he can get from it is that the coast is 40 miles wide if you are dividing the thing between two parties, or else you have not divided the whole thing between the two parties. I do not conceal for a moment that it is a very puzzling thing ; this is its only appearance in the whole Grant.

Viscount HALDANE : There is nothing to show that the 40 miles was intended to be the boundary of Quebec.

Mr. MACMILLAN : No.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : It may have been put in by the Committee of the House of Commons for all we know.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That has been ransacked, my Lord ; everything has been ransacked, and we cannot get any light. The most likely thing is that it is the draftsman who has done it, if we may conjecture.

Viscount FINLAY : The general culprit.

Mr. MACMILLAN : The general culprit, my Lord, and probably he did it from over ingenuity. He may have had in mind what one has in mind from one's early school days : Drop a perpendicular to the nearest line, and he has dropped his perpendicular and said, one side of that is to be the coast of Newfoundland.

May I suggest that your Lordships should just look at Map No. 27 again for a moment ; I would like to make a point upon that. This is one of the maps that Sir John has shown and that I have shown you also. Your Lordships may remember that although it professes to represent the definitive treaty concluded at Paris, the boundary of Quebec does not correspond with the statutory boundary, which is this straight line down here. This is more or less accurate here, because it is up to the head waters of the St. John, but this is Newfoundland under the Proclamation of 1763. All that is shown as appurtenant to Newfoundland in this map, as a contemporary conception of the thing, is not that Newfoundland starts from the same depth up this line ; but this is Quebec, and Newfoundland, so far as one can see, is merely tinted as a coastal belt of indefinite length.

Viscount HALDANE : Where would the 52nd parallel stop in that map ? It would not be at the top, would it ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : I am not quite sure, and I do not want to make a mistake. It would not be up to the top.

Viscount HALDANE : Then it is not prima facie a dimensional line ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Probably not, my Lord.

Viscount HALDANE : It does not fit Quebec only and it does not fit Labrador.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : That is earlier than 1805, is it not ?

2 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount Haldane.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord, this is 1763. It is a Board of Trade map, the one that accompanied their report. What I am concerned to show is this. There is, if I may say so, an attractiveness in saying that if you put a boundary down on paper, the things on each side of the boundary are the same breadth. If you sever a piece of tape you get a piece of tape on each side of the same size ; but what the Lords of Trade had in their minds at this time was the Quebec which goes to the head waters of the St. John, but on the other side was a coast, whatever it is ; it is not suggested to be of the same breadth at all or up to the St. John ; all that is done is to colour in the map there a coastal bit ; it shows that on one side there is not the whole breadth at all but merely a colouration upon the coast.

Viscount HALDANE : It does not fit, according to you, if it was meant to define the amount of coast. It only fits for the purpose of a line to one side of which you proceed to confine the coast.

2 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is so, my Lord. As Lord Sumner put it a moment ago, if one could reconstitute the thing you could say ; Now here is the point Anse Sablon, east of that the Newfoundland fisheries and to the west the Canadian. Now there you are; that is a line drawn in, but the line is left indefinite. The first thing to do is to drop your perpendicular to the 52nd degree of latitude ; then you may say, carry your line so far or carry your line north and south up beyond that, and you may then find that you get out into the sea ; drop your perpendicular there and then all the fisheries to the east of that go one way and all the fisheries to the west go the other way. That is, in my humble submission the way of putting that. I also say, further, that no amount of maps which have been drawn—and there are maps in this case which show every conceivable view of every conceivable problem—can be used for this purpose of altering the territorial boundaries of these provinces. If this question, for example, had been postponed for another 150 years and had come up then, your Lordship's unhappy successor would have found a wealth of modern maps showing the boundary of Labrador in every conceivable kind of form ; but the territory is not at the disposal of these people, in the sense that cartographers can be bandying it about ; the thing has to be dealt with on the terms of these Statutes.

Viscount FINLAY : My impression is that that has nothing to do with the width of the coast at all.

Mr. MACMILLAN : My Lord, I am comforted to hear that.

Viscount FINLAY : That is my impression.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I have heard so impressive an argument to the contrary, that I feel it my duty to do my best to counter it. I felt it was just a notional line drawn there for the purpose of showing, as the authors of the Act intended, something whereby you could see on the one side Canadian fisheries, and on the other, Newfoundland.

My Lords that really will conclude my exposition of the Statutes. There are a few topics to be taken up apart from one or two matters that I propose to leave to Mr. Geoffrion, and may I just add what your Lordship overlooked yesterday in reminding me of the matters to be dealt with : that there is one chapter which has not been opened yet at all. Be it that the line is a coast line only : then the question comes, Where is the coast line of Labrador? We are agreed that the coast line is to follow all the sinuosities, that is to say, all the bays. You are not going to be troubled, if I may say so, with the Alaska Bay question in the same form. I cannot say we are agreed, but the position is this, that if we discard the height of land and get down to the coast, then the depth of coast, whatever it may be, is to be measured by a line following the sinuosities of the coast right down to Anse Sablon from Cape Chidley.

2 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

The LORD CHANCELLOR: What about the inlets ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Following all the inlets except one, which in our view is not an inlet at all, namely, Lake Melville. We only raise one question upon the definition of the coast line. We say that Lake Melville is not an inlet of the sea, but is an inland lake.

Viscount FINLAY : Is Lake Melville salt water ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is partly, my Lord.

Lord SUMNER : Commonly called brackish.

p. 576

Mr. MACMILLAN : Not very, my Lord. Your Lordship will read an interesting account of it and that you can make tea with its water. I have tried making tea with salt water, but it is the most appalling compound that I know.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Do the Esquimaux drink it ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : No ; it was a white trader who made tea up there. My Lords, the question will be a quite interesting one and not a very long one. It is simply a question of whether that is an inlet of the sea or whether it is not.

Viscount FINLAY : Are you going to deal with that ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, I shall deal with that, my Lord.

MORNING SESSION.

Mr. MACMILLAN : My Lords, I am afraid I can contribute nothing further as to the origin of the reference to the 52nd degree of latitude in the Act of 1825 beyond this. My learned friend, Mr. Alexander, who is with me, has been through the papers in the House regarding the progress of that Bill of 1825, and it is, perhaps, a matter of interest that he informs me that in the Bill as introduced it stops at the critical point and simply says : “ at a point . . .,” leaving a blank to be filled in. So that the Bill as originally introduced apparently had not the 52nd degree of latitude, and it must have been introduced at some subsequent stage of the Bill because it is now in the Act.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I never saw a Bill like that.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is an interesting point. I have sent for the Bill if your Lordships would care to look at it. It must have been introduced at a later stage. So far as my friend's researches have gone, it has not been possible to find in any proceedings, in Committee or otherwise, what its origin was. I do not say anything more about that. It is merely a contribution to the history of the matter.

Would your Lordships this morning be good enough to consider for a few minutes the question of the southern boundary of the territory now claimed by Newfoundland ? Attention has been largely concentrated upon the boundary which has been coterminous with the Hudson's Bay Company's boundary, but I venture to think a short examination of the contention of Newfoundland with reference to the southern boundary of the area is useful. Your Lordships will see upon the map the claim as indicated by the blue line is that the boundary between Canada or Quebec and Newfoundland, on the south proceeds from the point of contact of this line drawn to the 52nd degree of latitude in a straight line westward until it reaches a point, as your Lordships see, just above the slate and yellow. Then it proceed, to deviate from the straight line and follows a dotted line up to a point where there is a divergence in the dotted line, and then it takes a right hand turn and goes up north.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord WARRINGTON: That is following what appears on the map to be the watershed.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes.

Lord WARRINGTON: Because the Ashuanipi Lake appears to be the head of the watershed going first northwards.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes. I think it is designed to follow the
p. 581

Lord Warrington. watershed line there. Upon that if your Lordships would look at the written claim which is stated on the first and second pages of the Case for Newfoundland, you will see they put it thus : “ The Colony of Newfoundland, submits that the correct answer to the question referred to in paragraph 1 hereof is that the boundary should be a line drawn due north from Anse Sablon ”—so that we start at that point—“ as far as the fifty–second degree of North latitude, and should be traced from thence northwards to Cape Chidley along the crest of the watershed of the rivers flowing into the Atlantic Ocean. This line of boundary is shown coloured blue on the map marked ‘ A ’.” There is a curious hiatus. We are first taken up to the point of the fifty–second degree of latitude, and it says, “ shall be traced front thence northwards.” I think in order to read that fairly, that must be taken from the fifty–second degree of latitude. But one would have expected that it would have conformed with the map, that having reached that point, then it would be along the fifty–second degree of latitude until that degree cuts the watershed line, thence following the St. Lawrence watershed line until it encounters the Atlantic watershed line, and thence north.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord Sumner. Lord WARRINGTON : They made it quite clear after the next line or two, because they say : “ This line of boundary is shown coloured blue on the map marked ‘ A,’ which will be found in the pocket of, and forms part of, this Case.” So that they make it quite plain what they mean.

Mr. Macmillan. Mr. MACMILLAN : The difficulty of the description is this. The crest of the watershed until you come to the turning point to the right is not the crest of the watershed of the rivers flowing into the Atlantic Ocean, but is the crest of the watershed of the rives flowing into the St. Lawrence. Therefore there is a curious gap in their description perhaps made advisedly. You will observe the watershed on the south is a watershed of rivers flowing into the St. Lawrence, and not the Atlantic watershed. The Atlantic watershed begins at the other point.

Lord SUMNER : Supposing the Newfoundland Case was very much better for the Hudson Bay watershed than the St. Lawrence boundary, and that the Hudson Bay watershed as the proper line could be established, but that there was an insoluble ambiguity about the gap between the intersection at the 52nd degree of latitude and the intersection of the 52nd degree of latitude with the Hudson Bay watershed. How would the result be affected ? Do they fail in toto ? Do they succeed in part ? Or do you succeed ?

4 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I think it would be for them to formulate what they maintain to be their claim in the Labrador Peninsula. So far as my contention is concerned I have to put it this way. My case is a complete case ; I do not accept either of these boundaries. But I appreciate the difficulty. Suppose they are able to get a boundary at one point with a degree of precision which would satisfy your Lordship, but not at another, and leave it vague, I think at all events I would be entitled to say. What do you do with your boundary there ?

p. 582

Lord SUMNER : You say they fail in toto if they fail there.

Mr. MACMILLANT : No doubt that would be putting the issue in its sharpest form. On this point of the southern boundary there is a considerable amount of vagueness all, it is plain that when the northern boundary of old Quebec in 1763 was constituted by the line drawn from the Headwaters of the River St. John to the Lake St. John that was not a watershed line. It contrasted that respect to the watershed line on the Gaspé Peninsula.

Viscount FINLAY : That could not be.

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, my Lord, because no watershed is a straight line in nature. Therefore this was a purely arbitrary line drawn on the northern boundary of Quebec. That appears equally from the other map, No. 27, where the Quebec boundary is shown not as a straight line but as your Lordships may remember, as a waving line with the height of land at a considerable distance beyond it. So that I think one may say that so far as the original conception of Quebec in 1763 is concerned, it was at no time contemplated that that line should be a watershed line from that post. Starting with that circumstance, my learned friends are much concerned to establish that the Head-waters of the River St. John were selected as the terminus a quo for the boundary of Quebec in 1763, because that line was in some way related to the 52nd degree of latitude. My submission upon that is that the 52nd degree of latitude had nothing whatever to do with the fixation of that point, and that it was not in the mind of any person at, that time that they were relating the proposed boundaries of Quebec to the 52nd degree at all. One has to remember this. Those who framed the boundaries of at that time must have had some maps before them. Such maps as relate to that period are before my Lords in the two Atlases, and it is not by ex post facto examination of the true length of the River St. John that the intention of 1763 is to be gauged, but by the material and the information which were before those in 1763 who addressed themselves to the problem. And in 1763, so far as my researches go, there is no map that shows that the headwaters of the St. John, that is to say the terminus a quo, coincides with or is even near the 52nd degree of latitude.

4 Nov., 1926.
Mr. Macmillan.

The matter goes a little further, because one of the maps I have been looking at, and to which my learned friend referred, viz., Map No. 16 in the Newfoundland Atlas, shows an extraordinary discrepancy in this matter. Would your Lordships look at the description of that map. It is this : “ A new map of the Province of Quebec according to the Royal Proclamation of the 7th of October, 1763, from the French Surveys connected with those made after the war by Captain Carver and other officers in His Majesty's service.”

Would your Lordship look at that map, which is a contemporary map, and which had in view this very Proclamation which settled the boundaries of Quebec; and look at the River St. John as there delineated, no doubt incorrectly delineated, because as we know it was a comparatively short river. There was another river near it, called the Romaine River, which went very much further. But there is the conception at that time of Captain Carver and the other officers who made that map. You observe that the corner on the north-east of Quebec runs right up to the 53rd degree of latitude, and not to the 52nd degree. There is thus a large corner of Quebec which is north of the 52nd parallel. Similarly, if one looks at the other maps one finds the same thing. I will not weary your Lordships by going over them again, but the large map which is called the King's map, and which is before your Lordships, and is fastened to the cartoon, again shows the River St. John going up beyond the 52nd parallel. The result of going through the whole series of these maps is to find an extraordinary divergence in the ideas as to where the River St. John was. A considerable number of the maps show the headwaters of the River St. John falling short of the 52nd degree of latitude, while quite a number show the river passing beyond. The result is that so far from the 52nd degree of latitude being a line which would pass through the north-east corner of old Quebec, it would do nothing of the sort, and would leave a projection north-east of the old Province. Of course, in 1825 my Lords remember that the boundaries of 1763, had, so to speak, disappeared off the map, because the boundaries of 1763 had been superseded by the extension of 1774, and consequently in 1825 the old boundary of Quebec was a matter of past history. It had subsisted from 1763 to 1774, but from 1771 onwards that old boundary of Quebec had disappeared.

Would your Lordships also note Map No. 27, which was the map before the Lords of Trade in 1763. I have already referred to Map No. 11. From none of those maps will my learned friend be able, I submit, to establish that the headwaters terminus of the River St. John inland was at a point on the 52nd degree of latitude. I am not going through the actual figures, but I have had them all measured out on map after map, and there is an extraordinary discrepancy among the figures. My submission is that the 52 degrees have nothing to do with this matter at all, and that the St. John must be looked at through the eyes of those who looked at it with the knowledge of those days and not with the more precise knowledge of geographers of the present day. That being so, we come to a point as far as the north-east point of the old Quebec apex, which is not hit by the 52 degree and cannot be the point which was aimed at by the person who selected the 52 degree, as if it would give a neat gnsset with the boundary which has ceased to exist as a real boundary.

lying to the westward of the line, taking that line up to the 52nd, and then due west along the parallel, would be all within the boundary of Quebec.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It would be the pink area, would it not ?

Lord WARRINGTON : Substantially the pink ; only the apex would have gone beyond it.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I am anxious to make that point, because I think the impression was rather conveyed that it was, so to speak, aiming at that point.

Lord WARRINGTON : It may be ; it is so on the sketch map, certainly.

Mr. MACMILLAN : The sketch map is only a diagram for the purpose of the Newfoundland case.

Lord WARRINGTON : It would add a rectangle, more or less, of land to Canada, the western boundary of which would be the eastern boundary of Canada as laid down by the proclamation.

Mr. MACMILLAN : If the point were taken against me that on each side of the River St. John you were dealing with territories of the same depth, because my submission is this : that what came back in 1774, what one was handling throughout, was not a strip of coast, and that the map is erroneous, (indeed some of my own maps are erroneous) in showing that pink strip as the subject-matter of a transaction ; that we got a large part of that. What was not, in my designation, coast came to us by the re-transfer. We had already got the greater portion under the 1774 Act.

Lord Sumner.

Lord WARRINGTON : For the present case there are Canadian maps of authority that do rather show that black of land as being part of Quebec.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Quite a number.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord SUMNER : You pointed out a line from the 52nd parallel to this intersection at the height of land somewhere to the south-east. That is what, so far, has been Newfoundland's Case ; but is it consistent with the terms upon which the reference has been agreed that Newfoundland should say : “ Well, the argument of Canada has convinced us that the 52nd is more than we are able to, establish, but we would put forward as an alternative, at our own expense, of course, the height of land which is dotted along there.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I have hatched the portions on my own map; they resemble two humps.

Lord Sumner.

Lord SUMNER : Is it, in your view, competent for Newfoundland to shift its ground and say : “ Well, the theory of the height of land is a theory equally applicable to the South as to the west up to what we call Labrador, and therefore we fall back upon that.”

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : If I may say so, I think it would be quite competent for Newfoundland to ask at your hands less than they do claim. There might be difficulty if they were asking for more than they claim ; but if the Board were not satisfied with the reasoning of Newfoundland, as to its boundary on the west, I do not think I could take up reasonably the attitude that your Lordships could not locate the boundary in a direction or in a line that gives them less than they claim ; that would be an unreasonable position.

Lord SUMNER : The whole case might be put upon the view that as the boundary must go to somewhere, and, all other ways have failed, let us have the height of land all round.

Mr. MACMILL : Your Lordship will appreciate the practical importance of what I am putting just now, because this line up here does not go up to the height of land. My learned friend left it with a curiously rugged boundary at this point, and I am testing their principle of the height of land all over by the history of the matter as exhibited in the maps and documents.

Lord SUMNER : There has always been an Achilles heel.

Mr. MACMILLAN : And the Achilles was killed. I rather thought at this point that I almost had my learned friend's assent on page 83 of the proceedings. When your Lordship pointed this out on Mitchell's Map, and that the argument could not be made out, I rather thought Sir John agreed. However, that is neither here nor there. The topic was very fully discussed at that point and rather rapidly left. May I just add one other point on the southern boundary of some importance. If my Lords would pray take in hand Volume III for a moment and turn to page 910 (this is the report of the Lords of Trade of the 8th June, 1763) there are words there that perhaps have not received at my hands so full an exposition as they deserve. They are at about line 14 : “ It is needless to state with any degree of precision the Bounds and Limits of this extensive Country, for We should humbly propose to Your Majesty that the new Government of Canada should be restricted so as to leave on the one hand all the Lands lying about the great Lakes and beyond the Sources of the Rivers which fall into the River St. Lawrence from the North, to be thrown into the Indian Country.” Pausing there the sources of the rivers which fall into the River St. Lawrence, from the north ?” First of all, for this purpose one must see what they were talking of as the River St. Lawrence. Fortunately that is made clear beyond any doubt. The point of division between the River St. Lawrence and the Gulf of St. Lawrence is just on the West end of Anticosti. That is made quite clear by two references which I shall give, showing that the River St. John is treated as a river flowing into the River St. Lawrence. Perhaps the best reference for that is Volume I, page 153.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I do not know if I could help my learned friend by any sort of admission, because I think we are rather disposed to agree on this. I have looked at this carefully too. I think a fair view, as far as one would form one at the time was, without drawing a precise boundary they were rather disposed to call whatever was to the west—

Mr. MACMILLAN : This is how I show it on my map.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I have drawn a similar line. I think if you join Gaspé to the River St. John, I make a fair concession to my learned friend if I say there is a good deal to indicate that they call what was to the west of that the river, and what was to the east of that the gulf.

Mr. MACMILLAN : If you please, my learned friend is very kind.

Sir JOHN SIMON : It is not quite consistent, but that is the substance.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I think you may remember the River St. John is described as a river which flows into the River St. Lawrence rather than the Gulf. There is always a question, there is a question looming here, when does a river cease to be a river and become the sea ? If that be so, would your Lordships just pursue it a little further ? All that lies to the north of the rivers flowing into the St. Lawrence is to be reserved to the Indians. The result of that, my Lords, is this. This is, of course, a more modern map, and therefore more accurate, no doubt, but the point arises on any of the maps : If you take the River St. John as the terminus of the River St. Lawrence, then all the rivers which flow into the River St. Lawrence westward of that point are rivers which you have to consider for the purpose of this description “ beyond the sources of the rivers which fall into the River St. Lawrence from the north.” The River St. John flows into the Lawrence from the north, and so do all these other rivers. The Moisie is one of the best known, which you see beyond that ; all the territory north of that is to be thrown into the Indian country. Let me do it mathematically and draw up a line thus ; you will cut right into the green, and all the land to the north is to be reserved for the Indian territory. You cut right into the green territory ; and therefore the contemplation at the time cannot have been that the Newfoundland territory was to include what the Lords of Trade expressly contemplated should be thrown into the Indian territory. quite a large part—that elbow of green—is by these words, in my submission, excluded.

p. 587

The LORD CHANCELLOR : The word is “ beyond,” not “ to the north of.”

Mr. MACMILLAN : “ Beyond the sources of the rivers.” Am I stressing it too much when I say that “ beyond the watershed ” means the land to the north of it there, because the watershed is east and west generally. There again some difficulties emerge, I respectfully suggest, for my learned friend's case. He does not take the watershed line. He says that the 52 degrees is not truly related to the watershed line, but is a line which he gets by simply drawing straight along the latitude of this point of contact with the perpendicular to the 52nd latitude. All these things show, I respectfully submit, that on this part, at any rate, of their boundary, they cannot present to your Lordships' Board any precise boundary at all. The various reasons and suggestions that they have made fail, when they are probed, and they do not and cannot derive from any of the documents before the Board the boundary which they seek to establish.

Lord WARRINGTON : What you are now suggesting is excluded from Newfoundland is that square inset ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : The elbow, yes; this bit. Again I am using all this, and I pray my Lord to have it in mind, as critical material directed to showing that the boundary here suggested was not the boundary in the minds of those who transacted this subject in 1763. That has been throughout my address to your Lordships—I am afraid at wearisome length—the point which I have been seeking to establish. If I can break down my learned friend's suggested boundary at point after point, which I humbly submit I have been able to do, then I get him dislodged from what is generally a height-of-land contention and placed in the position of a person with rights on the shore, indefinite but possible of definition. My learned friend, if I may say so, did not deal with the yellow strip in a manner which, if he will pardon me saying so, was so clear as the rest of his case ; and I personally do not quite understand yet what is the position with regard to the yellow territory except that it was the territory, I think, that was supposed to satisfy the language of something to the north that was to be Indian territory.

Viscount FINLAY : Which is the yellow territory ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : To the north of this slate coloured strip.
4 I

p. 588

Viscount HALDANE : You say that is all the same as Indian territory ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord ; that is part of the Indian territory. I do not quite know where we are with regard to that, or whether it is conceded that that bit is Indian territory, but that it stops at the height of land on this southern height of land. At any rate, with great respect to my learned friend, I have not been able to derive so clear an impression from his address with regard to this part as I have on his other part. It is between the height of land and Old Quebec. Where, and what is it ? It was upon this that it was suggested that the Act of 1774 could operate, and this only. It is not north of the rivers flowing into the River St. Lawrence.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Not north of all of them.

Mr. MACMILLAN: Is it north really of any, with great respect ? The blue line cuts right through river after river all the way along.

Lord WARRINGTON : Then the yellow comes up to what are here marked as the sources of the rivers falling into the River St. Lawrence.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It leaves all this territory here up to this height of land. What exactly is the theory of that, I am afraid I have not quite appreciated, but it abuts upon the limits of Newfoundland's claim, as you notice, in the corner there. The yellow forms part of the boundary, whatever be the legal denomination of that boundary. I gathered that the suggestion was that that was what was thrown into the Quebec area in 1774. I pass from that with the suggestion that on this part of the boundary the case has not been made out. My Lord, there is an aspect of the case which has not been much discussed, and which I do not propose to spend much time upon, but it is interesting to look at the variations in the commissions and instructions issued to the Governors of Quebec and Newfoundland. You find that the commissions and instructions reflect the variations in their legal position on this coast. There are the periods 1763 to 1774, 1774 to 1809, and 1809 to 1825, and certain variations appear in the commissions and instructions from time to time reflecting the change in the position. It would be sufficient for my purpose, I think, to make one particular reference to Governor Carleton's instructions in Volume II, because of the detail with which this matter is dealt with at page 820. This was after the Act of 1774 ; and after the Act of 1774, my Lords will recall that all that Newfoundland had had was re-annexed to Quebec. At Volume II, page 820, you find the instructions to Guy Carleton as Captain General and Governor in Chief of the Province of Quebec. In smaller print at the foot of the page, you will see an extract from certain official papers. Apparently, the general instructions had been drawn up in draft, and at line 21, this appears : “ ‘ This draught ’ they say”—that is the Lords of Trade—“ ‘ contains not only such instructions as are usually given to other governors, so far as the same are applicable to this Province under its New Constitution of Government, but also such other directions for the establishment of Judicature ; the reform and regulation of Ecclesiastical matter ; and the arrangements proper to be made in respect of the Coast of Labrador, and the interior Country, as appear to us to be necessary in consequence of the Act passed in the last Session of the late Parliament.’” My submission, of course, has been upon that Act that we got the interior country under the descriptive words, and that we got the coast of Labrador under the “ as also ” clause. If you turn to the instructions on page 832, line 34, Article 30, you will see how it is dealt with when this change was brought about. “ The Extension of the Limits of the Province of Quebec necessarily calls forth your Attention to a Variety of new Matter and new Objects of Consideration ; The protection and control of the various Settlements of Canadian Subjects, and the regulation of the Peltry Trade in the upper or interior Country on the one hand, and the protection of the Fisheries in the Gulph of St. Lawrence, and on the Labrador coast on the other hand, point to Regulations, that require deliberation and dispatch.” My Lords will note the contrast between the two things. The interior country with its fur trade carried on by Canadians, and the fisheries on the Labrador coast. Then : “ The institution of inferior Judicatures, with limited Jurisdiction in Criminal and Civil Matters for the Illinois, Poste St. Vincenne, the Detroit, Missilimakinac, and Gaspée has been already pointed out, and the Appointment of a Superiintendent at each of these Posts is all, that is further necessary for their Civil concerns ; But it will be highly proper, that the Limits of each of those Posts, and of every other in the interior Country should be fixed and ascertained ; and that no Settlement be allowed beyond those Limits; seeing that such Settlements must have the consequence to disgust the Savages ; to excite their Enmity ; and at length totally to destroy the Peltry Trade, which ought to be cherished and encouraged by every means in your Power.” This was a Governor who had, up to that time, had merely the slate-coloured territory. His territory had had this large extension given to it in 1774, and he is directed to two matters, an interior question and a coastal question. “ It is our Royal Intention, that the Peltry Trade of the interior Country should be free and open to all Our Subjects. Inhabitants of any of Our Colonies, who shall, pursuant to what was directed by Our Royal Proclamation of 1763, obtain Licences from the Governors of any of our said Colonies for that purpose.” My Lords will recall the proclamation of 1763 which contemplated the issuing of licences to trade with Indians by the Governor of Quebec. “ Those Regulations, therefore, when established, must be made public throughout all Our American possessions, and they must have for their object the giving every possible facility to that Trade, which the nature of it will admit, and as may consist with fair and just dealing towards the Savages, with whom it is carried on. The fixing stated times and places for carrying on the Trade, and adjusting modes of settling Tariffs of the prices of Goods and Furs, and above all the restraining the Sale of Spirituous Liquors to the Indians will be the most probable and effectual means of answering the ends proposed. These and a variety of other regulations, incident to the nature and purpose of the Peltry Trade in the interior Country, are fully stated in a Plan proposed by Our Commissioners for Trade and Plantations in 1764, a copy of which is hereunto annexed, and which will serve as a Guide in a variety of cases, in which it may be necessary to make provision by Law for that important Branch of the American Commerce.” My Lords, here you see this large addition which has been made and which, in my humble submission, included that whole strip of Indian territory which had been reserved. All sorts of things are brought to the attention of the Governor. He has now to govern the extended area, and it is necessary for him to attend to those matters which arise in the administration of a primitive people, which the Indians were.

The most striking contrast was that the Governor of Newfoundland, when the coast is re-transferred to him, never gets any instructions of this sort at all. Then comes the next matter, Article 33 : “ The Fisheries on the Coast of Labrador, and the Islands adjacent thereto are objects of the greatest Importance, not only on account of the Commodities they produce, but also as Nurseries of Seamen, upon whom the Strength and Security of Our Kingdom depend. Justice and Equity demand, that the real and actual property and possession of the Canadian Subjects on that Coast should be preserved intirely ; and that they should not be molested or hindered in the exercise of any Sedentary Fisheries they may have established there.” It was those sedentary fisheries along the north coast of the St. Lawrence and the River St. Lawrence which had caused all the trouble, because Palliser proposed to apply to them his regulations under the Act of 1769. “ Their Claims however extended to but a small District of the Coast, on the greatest part of which District a Cod Fishery is stated to be impracticable. On all such parts of the Coast, where there are no Canadian Possessions, and more especially where a valuable Cod Fishery may be carried on, it will be your Duty to make the Interest of Our British Subjects going out to fish there in Ships fitted out from Great Britain the first object of your care, and, as far as circumstances will admit, to establish on that Coast the Regulations in favour of British fishing Ships, which have been so wisely adopted by the Act of Parliament passed in the Reign of King William the Third ‘ for the encouragement of the Newfoundland Fishery ’ ; and you are on no account to allow any possession to be taken, or sedentary fisheries to be established upon any parts of the Coast, that are not already private Property, by any persons whatever, except only such as shall produce annually a Certificate of their having fitted out from some Port in Great Britain. We have mentioned to you the Fisheries upon the Coast of Labrador, as the main object of your attention ; but

- Lord Warrington. the Commerce carried on with Savages on that Coast, and the state and condition of those Savages deserve some regard”—these are not the people with whom the peltry trade is to be carried on and who have been dealt with before, the interior people—“ the Society of Unitas Fratrum, urged by a laudable Zeal for promoting Christianity, has already, under Our Protection, and with Our Permission, formed Establishments in the Northern parts of that Coast for the purposes of civilizing the Natives and converting them to the Christian religion. Their success has been answerable to their Zeal ; and it is Our express Will and Pleasure, that you do give them every countenance and Encouragement in your power, and that you do not allow any Establishment to be made, but with their consent, within the limits of their possessions.” All that matter was proper and suitable to be addressed to the Governor of Quebec when he ceased to be the Governor merely of the late area, the lozenge, and became the Governor of a great interior country, particularly a country where peltry trade was carried on with the Indians, and when, at the same time, there was handed to him all the coast of Labrador, with the fisheries thereon.
- Mr. Macmillan.
- Lord Warrington.
- Mr. Macmillan.
- Lord Warrington. Lord WARRINGTON : The Act of Parliament handed to him, not the coasts, but such territories, islands, and countries as have since 1763 been made part of the Government of Newfoundland.
- Lord Sumner. Mr. MACMILLAN : It first handed him something else ; it gave him the southern boundary and then it went on : “ As also.” If my Lord's point is on the words I have used, may I make a general admission at once. When I use the word “ coast ” I am maintaining the consistency of my argument. I am perfectly aware that constantly the words “ lands territories islands,” and so on, are used.
- 4 Nov., 1926. Lord WARRINGTON : They are used here exclusively ; the word “ coast ” is not used at all. The words are “ territories islands and countries which have since 1763 been made part of the Government of Newfoundland.”
- Lord Sumner. Mr. MACMILLAN : Quite, my Lord. The whole question is what was made part. My point is that the territories, countries and islands which were made part were the coastal.

Lord WARRINGTON : I am only referring to the phraseology. It is quite true when they come to the instructions they talk about fisheries on the coast, because they were on the coast.

Lord SUMNER : At any rate, this makes your argument on the Quebec Act quite crucial. For success in establishing that argument, it is necessary to make the point you are now making on the instructions, and the point appears to be whether you can make good your claim to the interior country dealt with in the instructions under the words

“ and northward to the southern boundary of the territory granted to the merchants of England trading with Hudson's Bay ” and no more.

Mr. MACMILLAN : May I suggest there a very small point which arises on Agnew's grant. Your Lordship may remember I was rather, if I may say so, unhorsed by a suggestion my Lord made, that the 60 mile point I might have misinterpreted. There is one place where there can be no misinterpretation of what was then assumed to be the southern boundary of the Hudson's Bay territory there, because if you will look, the contrast between what was asked and what was actually given is rather interesting. Agnew asked for 60 miles of the sea coast of Labrador from Hudson's Straits right round to the River St. John. There was a report upon that, my Lord, which said that to give him that 60 miles might trench upon Hudson's Bay territory ; it might, because nobody quite knew what it was. It was suggested to me that might be so, consistently with another view than the view which I was taking, namely, that the 60 miles inland, at a place where admittedly the territory was so narrow that you are running up to a point there, might go over the height of land at that point and into Hudson's Bay, assuming that to be the boundary. When the Lords of Trade gave the grant, as they ultimately did, they made it in these terms. It is Volume III, page 1156. the 2nd December, 1774.

The Lord Chancellor.

“ Whereas there was this day read at the Board, a report from a Committee of the Lords of His Majesty's most Honourable Privy Council for Plantation affairs dated this day, upon considering the draft of a grant prepared by his Majesty's attorney and solicitor general of all mines, minerals, metals and ores whatsoever within the island of Newfoundland or upon such part of the sea coasts of Labrador, as lie within sixty miles of low water mark of the open sea, between the river St. John and the Southern limits of the territory granted to the Hudson Bay Company.” Now there “ the Southern limits of the territory granted to the Hudson Bay Company,” has been selected in lieu of “ Hudson's Straits,” which had been suggested by the Applicant, and that I think chimes in with my suggestion that what they were considering at that time was such a boundary as is shown on the King's Map, that is to say a boundary going to Cape Grimington, and thus indicates a contemporary view, I submit, that the boundary was there and that that was the Southern boundary of the Hudson Bay territory in the acceptance of the time, as indeed is said in the Newfoundland Case.

Mr. Macmillan.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Will you just make clear to me your point upon this document, the instructions ? These were given after the transfer to Quebec.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Immediately after the transfer.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Therefore, it was natural that they should have instructions both as to the fisheries and as to the interior.

p. 593

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is so, my Lord.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Is your point this : that as regards the interior, no similar authority had been given to Quebec as had been given to Newfoundland ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is one of my points, my Lord ; the other is this : that I am concerned to show, as I think one of your Lordships was good enough to point out was part of my argument, that Quebec derived its title at this time to the eastern portion of Labrador, from two sources. It derived its title to the interior part under the general description of Quebec ; it derived its right to the coastal area under the words “ as also all that Newfoundland had.”

The LORD CHANCELLOR : You mean under the general description of British North America they got the interior ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : The boundary was the southern boundary of the Hudson Bay Territory ; they went right up to that. It seems to me attractive to visualise it. They are going round these boundaries ; then they come to the Hudson Bay boundary ; then they say : Now we have reached a boundary, the exact location may not have been very definite, but it was at any rate a boundary that followed that boundary right along, and then all that would go into Quebec ; it is what is described as the southern boundary of the Hudson Bay territory ; and this is the language of the Privy Council.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I am accepting that for the moment, and under that they got everything.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Except what Newfoundland had.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : It was plus what Newfoundland had, was it not ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : May I just complete it, my Lord ? Then they got all that, but as you carried your eye along the southern boundary you encountered a strip of Newfoundland down to the coast ; you came to something which was in the hands of Newfoundland ; whereupon the draughtsman says : “ as also all that Newfoundland got shall be added under you.” Therefore they derived this title which we get in 1774, in two ways ; it did not come en bloc. The Newfoundland part of it came under the “ as also,” but the interior of it, the great part of it where the Indians were, all came to us under the extension “ to the Southern boundary of Hudson Bay.”

The LORD CHANCELLOR : That is quite true, but with regard to whatever Newfoundland had previously had, I thought your point was to contrast these instructions with those given to the Governor of Newfoundland.

Mr. MACMILLAN : My Lord is good enough to appreciate what I have said ; but my learned friend is very much concerned to show throughout these matters that the whole of the green territory was one thing throughout ; it was it that was being handed back and forward. My submission is, No, what was being handed back and forward was the coast, and the interior country was under these other titles and came to us in this other way. I am only concerned to make that clear. It is rather interesting to note the instructions to the Governor of Newfoundland, after 1809 (Duckworth was his name) after Newfoundland had got back the Coast of Labrador, which upon my friend's view included all this added area where the Governor of Quebec had been told to look after the interests, both spiritual and spirituous, of the inhabitants. The instructions to Sir .John Duckworth are at page 641. If one looks at his instructions, you will see that the only Indians he is to concern himself with are the Indians of Newfoundland.

This, the 5th June, 1810. This is after Newfoundland has got back what I venture to call the coast of Labrador, bearing in mind that I use the word “ Coast ” as the equivalent of what is sometimes called the territories, land and countries. I turn to page 662, and here is a contrast. Here the Governor of Newfoundland has got back a bit ; but is he instructed to do all these things about granting licences for trade and looking after these people ? Not at all. He has got the whole of this green area right up to the watershed and right down to the head waters of the St. Lawrence, according to the plans before my Lords, and this is what he is told to do : “ You are to use your best endeavours to encourage a friendly intercourse with the Indians residing in our Island of Newfoundland or resorting thither, using your best endeavours to conciliate their affections so as to induce them to trade with our Subjects,” and so on. Then he tells you on the other side what he has done. This is a case in which, as in many of the cases, the Governor has used his instructions as his text and then he tells you in parallel what he has done. He says : “ I have issued a Proclamation as directed by this Article respecting the Native Indians ; (Appendix B) and have given every attention to this interesting subject which it assuredly deserves.” Then he proceeds to discuss it ; he deals entirely with the Newfoundland Indians and points out what is, of course, true, that they are very small in numbers. If your Lordships will look at page 663, the left hand column, he says at line 35 : “ The number of the Native Indians remaining does not appear to be known, nor can I find the means of forming any judgment of what it may be : but the prevailing idea is that they are about five hundred. A few families of the Micmac Indians from the Coast of Canada have been long settled in the neighbourhood of St. George's and Fortune Bay ;”—that is in Newfoundland—“ but they do not amount to more than seventy or eighty persons and the only Trade which they carry on is in the Sale of a few furs occasionally to the Merchants.

p. 595

Other Indians from Nova Scotia and Canada come over occasionally to the northern parts of this Island to hunt ; and perhaps it would be quite as well if they were prohibited from doing so, as little advantage is gained from an intercourse with them, and they destroy great numbers of animals for the sake of their furs, even when with young. A few of the Esquimaux also came over from Labrador, but our settlements are so remote that they do not frequently visit them. With these latter Indians I am informed that the Society of Unitas Fratrum carry on a considerable trade on the Continent, and I am sorry to add, impose upon them in a very shameful degree if the reports which have been made to me are founded in truth.”

The LORD CHANCELLOR : That is very disappointing.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is, my Lord, and I do not think it is true so far as I have read the papers. My Lords, is not that very striking ? I have brought to my Lordships' notice what was done under the provisions that were made in 1774, when Quebec got the green area, I say under two titles.

Sir JOHN SIMON : And also got the whole Indian country.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Of course, Sir John, I am not forgetting that, and I do not think their Lordships are either. They got the whole Indian country.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Ohio.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Ohio ; the Six Nations and all the rest of it. Elaborate instructions were given to this Governor to look after these people in every conceivable way and to grant licences for trading with them, and so on. Then when part of the same area is handed back to Newfoundland the Governor of Newfoundland is enjoined in 1810, the first Commission, at the time when this matter must have been fresh in the minds of those dealing with it. There are no such instructions as are given to Guy Carleton, but he is told to look after the Indians of Newfoundland. That is a most striking contrast, and in my submission reflects very useful light upon the whole situation and the distinction between the interior and the coast.

On the question of the Indians in this area, my Lords have once or twice, I think, raised the question of how many of them there were. There are some interesting figures given in Volume III, at page 3729.

Viscount HALDANE : That is Indians where ?

p. 596

Mr. MACMILLAN : Indians in Labrador. This Census which I am looking at was a Census of 1871, and may I draw attention to a paragraph or two there ? Your Lordships will see it on page 3729 at line 17 : “ Census of 1871. In the report of this census, the returns for the south-eastern part of the Peninsula east of the Bersimis River included under the Province of Quebec, in census district No. 152, ‘ Labrador.’

The detailed returns are given for various sub-districts lettered from A to H, identified with the names of places along the north shore of the St. Lawrence and comprising in all a superficial area of 38,856,353 acres. These returns include for : Sauvages des Sept Isles, 190 ; Sauvages Betsiamites, 552; Sauvages de Mingan, 530 : total 1032[sic].

These figures indicate that the census contained an enumeration of a very considerable portion of the Indians inhabiting the interior country of the south-eastern half of the Peninsula. The census, however, contained a special return of the aboriginal population of Canada, which shows that the whole of the Indians within the Labrador peninsula were enumerated as subjects of Canada. This return was set forth in the form of a table with an accompanying illustrative map indicating the territory occupied by each aboriginal group. Extracts from this table with the map are given below.” Then your Lordships see “ The Esquimaux, In. ” “ In ” means “ Innuite ” ; that is the Eskimo name for themselves. “ Description of places inhabited : Littoral of the North Sea from Labrador to Alaska, the northern shores and islands of Hudson's Bay, with the islands of the Arctic Ocean.” Then “ Population 4,000,” and “ Territorial Superficies in English square miles, 600,000.” Then “ The Naskapis Al.” “ Al ” means the Algonquin race. “ Interior of Labrador, South-east Watersheds of Labrador, Rupert's Land to the east of Hudson's Bay, and the Mistassin Country.” The population is 2,500 with an area of 330,000 square miles. Then “ The Montagnais, Al.” The description is : “ North shore of the Gulf and mouth of the St. Lawrence, valley of the Saguenay River.” The population is 1,745 and the area is 115,000 square miles.

Mr. Macmillan.

The map which was prepared as the key map to this is printed, Of course, it is only a diagrammatic map, but it is to show generally the districts. There you will see the Peninsula, the whole of Labrador with the various aboriginal tribes inhabiting it. The Montagnais are the southern portion, the Naskapis are in the middle, and the Esquimaux are in the north. These are the people with respect to whom, as I submit, among others, the important duties were confided to Guy Carleton in his instructions after that territory was added unto him in 1774.

My Lords, there is a curious matter. I am really not quite sure what its import is, but it is worth mentioning. Your Lordships will find that least two of the Newfoundland Commissions do not give the Newfoundland Governor the Coast as far as the River St. John at all. The origin of that I think I have ascertained, but I am not sure. Will your Lordships be good enough to look at Volume II, page 685 ; it is one of the curious puzzles in this case ? Will your Lordships look at the description of the jurisdiction of the Governor of Newfoundland ?

p. 597

This is in 1816, after 1809, when the whole of the coast has been given back to Newfoundland. You will see his territory at line 29, on page 68. “ To be our Governor and Commander in Chief in and over our said Island of Newfoundland and the Islands adjacent and all the Coast of Labrador from Mount Joli to the Entrance of Hudsons Streights the Island of Anticosti and all other Adjacent Islands.”

In 1816 the Commission is cut down and if you look at Mount Joli, which is shown upon the small map, you will see that from Mount Joli to Mingan Island is not included in his Commission at all. The suggestion that I make is that that was a sequel to an alteration in the Admiralty instructions. The Admiralty had altered the station, and the Commission to the Governor of Newfoundland in these matters is regarded as being so entirely a matter related to the Admiralty that they actually took the liberty of confining the Governor, after the Admiralty has changed the limits of its station, to the same limits. You will find that in the instructions from the Admiralty to Sir Richard Goodwin Keats, on page 683. He was the Governor of Newfoundland in 1813, and these are the Admiralty instructions to him as Commander-in-Chief of His Majesty's Ships on the Newfoundland Station. At page 683, line 19, you will find his station defined : “ You are to consider the limits of your Station to be as follows, viz. : At and about the Island of Newfoundland, but having for its Western boundary a straight line drawn from the Latitude of 40 degrees North and Longitude 50 West to a position midway between Cape Ray on the Newfoundland Coast & the Island of St. Paul off the Northern point of Cape Breton Island ; & from thence in a direct line to Mount Joli, of the Labrador Coast ; and you are to restrict your Cruizers to these limits accordingly.”

The LORD CHANCELLOR : There seems to be a strip of coast without a Governor at all.

Mr. MACMILLAN : This same thing happens again with regard to Sir Charles Hamilton, in Volume II, at page 716. What I suggest to your Lordships is this, that in the eyes of those who were concerned in the administration of this Coast, its administration was regarded as so entirely a matter related to Admiralty concerns that when the Admiralty alter the cruiser station the Commission to the Governor of Newfoundland contracts in the same way, and he is made Governor only over the area to which his Admiralty instructions relating his stations for his cruisers extend.

Viscount FINLAY : From the St. John River to Mount Joli, roughly speaking, is opposite the Island of Anticosti.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Very nearly ; it is about 100 miles long, I think About 100 miles of coast, as my Lord points out, were withdrawn from the Governor of Newfoundland, and it may be that it is left derelict.

p. 598

My point is this, that the whole point in the view of those concerned in dealing with these matters was the Admiralty aspect of it, and that the Commission merely follows what the Admiralty has done, and consequently you find that as the Admiralty limit the scope of their cruisers, so also the Governor's scope is limited. Whether that is done legitimately or not, I cannot say, but it reflects the attitude of mind of those who deal with these matters. Those two Governors had no jurisdiction over that bit of coast during that period.

The LORD CHANCELLOR: It must have been an oversight, but as you say, it throws a light upon the attitude in which they looked at it.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I think that is the most valuable inference I can draw. There are other points arising on the various Commission's instructions, but I do not propose to go into them further. I have naturally taken the best one for myself, unlike my learned friend, who always takes the worst one for himself. I have taken the best one for myself ; there are others which help me, too, but which are not so helpful to my argument, and I therefore do not labour them further, but my Lord has my point.

Now, my Lords, I propose to leave these large matters, and I propose to say a little about certain of what my learned friend called the very subordinate matters. It is, of course, vital, and on that we are agreed here on both sides of the bar, to consider what was done in 1763. What has been done since then more or less close to the time, is helpful as a contemporary exposition, but what has been done a hundred years after becomes of necessarily very much less value. There are a great many matters which have been collected and are printed in these volumes, some of which I venture to think help me and some help my learned friend's argument, but which I think we are both agreed, if I have gauged the position of my learned friend accurately, are of relatively less importance—the varying views that have been taken by different people at different times, and the things they have done when this boundary was not an ascertained thing and when nobody quite knew where it was. There are certain more or less outstanding incidents, however, which, as my learned friend said, are interesting to look at, and they are worth perhaps a little discussion, and I should not like it to be thought that I had not an answer upon those points. It might be said, if I did not say something about them, that I might have left them to go by default. I propose, therefore, to look at one or two of the more prominent of those matters to which my learned friend alluded, because he derived assistance from them though they have perhaps another aspect, as so many questions in this case have. May I take first the instance with regard to Judge Pinsent. The relevant papers are in the second volume. They show the extraordinary dubiety of mind at this time among those who had to consider the position as to where exactly this boundary was. Of course, it is true that when we are dealing with 1888, we are more than a century away from 1763, but to suggest that by this time the boundary had become an ascertained and known thing as being the height of land, is, I think it is abundantly clear, incorrect.

The matter starts with a letter from Lord Knutsford to the Governor-General, on the 18th July, 1888. I take this letter first, but it really refers to some other letters following. This is at page 339, the first document in the second volume. It is addressed to the Governor-General of Canada by Lord Knutsford : “ My Lord, I have the honour to transmit to your Lordship herewith a copy of a despatch from the Governor of Newfoundland respecting the uncertainty of the boundary between Canada and the territory belonging to Newfoundland on the Labrador coast. This boundary was fixed by the Imperial Act, 6 Geo. 4, cap. 59, sec. 9 ”—that is the 1825 Act—“ but the boundary inland from the coast line is not clearly defined. This would appear to be a question which might very properly be discussed between the governments of the Dominion and Newfoundland when the delegates from the latter colony visit Canada in connection with the question of union.

Then follow two enclosures. The Governor of Newfoundland had written to Lord Knutsford : “ My Lord,—I have the honour to forward a letter from Mr. Justice Pinsent on the subject of the boundary between this colony and the dominion of Canada. The matter does not appear to be of pressing importance, but having regard to the population now settled along that coast, it might be well that the extent of jurisdiction should be more clearly defined ” ; and here is Judge Pinsent's difficulty. He had written to the Governor on the 22nd May, 1888 : “ I have the honour to bring under your Excellency's notice a matter of no little importance touching the territorial limits of Labrador as a dependency of this colony.” Then he says he has submitted the point to his predecessor, but it was not gone into. Then : “ The matter is one not without importance in its general bearing upon the rights of government, but it comes to be of practical and essential significance when questions of either civil or criminal jurisdiction arise, and they may at any time arise, particularly on the northern circuit of the supreme court where I so frequently preside. The case in which the difficulty first became prominent was upon the trial in St. John's of an Eskimo Indian for the murder of his wife on the coast of Labrador. The question of the jurisdiction of the supreme court was then raised on behalf of the accused, and not without much force, but the locality of the offence was so very near the coast that the court overruled the objection.” It seems a very sensible view. Then : “ The extent of the jurisdiction of the government of Newfoundland in Labrador is thus defined by letters patent of the 28th March, 1876.” Then he sets it out, and then says : “ For the purpose of illustrating the matter clearly, I enclose portion of a map of the dominion of Canada, published by Canadian official authority, in which all that part of the peninsula of Labrador coloured white is, as it were, allowed to belong to this government, but if that area is compared with the description taken from the royal letters patents constituting the office of governor and commander-in-chief of the island of Newfoundland and its dependencies, it will be seen that the territorial extent of (Newfoundland) Labrador represents a vast deal more than would be ordinarily intended by the term ' coast ' : and, moreover, extends inland and west of the line drawn due north and south from Anse Sablon eight to nine degrees." So Judge Pinsent, having before him the description of the Governor's jurisdiction and a map which showed in white the whole of the area to the east of the height of land—there was a large white triangle there—said if that is Canada's idea of Labrador, as it may be—" coloured white is, as it were, allowed to belong to this Government "—well, it is very generous, because it represents a vast deal more than would be ordinarily intended by the word " Coast," so that Judge Pinsent when he is dealing with this matter, says : " I think I may safely try an Eskimo on this coast because if I have any jurisdiction within the coast at all, this fellow must be in it; but would it not be better to have a more precise line drawn ? " Then he says : " I have a Canadian map here which shows the whole of this triangular space white. If that means to include this as Newfoundland—Labrador it certainly is not what would be ordinarily intended by the word " Coast," which is what the Governor gets in his Commission."

The LORD CHANCELLOR : How was he concerned with the government of Labrador at that time ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : He was a Newfoundland judge, my Lord.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : How did he come to be interested ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Because it was his jurisdiction. He was troubled about this, that people were taking the plea when occasion arose : " It is not within your jurisdiction, because it is inland." He was in the difficulty of not knowing how far inland his jurisdiction extended and he had had a murder case : he says the plea was taken there, not without much force, that he had no jurisdiction. and he says : " Please tell me what jurisdiction I have inland."

The LORD CHANCELLOR : About what distance from the line of the water was the point at which this crime was said to be committed ?

Mr. Macmillan.

Sir John Simon.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I cannot say exactly ; it was very near the coast. “ But the locality of the offence was so very near the coast that the court overruled the objection,” says the Judge.

Lord WARRINGTON : Do you know which of the maps he is referring to ?

p. 601

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord, I have this map. It is Map No. 35 the Newfoundland Atlas. Your Lordships see a large white area marked “ Labrador.”

Mr. Macmillan.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I did call attention to it ; the reason that Mr. Pinsent calls it “ Official ” is because it is published by the Minister of the Interior of Canada. That helps to identify it.

Lord WARRINGTON : This is the one which has the Southern Boundary ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : May I remind your Lordships, as it is some time ago, that we found, when we looked at the original, that the original has not been quite correctly reproduced in the Newfoundland Atlas (I think it is the only slip we have observed), because the blue colouring for the sea has not been carried so as to separate the Island of Newfoundland from the edge of the land on the other side.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is a little difficult to follow for that reason. We both pencilled it in, or I pencilled it in in our copy in blue.

Sir JOHN SIMMON : I produced the original, I am afraid a long time ago, for the purpose of showing how that was.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is not on that that the point arises. Your Lordships have seen that map. He says this first of all : If that be the conception of what is Newfoundland Labrador, then it represents a vast deal more than would be ordinarily intended by the term “ Coast.” Then he goes on : “ This Canadian topography is, I think, quite correct so far as the limits of the Dominion Territory are concerned, and the remainder of the coast of Labrador would thus quite naturally belong to this Government, but they are not so described and defined in the Letters Patent or commission of the Governor of this colony, and indeed the description falls very short of covering the whole ground, and when questions of jurisdiction arise, the Court has to determine in every case whether the particular locality is upon the Coast of Labrador or not. That fact is, there are some settlements of importance far inland, e.g., notably in Hamilton Inlet over 150 miles from the sea coast. The geographical reasons for the division given in the Canadian Map are clear enough, as the North Western portion of Labrador, or that which drains into Hudson's bay and Hudson's straits, now forms the North East territory of the Dominion of Canada, and the Southern portion, draining into the gulf of St. Lawrence, is incorporated with the Province of Quebec." Our view is that a great deal more was incorporated in the Province of Quebec. " At the same time, the Canadian authorities are not certain or precise as to their boundary lines, and they are marked, as your Excellency will perceive, ' supposed boundary,' and possibly the course of the North–West River so far as it runs from the 52nd. parallel, would, regarded naturally, be the more consistent and definite dividing line. The publication by Canadian Official Authority of the Map in question or some such other may be useful as a definition of the rights of the Dominion of Canada, but it would not have the effect of conveying to Newfoundland, British Territory not included in its own, and which might, from not being by Imperial Authority, embraced in either, be a sort of ' No–man's–land,' over which neither of the Colonies could exercise government nor their courts jurisdiction. I have therefore to submit to your Excellency and to Her Majesty's Government the desirability of so defining the territorial boundaries of that part of Labrador intended to be attached to Newfoundland, as a dependency of its Government, that no doubt may be left as to the jurisdiction of its courts and the authority of its officers."

Lord WARRINGTON : The boundary in that map, shown in pink, is what is described as the height of land, I do not say it is accurate.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is so.

Sir JOHN SIMON: The original is more clear on that point, if I may offer it to Lord Warrington.

Mr. MACMILLAN : How it is lettered is thus : " Height of land," on the one side of the Hudson Bay line, and on the other side is " Supposed boundary."

Lord WARRINGTON : That is on the South.

Mr. MACMILLAN : And on the North also, both sides.

Sir JOHN SIMON : They do not know where the height of land is, and so they put " supposed."

— Mr. MACMILLAN : It is not “ supposed height of land.” it is “ supposed boundary.”

Sir JOHN SIMON : Quite right.

Mr. MACMILLAN: And you will also observe, my Lords, that it does not go up to Cape Chidley ; the white area is larger, it goes right into Ungava Bay. The whole of that drawing is, as I submit, merely an attempt at this time to indicate what was then described as “ Labrador ”

Lord WARRINGTON : That may have taken the height of land wrongly, but they do take the height of land as the supposed boundary.

p. 603

Mr. MACMILLAN : Between the East and West, on the South they do not.

Lord SUMMNER : They take the 52nd parallel.

Sir John Simon. Mr. MACMILLAN : On the South it is “ supposed boundary.”

Lord WARRINGTON : That goes to the parallel of latitude.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord.

Lord WARRINGTON : Then Judge Pinsent is really arguing the point that we have to decide.

Mr. Macmillan. Mr. MACMILLAN : He is, my Lord ; and he is arguing, curiously enough, in my favour, though lie is a Newfoundler.

Lord WARRINGTON : He says : If that is true, “ coast ” is used in a very extensive signification.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I think we could both take comfort from it, if indeed it was an authoritative pronouncement, because he says, you see, “ the Canadian topography is quite correct so far as the limits of the Dominion Territory are concerned ” ; of course, that is entirely in my favour.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I am not sure whether it is.

Viscount FINLAY : Apparently the question of whether a man is to be hanged or not may depend on it.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I am not at all sure that it is in my learned friend's favour. If the question was, as apparently this Judge thought it was, in drawing these lines, not to get the boundary between Newfoundland and Canada, but to get the Boundary between Canada and Labrador, then the point is made clear ; and that seems to be, I think, what this writer has in mind. “ This Canadian topography is, I think, quite correct so far as the limits of the Dominion territory are concerned and the remainder of the coast of Labrador, would thus quite naturally belong to this government, but they are not so described and defined in the letters patent or commission of the governor of this colony, and indeed the description falls very short of covering the whole ground ” ; and it goes on to say it cannot be that.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : There is confusion here, because at that time all that was not Newfoundland was Canada.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I know, my Lord ; and that is why one must take all these maps cum nota, because people at that time had not investigated these maps at all, and various lines were drawn, of one sort and another, all over the place.

Lord SUMNER : That map was 1878, I think ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord. That is the way in which Judge Pinsent approached this. This Newfoundland Judge says : Really, my Governor certainly has not jurisdiction over the whole of this white area by the terms of his grant.

Lord SUMNER : Perhaps the answer to Judge Pinsent's point may be found in the Order in Council of 1880 ; he was relieved after that, according to you, of any question of pursuing malefactors into the interior.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes.

Lord SUMNER : Because if Canada has not that white area under the Quebec Act it must have got it under the Order in Council of 1880.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Exactly.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : He is writing in 1888.

Mr. MACMILLAN : He is writing in 1888, but the map was an 1878 map ; he is writing after the map. You will find considerable doubt on the part of Quebec as to whether the hinterland came to them in 1774, or came to them in 1880. It was not necessary to determine under which title it was derived. I will read one or two passages later on which will show they were not clear whether it came to them under the Order in Council of 1880 or the Quebec Act of 1774. I think the 1774 Act is the title myself, but that is only my submission ; it is not necessary for my case to state it dogmatically, because under one or other title it comes. My learned friend, I think, thinks that it came under the 1774 Act ; it is a question of whether there were two bites at the cherry.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I should be very glad to be relieved of dealing with a thing which follows necessarily, I think, in logic, if my learned friend and I take the same view. I quite understand his view that in 1774 the Province of Quebec was enlarged so that it swallowed up everything, and subsequently all that has gone back from the Province of Quebec is a narrow selvedge. That is quite an intelligible view, and, of course, that may be right ; but, of course, from 1774, whatever may have been the case before, there cannot have been anything which was neither Newfoundland nor Quebec in this area, because the story is : Quebec gets the whole in 1774, and then only loses so much as she gives back to Newfoundland.

p. 605

Mr. MACMILLAN : I do not put it quite in that language. I put it that Quebec in 1774 got the whole, but got it in two sections; it is quite true it got the whole, and it gave back one of the thing it got, but things not the other.

Sir John Simon.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : At that date, according to your view, all that was not in Newfoundland in Labrador was in Canada.

Mr. Macmillan.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I think that is logical.

Mr. MACMILLAN : The point is that no one seemed quite to know that.

Sir JOHN SIMON : But the logic will remain, I am afraid.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It will remain, but if we are considering the effect of administrative acts (I am dealing now with what was done since) when one is considering what has been done since, one has to consider what they thought, however erroneously.

Sir JOHN SIMON : A point which was common ground on both sides really, now one has considered the history, is that from 1774 this disputable area must, every square yard of it, either be Canada or Newfoundland.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Will it satisfy my learned friend if I say “ I think so too,” but at the same time I do not require to assert that as my proposition in law. If there are any gaps in it, it is picked up by the 1880 Order in Council. Might I carry this just a little bit further ; that is Judge Pinsent, and then the matter goes on ; at page 344 Lord Knutsford to Lord Stanley, “ I have the honour to transmit to you for your consideration, a copy of a despatch from the Governor of Newfoundland regarding the boundary line between that colony and Canada. I shall be glad if your Lordship will be good enough to furnish me with the views of your Ministers on this question.

The boundaries of Canada and Newfoundland on the Labrador coast appear to be defined by the Act,” of 1825. My Lords, we are still in search of them. Then Sir T. O'Brien to Lord Knutsford, “ My Lords, I have the honour to forward herewith copy of a letter from Mr. Justice Pinsent, relative to the boundaries of this colony and of Canada in Labrador. The frontier laid down by the Dominion government, which line is quite acceptable to Newfoundland ”—of course it is, but it is not laid down for that purpose at all—“ is quite acceptable to Newfoundland, does not correspond, as your Lordship will observe, with that laid down in my instructions, thus leaving a large tract between the two lines which is under no one.” Now he did not understand that the 1774 Act had given us everything. There was no such large tract between the two lines which is under no one but this Governor thought there

The Lord Chancellor. was ; it was under Quebec by the 1774 Act—" hence a question of jurisdiction might at any time arise, which might lead to a miscarriage of justice, or other complications." Mr. Pinsent rather warms to the task at page 345 and goes on, " Referring to my conversation with your excellency touching the Labrador boundary line, when you informed me that no change had been made in the commission or royal instructions, I have the honour again to suggest the desirability of a more definite description of that boundary. The reasons are fully set out in my letter of May last to Governor Blake," this is the new Governor who is taking up the thread. " I would only add that no question or dispute arises in this matter between the Dominion of Canada and Newfoundland," which seems to be a rather remarkable view.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount HALDANE : It is an extraordinary proposition.

Mr. MACMILLAN : " The former has defined its line in official maps "—yes, it has defined its line, it has drawn it mistakenly, of the boundary of a thing called " Labrador " ; but it has certainly not committed itself to the view that all that is white on that map is not Canada.

Viscount HALDANE : According to the Order in Council of 1880, everything that is not Newfoundland is Canada.

The Lord Chancellor.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I do not want to stop anything that is material ; but are not we rather getting to the French system of evidence, by finding out what somebody thought ?

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : May I just refer to one other matter ; I at once take your Lordship's hint on the matter not to pursue it further, but I am in a little difficulty because my learned friend has read all these letters and put his gloss on them, I suppose with the purpose of influencing your Lordship's mind, most properly ; but I feel it a little difficult to leave them with that impress upon them without an explanation of them ; there are two ways of reading them, one could read them with emphasis on one part or another, and no one is more adroit than my learned friend in giving an attractive reading.

4 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : He was giving us the history, but I think he knows we would not be influenced by the view this gentleman took in 1888.

Mr. MACMILLAN : If your Lordship reassures me to that extent, I can deal with it very shortly. This map which was produced by Mr. Johnston is rather interesting, at the time of this controversy, at page 348 of that volume, because it just shows what an extraordinary confusion people are in. Mr. Johnston is the cartographer of Canada, and he tells us about this map at page 347 : “ On the sketch map which I have prepared to accompany this memorandum, taken from the maps of British North America, by Arrowsmith, of London, and W. & A. K. Johnston, of Edinburgh, it will be seen that the custom has been to mark the boundary of Labrador, southerly, from Cape Chudleigh (at the ocean entrance to Hudson's strait, along the height of land) to the undefined northern boundary of Lower Canada (now Quebec), thence easterly and south along the said northern boundary of Lower Canada to Anse Sablon. It does not appear that this line was intended by the geographers to represent the boundary of the territory in Labrador, under the jurisdiction of Newfoundland but most probably the dividing line between Labrador and what was supposed to be Hudson's Bay Company's territory. The name ‘ Labrador,’ or ‘ Peninsula of Labrador,’ in its full geographical application, has been generally understood to cover the whole region between the Atlantic Ocean and the east coast of Hudson's bay, as evidenced by the earliest maps of the country.” Then the first paragraph on page 348, “ On the maps of the Dominion, published from time to time by the Department, the same system of drawing the Labrador line, has been followed as on the British Maps, but we have invariably taken the precaution to show it in a dotted line, with the words, supposed or undefined applied to it. It does not appear that it was contemplated by the Imperial Government that the colony of Newfoundland should possess any such large extent of territory on the main land as is represented by the yellow tint on sketch map (herewith), the Labrador of Modern maps. My impression is, that nothing more was intended than a comparatively narrow strip along the coast (coloured pink), which would include the fishing stations, missions, Hudson's Bay Company's posts, etc., and such a strip, probably, is all that is included in imperial instructions to the governor of Newfoundland, as indicated in his despatch to the colonial secretary, 27th February, 1889. He writes : ‘ The frontier laid down by the Dominion government . . . does not correspond . . . with that laid down in my instructions, thus leaving a large tract between the two lines which is under no one ’.” Now line 23 “ It is hardly necessary to remark that Canada has not defined any line between the two colonies, either on official maps or otherwise.”

p. 607

went to Canada in 1880.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I was coming to that, my Lord, in a moment. “ It is hardly necessary to remark that Canada has not defined any line between the two colonies, either on official maps or otherwise, and, so far as I am aware, the question is now placed before the Dominion government, by the Colonial secretary for the first time.” This yellow territory, of course, is shown in Mr. Johnston's map as annexed by the Order of September 1880, and he has before him the Governor of Newfoundland's conception that there is a large tract between the two lines which is under no one, and accordingly he says there is a large tract between the two lines, and on that hypothesis that area would have been taken in under the 1880 Order because it was left over ; therefore, his position is quite logical, and he shows a strip down the coast. Then, my Lords, there is a good deal more about it, but the only letter that seems to me of final importance in this matter is one which my learned friend did not read on the Pinsent incident (it is at page 356), because it is from the Colonial Office to Mr. Pinsent ; it is, I venture to think, rather important as showing the official view in 1890 after this whole matter was before Downing Street : “ I am directed by Lord Knutsford to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 11th inst., respecting the boundary between Canada and Newfoundland, on the Labrador coast. Lord Knutsford desires me, to observe that the effect of the Acts 14 George III. Cap. 83, and 43, Geo. III., cap. 138 ‘ was to give Canadian Courts jurisdiction over the whole of the dominions of the crown in North America not forming part of any of the provinces.” The Act of 1809 only re-annexed to Newfoundland part of the coast of Labrador and the subsequent Acts and instruments all speak of the coast only as belonging to Newfoundland. What may be the exact extent inland of the coast appertaining to Newfoundland, may be a question, but the most liberal interpretation of the term ‘ coast,’ could hardly in Lord Knutsford's opinion, include all the part coloured yellow in Mr. Johnston's sketch ”—in short, the very part we are contending for.

Viscount Haldane.

Mr. Macmillan.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Lord Knutsford was a very distinguished man, but, after all, even what he thought is not evidence.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I think if one is to read the Pinsent correspondence, if it assists my learned friend, it is surely right to read what was the Colonial Office view at the time.

Viscount HALDANE : He makes a very safe observation : if the two Governments of Canada and Newfoundland were to agree on a line, the Government would be prepared to give effect to their decision.

Sir JOHN SIMON : It would save a lot of trouble, my Lord.

Mr. MACMILLAN : The matter came up again in what was called the Halifax Conference, and there the parties differed from each other, and I do not think it is worth pursuing it at all. The topic comes up on the Agenda, and nothing much seems to have happened except that Sir John MacDonald said that no map which is not in conformity with the description in the Act is any use at all, and that does not carry one any length at all : and there were disclaimers of certain maps which were produced. I think that is a fair enough representation of that. There is another matter which my learned friend dwelt on which is what I call the Duffryn incident in 1874. I am a little at a loss from your Lordship's indication to me on this matter, how far I am entitled to go into it ; that was founded on by my learned friend as being the recognition by Canada itself—an identification and recognition by Canada itself, that something corresponding to that large area was Newfoundland. It arose in this way (I will deal with it very shortly) that a cargo of fish had come down to the United States (it was consigned from Labrador) and the question arose. Is it entitled to free admission ? All fish from Canada and Newfoundland was entitled to free admission, and the question was, therefore, was this fish entitled to free admission ? The real question was whether Labrador was in one or the other ; it was not necessary for the purpose of that controversy to determine in which it was.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I quite agree with you.

Mr. MACMILLAN : But the importance of the incident from my learned friend's point of view is that the matter was then considered domestically by Canada, and they came to a conclusion in terms of a map which my Lords have seen, and which is favourable to my learned friend's contention.

The LORID CHANCELLOR : Which map is that ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is Map No. 32A in the Newfoundland Atlas. It is not, of course, the area now claimed, but a different area ; but still it is drawn in a more or less large sense ; and what had been said by Lord Duffern, who had apparently dropped in at the Embassy at Washington, was that Labrador belongs to Newfoundland, the question being whether fish from Labrador was entitled to get in free or not. He said Labrador belongs to Newfoundland, till the question was taken up more closely. This map received the approval of the Canadian authorities at that time. First of all, of course, neither the Governor General of Canada nor his Privy Council nor anyone else could fix the boundary one way or another ; they could express their views of it, but they could do no more than that.

Sir John Simon.

Lord WARRINGTON : This map is wrong anyhow, because it gives the shore of Ungava Bay to Newfoundland.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I know, my Lord.

Lord WARRINGTON : That is wrong, anyhow.

Mr. MACMILLAN : The map is wrong, anyhow. It is rather a good point for my learned friend because he is able to say : Now what did you think of it yourself at this time ? I have shown you, my Lords, that much later on, at the time of the Halifax Conference, the whole thing was still in issue ; this was not taken as a concluded matter, domestically, by us at all. My learned friend desires nie to draw attention to the fact of that large “ A,” which he regards as of importance, it is on the pink area, as being the termination of “ Canada.”

p. 610

Sir JOHN SIMON : I only mean that we have reproduced a little bit, and the big “ A,” in Quebec, is the last letter of “ Canada,” which runs across the map.

Mr. MACMILLAN : The matter concluded with a letter from he Colonial Office at home, saying : Lord Duffryn has gone too far in saying that Labrador belongs to Newfoundland, in point of fact, part of Labrador belongs to Newfoundland, but the question is of no importance, because either it is Newfoundland or Canada, if it comes from one or the other, this fish is entitled to free entry ; and there the matter drops. Such point as my learned friend gets from it, he does, but it is not his present claim, and I submit it is quite erroneous, and was not carried forward, and. as you see, in Pinsent's time, people do not found on that map or on anything that was done at that time, and at Halifax Sir John MacDonald's position is, if I remember rightly : Look at the Act and we will see what the boundary is. Your Lordships are looking at it.

Viscount FINLAY : In map 32A what does the word “ land,” which is in very large letters mean ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : That is the end of “ Rupert's Land.”

Mr. MACMILLAN : Now I will take your Lordship's admonition and not dwell over these matters. The Agnew grant I have made my comment on. Perhaps it might be worth while to say a word about the Moravian Grants, if your Lordships please. May I consider, first of all, with what object these are relied on by my learned friend. They are relied on, I take it, for this purpose : to show that “ coast,” here, means something more than a narrow selvedge, because grants were made to the Moravians of part of the Coast of Labrador, and the whole cannot be less than the part ; therefore, if you find grants made of extensive tracts of territory these give you some idea of what was in the minds of people who talked about “ the coast of Labrador ” when they made these extensive grants. First of all, with submission, what I have to say with regard to this is that, of course, that has nothing whatever to do with the height of land at all. It does not assist my learned friend there at all; it may assist him on the question of what is the depth inland of the sea coast of Labrador, but it is of no value to him at all on the question of the height of land. The first matter upon it is to draw your Lordship's attention to the map, which has already been before you, showing the four grants that were made to the Moravian Brethren.

4 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount FINLAY : Where is that map ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : It has not been reprinted.

Viscount HALDANE : You produced a copy of it.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Your Lordships have had it. I have in my hand the original which was supplied to us very courteously by the Government of Newfoundland when we asked them, “ What are these Moravian settlements on the Coast ” ? We received this and we must assume it is accurate.

p. 611

Viscount HALDANE : Are they all to the North ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord, all four are to the North.

Lord SUMNER : How far inland does this go ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : I cannot find that any of them is at any great distance from the shore, my Lord. I looked for that very point ; it is the Northernmost one as shown here, that rhomboid.

Viscount HALDANE : How far in was this ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : They are drawn in this way, that they include a very broken coast, and it is very difficult to say exactly how far inland you get. I take it from the largest stretch of land intervening between any point of those boundaries and the nearest sea ; if I do it that way I think that the point where that occurs is in the Hebron Settlement, that is the Northernmost one, and the Northernmost one is the biggest. I want to find the point included in any one of those irregular figures which is most remote from the sea. That is what I am looking for at the moment, and I understand that is what Lord Sumner desires. As far as I have seen, that seems to be about the furthest.

Viscount FINLAY:: Is that on the Rhomboid ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : My point for the moment is to get what portion within these grants is furthest away from the sea.

Lord WARRINGTON : From the nearest water of the coast.

4 Nov., 1926.
Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, the nearest sea coast. My learned friend will perhaps cheek me on this ; I cannot see any of the others which go further. (After conferring with Sir John Simon) My learned friend persuades me to do it a little more favourably than I thought I would ; his persuasive urbanity causes me to do it.

Viscount HALDANE : Is that the Hebron ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, My Lord, the Hebron. I think it is between 25 and 30 miles. That is one point only, and I have taken the furthest possible point inland.

Viscount HALDANE : Is that from the easternmost boundary, to the back ?

p. 612

Mr. MACMILLAN : I am putting the problem to myself in this way, my Lord : How far could I get away from salt water in any of the territories granted to the Moravians ?

Viscount HALDANE : That is going inland ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord, inland. How far inland would I get ?

Viscount HALDANE : But how far is the easternmost boundary the one nearest to the sea ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : It goes right into the sea, my Lord. The grants are grants of sea water and islands as well ; and one must bear this in mind, that these grants are only grants of areas, and not of boundaries. I am taking this as set down by my learned friends themselves on this map, for the purpose of my test. But all that was done was to give grants of so many acres, and those have been construed, apparently, as involving large amounts of water. They were really locations for the Moravians, and intended to be a sphere of operations for them. I do not think, therefore, that very much turns upon whether it is 25 miles or 30 miles, or even 40 miles.

Lord Sumner.

Viscount HALDANE : The Hebron territory ran into the sea, as I understand it.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It was on the sea.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount HALDANE : I know ; and it came down into the sea, and it goes back for 25 to 30 miles to the other boundary.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Towards the west, my Lord.

Lord SUMNER : According to that map, a grant appears to have been made, without challenge, of land situated between 25 and 30 miles from the nearest sea water.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord.

4 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord SUMNER : It may not have been much land that was as far back as that, and it may be that most of it was much nearer ; but still they did get it as far back as that, without challenge.

Mr. MACMILLAN : As I understand it, my Lord, it was not, granted eo nomine ; they were given so many acres ; and it has been laid down in that form. The whole significance of it disappears when it is remembered that these grants were not made by the Governor of Newfoundland at all, but, like Agnew's grant, were matters dealt with by the proper department to deal with them. These grants were made to the Moravians, not by the Governor of Newfoundland at all, but they were made by the Privy Council at home here.

The Lord Chancellor.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : But were they not made through the Governor of Newfoundland ?

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : He only commended the Moravians, and he only commended them for this reason, that they were doing useful work up there, and they provided him with an interpreter to interpret between himself and the Esquimaux, who were a practically amphibious people on the margin. The Mission was to the fishing people, and not to the people of the interior. The Governor was told to look after them and to encourage them in the good work that they were doing, and he recognised that and said, “ They are doing very useful work, and if we could get these people Christianised, then we shall not have the trouble on our coast which we had had with our fisherman getting into contests.”

Viscount Haldane.

Mr. Macmillan.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I think the recommendation was that Your Majesty's Governor, the Governor of Newfoundland, should be instructed to allow the Society to occupy these acres.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord, but that instruction emanates from the Privy Council, does it not ? The Governor is very properly told, “ We propose to give these people a seat upon your territory, and therefore we are communicating with our Governor and he is to allow those people there.” That is how I conceive that it came about.

Viscount HALDANE : It leaves open the question as to how he was acting. Was he acting as the instrument of the Crown, or was, he acting as the person in authority, to keep the peace ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord. It is interesting with regard to this point to look at page 1347. Will your Lordships observe the Proclamation by Governor Hamilton of Newfoundland as to the grant to the Moravians. It says this :

“ Whereas His Royal Highness the Prince Regent in Council on the 13th of May, 1818, acting in the name and on the behalf of His Majesty was graciously pleased to authorise that every facility should be given to the Moravian Missionaries in Labrador for extending the beneficial influence which they have had upon the character of the Native Indians, and for spreading still further the benefits of the Gospel and to that end to permit and allow the Society of the ‘ Unitas Fratrum ’ to form a fourth settlement on the Eastern coast of Labrador and to occupy during His Majesty's pleasure ‘ that part of the said Coast to the North of Okkak, which comprehending the Bays of Kangerhuksoak and Saeglek reaches to the 59 Degrees of N. Latitude, provided that the spots chosen by the said Society for its settlements may be such as in no respect to interrupt or annoy the fisheries carried on upon the said Eastern Coast of Labrador.'

I, the Governor aforesaid, do therefore hereby make known unto all whom it may concern that the said Settlements of the 'Unitas Fratrum' are under His Majesty's immediate protection."

Viscount FINLAY : What Volume are you reading from ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is Volume III, page 1347.

Lord SUMNER : The grant was made as a grant by the Crown of Crown Lands, and not as an exercise of jurisdiction conferred by the Commission of the Governor of Newfoundland.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord.

Lord SUMNER : But then there comes a further difficulty. Is not that, in that case, a grant by the Crown at the expense either of the Hudson's Bay Company or of Quebec ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : I think it must have been.

Lord SUMNER : And if there is no communication either with the Hudson's Bay Company or Quebec, is not that some ground for saying that the view of the advisers of the Crown was that really it was not within the jurisdiction of the Governor of Newfoundland, although it might be proper under the circumstances.

Mr. MACMILLAN : But, my Lord, see how tenuous the point becomes. I should agree most respectfully that Newfoundland was properly consulted, because Newfoundland had a coast, and this did embrace a part of what we ourselves concede was Newfoundland.

Viscount HALDANE : In the year 1818 ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord.

Lord SUMNER : All these points become more tenuous.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That does not, unhappily, absolve one from the duty of dealing with them.

The Moravian position, therefore, does not seem to advance matters very much, but what is very striking is this, that whatever the Moravians were, they were a coastal mission. That is quite clear. They did not know the language of the interior at all, and they were missionaries to the Esquimaux. They were Protestants. Your Lordships will find some very interesting passages in the last volume.

territory where the Moravians were, if they had it at all, in virtue of the Proclamation of 1763. You will remember that the Statutes took away from Newfoundland what it had got since 1763.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I have always maintained that it was the same subject matter that was being transacted with, back and forth, namely, the fishery coast.

Viscount HALDANE : The coast, yes ; but the only part of the coast that was taken away under the Statute was such part of the coast as had been given to Newfoundland since 1763.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord.

Viscount HALDANE : The words are express.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord, they are.

Sir JOHN SIMON : If my learned friend will forgive me, I think it may be that Lord Haldane is for the moment thinking of a later date, perhaps. The matter that we are dealing with is a matter which arises in the year 1766. It is therefore before the Act of 1774.

Viscount HALDANE : You mean this incident ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord. I beg my learned friend's pardon for interrupting, but this happened before 1774.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Is that the Moravian letter ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Then Newfoundland would be interested in this. After 1774, it would not be.

Sir JOHN SIMON : The point, for what it is worth, is this : it really is not much, but it is in Volume III, at page 963, at the bottom of that page, where the Lords of Trade say that they recommend your Majesty's Governor to be instructed to allow this Society to occupy—so and so.

4 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount HALDANE : What is the date of that ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : That is 1766, my Lord, and therefore it is after Newfoundland has got the coast, whatever “ the coast ” means, and it is before 1774. It is at the bottom of page 963 in Volume III.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I was pointing out that these Moravians were missionaries and coastal people, and coastal people only, and they were therefore persons who would naturally be seated on the coast, and there—fore persons who would naturally be commended to whoever was in charge of the coast. The Christianizing of these Esquimaux, who had been very savage and had caused a great deal of trouble with the fishermen resorting to that place, was very important. It was pointed out by Governor Palliser that it was very important to get them tamed, because otherwise we could not carry on the fishery, and the Moravians were an instrument of taming these people. But they had nothing to do with the interior Indians at all, and therefore the Moravian settlements do not affect the question of the interior, but they may affect the question of how far inland it was proper to consult the Governor of Newfoundland about, when you were dealing with any part of these coasts. Beyond that, there is not anything much in it. Will your Lordships take a reference to pages 4176 to 4182, where your Lordships will see in records of the Moravians that they did not know the Indian language at all and were not able to carry on their missions in that territory.

p. 616

The Lord Chancellor.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount FINLAY : I think you read a passage.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I have not read this at all, my Lord.

Viscount FINLAY : No, but you did read a passage to that effect, I think.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord. These pages are interesting because they speak about the Indians coming from the interior, and they are strangers ; they do not know about them.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Of course, this does not come to very much, because these missionaries often begin with a little or no knowledge of the native language, and then learn it.

Mr. MACMILLAN : But your Lordship will notice that up to 1868, when they had been there for more than one hundred years on the coast, they had not learned it. First of all, apparently, in 1850, when the coast of Labrador was undoubtedly in the hands of Newfoundland, they cannot have been doing very much for it, because the unhappy Moravians complain, on page 4176, at line 20, that “ we have here neither magistrate nor police regulations, we scarcely know how to act in such a distressing case as the above, fearing to be either too forbearing on the one hand. or too severe on the other.”

4 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Then they tell us this incident about a company of Indians coming down to dispose of reindeer skins, and they tell us this about it on page 4177, in line 2 : “ They appeared at our meetings, and behaved with decorum. How glad we should have been to preach the blessed Gospel to them in their own tongue ! These, like very many Indians, professed to belong to the Romish church, but they seemed to lack all religious knowledge. They had come from a distance of several days' journey, and drew on the floor with chalk the outlines of the course they had taken. We gave them several presents for their wives and children, with which they were pleased.” Now, my Lords, here is a very picturesque little incident. The Esquimaux missionaries are receiving a visit from Red Indians. They cannot converse with them, but have to use the language of signs, and they are very interested in seeing these people.

Then the next extract is in the year 1878, and with regard to that it says this, in the middle of page 4177 : “ About the middle of the year a family of Indians visited Hopedale from Ukjuktok Bay, who, as almost all the Neskopie Indians, are nominally connected with the Roman Catholic Church. The object of their visit was to obtain information about the differences between the Roman Catholic and Protestant beliefs.”—I take respectful leave to doubt whether that was the real reason, and whether their interest led them to that.—“ The Christian behaviour of our Eskimoes, who live near them, had made such an impression on their minds, that they desired to spend a Sunday with our congregation at Hopedale,” and so on.

Then your Lordships will find various little human incidents of that sort, on page 4178, for instance : “ In February and March we had visits from companies of Nascopi Indians, who came to barter with us. How we regretted our inability to converse with them ! They were very suspicious in their dealings with us.” Then a little lower down, at line 28 on the same page, it says : “ Again it was impossible for us ”—this is the same year, 1882—“ to have intelligent intercourse with them on account of our ignorance of their language ; the Eskimoes understood them better, and appear to have lost a good deal of their old jealousy of the Indians.”

There are several more extracts to the same effect. There is rather an interesting little note taken from Dr. Grenfell, who, of course, has been so much associated with Labrador and has done such wonderful work there. That is on page 4182, and there are other extracts from Dr. Grenfell's works among the papers, and he has some very interesting observations to make from his long experience of the coast. There is one passage in which he points out that there are no houses more than 250 yards from the shore of the Labrador Coast, but in this passage here he is talking of the vernacular acceptation of Labrador. This is on page 4182, and he says : “ ‘ Labrador ’ is a term used, now with a wider sense, now with a more limited meaning. Taken in its widest geographical sense, it implies the vast peninsula to the north of Canada and Newfoundland, bounded by Hudson's Bay, Hudson's Straights and the Atlantic Ocean. To Newfoundlanders, however, ' the Labrador ' is that part of the rugged and desolate coast—line nearest their island, and along which their schooners cruise during the season of the cod fishery. Of late years numbers of these fishing vessels have come north of Cape Harrison and so within what we may call ' the sphere of influence ' of the venerable Moravian Mission established among the heathen Eskimoes, when their reputation for murderous savagery held all other white men at a distance." I say no more about the Moravians ; and I think one other topic will exhaust these matters that I have to pick up.

My learned friend referred to a certain resolution of 1886 as affording some support to his case. That was the resolution which preceded the Canadian Acts of 1898, extending the boundaries of the Province of Quebec ; and the point, put quite shortly, is this : If the territory in the interior was already the property of Quebec, under the Act of 1774, was it not idle to extend the Province of Quebec in 1898 so as to take in what was already included in it ?

The Resolution is to be found in Volume VIII at page 4005, and a little examination of it is, I think, worth while making. It was quoted more especially, I think, for the words below line No. 30, the description of the proposed boundary being there set out, and its concluding words are : " again on the east by this same river to the fifty—second degree of north latitude, following this parallel to its intersection by the meridian of Anse au Blanc Sablon, the present recognised eastern boundary of this province." The point of Anse Sablon is certainly the Eastern boundary ; but as to what is the depth, is a different matter. Then the proposal was legislation. My learned friend, unless I mistook him, said that that view was adopted by the Dominion and became the law. On page 222 of the Shorthand Notes, my learned friend laid great emphasis upon this, and said : " It is a most striking fact that in 1886 after the rather detailed and careful Canadian survey represented in the official map of 1882, you should have the view first of all presented by the Quebec Government to the Dominion, and then in its turn adopted by the Dominion and then in its turn adopted by the Dominion and acted upon, that what Quebec needed was to enlarge the boundaries as you see them on my model," and so on.

Now, my Lords, what happened was this, that upon this matter coming up for consideration, the boundary was not so fixed by the Legislature. Would your Lordships just look at the foot of page 4006, where there is a letter from Mr. Burgess, the Deputy Minister of the Interior, to the Minister of the Interior, Mr. Mayne Daly. It says this : " I have the honour to report that I have, in accordance with your request, given careful consideration to the various references which have been made from Council of despatches from His Honour the Lieutenant Governor of Quebec, having relation to the subject of the Northern, North-western and North-eastern boundaries of that Province. The views of the Provincial authorities as to what these boundaries should be are set forth in a report, dated 4th June, 1886";—that is the one upon which my learned friend is relying—" made by a select committee of the Legislative Assembly ' to consider the question '"—and so on. Then the correspondence is referred to and this description is given : " This proposal, with the correspondence arising out of it, was referred to the Department of the Interior in December, 1889. I then reported that next to nothing was known about the East Main and Hamilton Rivers ; that like all other rivers they undoubtedly had several sources and branches, and that before they could be adopted as a boundary it would be necessary to determine in each case which of the branches is to be adopted as the dividing line." Then a survey was ordered and made, and then comes the position on page 4008, at line 10 : “ I do not contend that the boundary proposed is a legal boundary, but on the contrary admit that it is a conventional one. The true limit of the Province of Quebec on the North would probably be the boundary between New France and the territories of Great Britain on the northern part of the continent”—in other words, Hudson's Bay Territory—“ There was some difference of opinion between France and England as to where the boundary should be, and the commissioners appointed to decide the question never reported. Even if that boundary had been finally established it could not now be adhered to, because in the interval, after an arrangement and a rearrangement, the Imperial Government finally detached from the Province of Quebec and placed under the jurisdiction of Newfoundland the strip along the Atlantic coast extending from Anse Sablon to Hudson Strait described by ‘ Letters Patent ’ dated 28th March, 1876, as follows : ‘ The Coast of Labrador from the entrance of Hudson's Strait to a line to be drawn due north and south from Anse Sablon on the said coast to the 52nd degree of north latitude, and all the Islands adjacent to that part of the Coast of Labrador.’ What therefore is now aimed at is a conventional line which will also be convenient and easily ascertained, and it is believed that in the description appended to this memorandum that aim has been attained, the only portion of the lines it describes which would appear to require to be established by any further actual survey being the right line connecting the waters of the East Main River with the waters of the Ashuanipi,” and so on. Then comes the description of the proposed North-eastern boundary of Quebec from the purpose of this conventional, though not necessarily legal, boundary.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I did not follow that. Did you read line 12, where it says : “ At that time, if I am not very much mistaken’ ?

4 Nov., 1926.
Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I do not know whether I read that or not, but you can have an opportunity of reading it later on.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : It was read.

Sir JOHN SIMON : It rather throws light upon the reason why they suggested what they did.

Mr. MACMILLAN : At the foot of page 4099 there is the proposed description of the boundaries of Quebec for this conventional purpose, recognising Newfoundland there, “ and thence easterly along the middle of the said bay or inlet ”—that is along the Hamilton Bay or Inlet—“ until it strikes ”—now, my Lord, what ?—“ the Westerly Boundary of the territory under the jurisdiction of Newfoundland and thence southerly along said boundary to the point where it strikes the north shore of the Anse Sabion in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, the said boundary being shown in red as far as Hamilton Inlet on the map hereto attached.” So that what was done by the resolution of 1886 was not, as my learned friend said, that the Dominion adopted in turn what had been reported, but on the contrary the Dominion considered the matter fully, got a survey and report, and then said : “ The boundary which we propose (which is not really a legal boundary, because technically we have got all this already probably under the Quebec Act, but it is an administrative boundary for which we want, legislative sanction) we will carry along until we come, on the frontier to the boundary of Newfoundland, a coastal strip of Newfoundland, and then we will run down that line until we come to Anse Sablon, where Newfoundland terminates.” That was what was done ; and how it can be said that the Dominion adopted what was proposed in the Resolution of 1886 I fail to see. The Legislations that followed the Act are, first, that of the Province of Quebec in Volume VIII at page 4015, and the legislation of the Dominion in Volume I, page 247.

Now, my Lords, of course, it is quite right to say that that was in 1898, and if Canada, or its Province of Quebec, was legislating then in territory which was the territory of Newfoundland, it was acting ultra vires, quite plainly. But to say that the resolution of 1886 was the basis of these Acts is inaccurate. What was actually done was to recognise—it may have been erroneously—where the Newfoundland frontier was, but to recognise a frontier on the Labrador coast, and to carry the boundary of Quebec, as proposed to be conventionally extended, down alongside that boundary, preserving to Newfoundland the territory within its jurisdiction.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Is that map anywhere which is referred to in the Quebec Statute ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord, it is in our Atlas.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I should like to look at it, just to follow this boundary.

Viscount HALDANE : I suppose, strictly speaking, the Dominion was taking advantage of the Order in Council.

4 Nov., 1926.

Viscount Haldane.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It really followed upon this, that after the decision of the Ontario–Manitoba case, it was thought desirable to carry up the boundary of Quebec to a line in continuance of that, and that is how the matter came up. It came up in 1886 first of all, and then there was a certain proposal as to what should be done, and this very point about whether it was not legislation which was superfluous because it was already in Quebec under the Act of 1774 was raised. Then they said : “ Let us have a conventional boundary of Quebec for administrative purposes.” That is the boundary that they have fixed and which recognised the selvedge. They recognised that Newfoundland was seated on the coast, and they recognised that in their Act of 1898

Mr. Macmillan.

p. 621

Lord SUMNER : Which number is it ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : No. 12, my Lord.

Viscount Haldane.

Viscount HALDANE : Assuming that the territory in question was not Newfoundland, but was territory which had not been allotted at all, this legislation of 1880 gives it to Canada.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord, if it was no-man's-land, it became Canada's then. Then they stopped the boundary at where they conceived, and where we are now to submit, was the boundary of the coast of Newfoundland, at the Hamilton Inlet. It is very near the coast. The description is : “ thence easterly along the middle of the said bay or inlet until it strikes the Westerly Boundary of the territory under the jurisdiction of Newfoundland, and thence southerly along the said boundary to the point where it strikes the north shore of the Anse Sablon.” So that they recognised at that time, and the Legislature recognised, the presence of Newfoundland, and they said : “ We must of course stop short of the strip of land which Newfoundland has got.” That I think was the last of the subjects which my learned friend prayed in aid, and I quite accept his view that they are all subordinate ; but I could not, as I have said, leave them without making my comments upon them.

Viscount HALDANE : Before you wholly pass away from these things, will you tell me, on your general map, about the distances. Have you got them ? For instance, take the broader part from the blue line across to Cape Harrison, or wherever you like. How much is that in miles ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : I will get the geographer to tell me the distance. There is a scale there. First of all, from the blue line to Cape Harrison, a perpendicular. Would your Lordship like that ? We can easily do that.

4 Nov., 1926.

Viscount HALDANE : From the blue line, a line west and east.

Mr. MACMILLAN : As near as may be, it is 300 miles, my Lord, if your Lordship means what I have measured, which is a perpendicular line dropped from Cape Harrison to the blue line.

Viscount HALDANE : I did not mean that, I meant across.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Horizontally.

Mr. MACMILLAN : The depth inland ? From Cape Harrison to the nearest point on the blue ?

4 N 2

p. 622

Lord SUMNER : Somewhere about 220.

Mr. MACMILLAN : As near as may be about 230 miles.

Sir John Simon.

Lord WARRINGTON : That is just under the 55th parallel.

Mr. MACMILLAN : 230 miles to the nearest point of the blue, the ribbon.

Viscount HALDANE : Let us look where the Moravians were, at Hebron. That is much shorter.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I take the middle of the blue and I take the letter " H " at Hebron. I make that roughly about 50 miles.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Is my friend now measuring from the head of the inlet or from the general trend of the coast.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, I was measuring from the " H " at Hebron to the middle of the blue line.

Sir JOHN SIMON : My friend's 50 miles is from what I may call the general trend of the coast, not from the head of the inlet ; when he gave ou the number of miles from the sea, it was from the head of the inlet concerned.

Viscount HALDANE : From Cape Chidley down to Anse Sablon, a line down to the 52nd parallel, what is that roughly ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : From Cape Chidley to Anse Sablon Point is about 650 miles roughly.

Viscount FINLAY : From where to where ?

4 Nov., 1926.

Mr. MACMILLAN : From this point, I have taken the corner here, to Cape Chidley, I have just drawn a line direct across there. (Describing.) Then the greatest depth inland would naturally be from about the point here, you are coming round the corner at Belle Isle, from about there to there, that would be the greatest depth inland. (Describing on on plan.) I will just measure that also. I am told 417 miles as near as may be. The greatest depth inland from the coast in the area shown green is under 450 miles.

Mr. Macmillan.

When I told your Lordships this morning about the terms of the Bill, I had not the actual terms before me, but it is quite plain there was a blank. It is : “ so much of the said coast as lies to the westward of a line to be drawn due north and south from the bay or harbour of Anse Sablon, inclusive, as far as the ”—then comes a blank—“ degree of north latitude, with the island of Anticosti.”

p. 623

The LORD CHANCELLOR : In the Bill, is it brought in ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, the Bill of 1825.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : If I conjecture rightly, that word was put in in committee in one House or the other.

LORD SUMNER : How does it continue after the blank ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : My friend will read the words, it only leaves out the ordinal, it leaves out 52nd ; everything else is clear.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is quite right, the “ inclusive ” precedes that ; it runs thus : “ that so much of the said coast as lies to the westward of a line to be drawn due north and south from the bay or harbour of Anse Sablon, inclusive, as far as the ‘ blank ’ degree of north latitude.”

The LORD CHANCELLOR : It has got “ degree.”

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : It is simply that the word “ fifty-second ” is left out.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes. “ With the Island of Anticosti, and all other islands adjacent to such part ; ” it does not advance matters much one way or the other.

I have concluded my main argument to your Lordships, and I propose to take up the question of Lake Melville. That point arises in this way, it assumes success on my part in my argument that the coast of Labrador within the meaning of the constituent documents is a strip of coast. I admit that it has a depth inland, but that depth inland measured by the purpose of the grant and the use to which the land is appropriated under the grant. Whether it is one mile or less, as seems to have been considered by the Commissions to the Governors of Newfoundland, or in the French delimitations, or whether it is more, my measure of the trip is the purpose and the use, but that assumes a coast and a measurement inland from that coast. We are in agreement as to where that coast, in the sense of the shore line of Labrador is. All those Islands dotted down the coast of Labrador, are all of them Newfoundland. The coast, in my sense of the term, is also Newfoundland, and we are in agreement with Newfoundland that we do not invoke here the doctrine of jumping across bays which are less than 6 miles in width, we do not invoke any of those Chapters of the law which were discussed in the Alaskan case. We admit the coast. from which the measurement inland is to be made follows the sinuosity of the Labrador coast, it follows the bays, and, therefore, the distance inland would follow, whatever it may be, the sinuosities of the coast all the way down. Your Lordships, therefore, are not embarrassed with that muchdebated question of what is meant by a coast in the sense of international law.

Viscount HALDANE : How does that affect our minds ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : It does not, with great respect, because we are willing to give them their ribbon all the way down, a mile limit all down the coast, all the way along.

Viscount HALDANE : What about the limitation inland ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : I am coming to that point about Hamilton Inlet. In our submission, Hamilton Inlet is not the coast at all. The question is, what is the nature of the coast at that point Where are you to draw the coast. The submission will be upon that matter, we have not heard it yet, because this has not been opened, naturally, by Newfoundland—the question is : Where is the Coast line. When you come up Hamilton Inlet there, does it or does it not follow right round to the head of Lake Melville and come out again, or does it cross, does the coast line cross at the Narrows. The whole question is : and it is a very large question I may tell your Lordships at once, if it be the case that Newfoundland has a right to a strip, whatever breadth it be, round the coast, when you come down to the Narrows, are you to go inland right up to the top of Lake Melville, indeed up to the top of the little place behind called Goose Bay and come round there, or are you to cross at the Narrows and continue down ? Where, in short, is the coast line of Labrador at that point.

4 Nov., 1926.

Viscount HALDANE : We have heard very little about the Narrows. Could ships go up.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, ships could go up.

Viscount HALDANE : How broad are they.

Mr. MACMILLAN : At the narrowest point one mile.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount HALDANE : Is it fresh water ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Fresh water comes out. The whole drainage of that enormous hinterland passes through the Narrows.

Viscount HALDANE : Are they tidal.

Mr. MACMILLAN : The tide runs right up into Goose Bay, at the very top, at the very end.

Lord WARRINGTON : Right through Lake Melville ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Right through Lake Melville, the whole of Lake Melville, the tidal influence is felt right up there.

Viscount FINLAY : Is the water brackish ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is more or less fresh water at the surface and salt in the under parts, salt water goes to the bottom as it always does, the fresh is on the surface being of less specific gravity.

May I before going to the physiographical details of it just give your Lordships first of all a general description. The problem is to say where the coast begins, and the land ends. Of course, dotted along many shores there are inland waters which are in communication with the sea, which nevertheless are not the sea, and the question really is, putting it in its broadest form, whether Lake Melville is an arm of the sea ; that is probably as fair and as general a way to put it as one could, or, on the other hand, is it an expansion of the River Hamilton, a part of the Hamilton River system. There have been many controversies upon similar questions both at law and elsewhere as to when exactly you pass from the region of a river into the region of the sea. Expansions of this sort in the course of a river are quite common. They arise generally from geological conditions, and frequently is the effect of the ice erosion, and just as you have in the higher waters of these Rivers great Lakes of enormous depth which have been gouged out by the glacial action, so also you may have those near the shore. The question really is, whether this large stretch of water falls into the category of a lake which is an expansion of this river as it nears the sea, or, on the other hand, is truly part of the sea itself in the same sense as all those other inlets down the coast which we are accepting are part of the sea. There is a large map which shows the whole of the Hamilton Inlet and also Lake Melville.

Viscount HALDANE : There is the opening of the water at the North West River.

4 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, that is undoubtedly a fresh water lake, that is a little up from the Lake. That is a typical example there of a stream as it reaches close to its outlet, in this case into the Lake, it expands itself into a great big lake.

Viscount HALDANE : Do you say this is fresh water ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, no one would claim that Lake was the sea. There are maps, I do not know which is the best map.

Sir .JOHN SIMON : There is an Admiralty chart.

Mr. MACMILLAN : There is both an Admiralty chart and a map.

p. 626

I think probably if you had a detailed map, this one is as good as any (Producing same). It is the Lake Melville map, No. 13 in the bib atlas.

Viscount HALDANE : The Canadian atlas.

Mr. MACMILLAN : In the Canadian atlas. This is a representation of Lake Melville after the survey by Captain Anderson and other assistant hydrographers, 1921, published under the Orders of the Minister of Naval Service of Canada. I would rather have had a larger one that showed Hamilton Inlet as well, because you would then see on the outside of the Narrows you have the typical features—it is off the map unfortunately—after you just pass the Narrows on this side you get into one of these typical wide funnel-shaped openings where you encounter a large volume of water which debouches into the sea, and you have there a typical bay. We, of course, admit at once that Hamilton Inlet is part of the sea, but when you get into the Narrows and come into what is shown here as Lake Melville, you are getting into a different region altogether, and the question is whether that sheet of water is sea or not.

Viscount FINLAY : Let me understand. Where is the precise point that you say the controvesy arises ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Ticoralak Head.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I suppose in your case Double Mer Point is the point.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is a little below that.

Lord WARRINGTON : Does your line take in Ticoralak as part of Canada ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, part of Canada. You will see if my Lord would look at the large cartoon which probably shows it as well as anything.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : What do you say of Double Mer ?

4 Nov., 1926.

The Lord Chancellor.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is inside, not on the coast.

LORD SUMNER : How wide ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Two miles.

Viscount FINLAY : From where to where ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Between Ticoralak and Turner Headlands it is two miles across. There is an Admiralty chart which does show it.

p. 627

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I was taking it from your Case on page 60 : “ That the coast–line crosses the river below a line connecting Lester and Double Mer Points.”

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, there it is. “ Where this line is to be located cannot be stated with exactitude, but the conditions all indicate that the coast–line would be properly drawn between Ticoralak and Turner Headlands.” These two headlands are shown on the Admiralty chart, this is No. 35. That is an Admiralty chart. (Same handed in.)

Sir JOHN SIMON : There is a full–sized Admiralty chart of the neighbourhood.

Sir John Simon.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I have underlined the two places on the chart. Your Lordship sees there I have ventured to underline in blue on that chart two things, one called Ticoralak, and in the corner there are two headlands, there are two jaws ; it is across there that we suggest for our case the coast–line should properly be drawn.

Lord WARRINGTON : Is that further down than Double Mer ?

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, it is further down.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I do not know whether it is a convenience or not, but we have another copy of the Admiralty chart if anybody wants it.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I shall be obliged if you would furnish that to their Lordships. (Same handed in.)

Sir JOHN SIMON : I think the separate charts are the convenient ones, because the atlas is so small a scale.

Mr. MACMILLAN : As your Lordships will see, these are levels, you are down to the sea–level as contrasted with the level of Lake Melville. Lake Melville is higher than the sea. The water runs out through the Narrows, as far as we have been able to gauge, the point where it ceases to be in the Lake region and reaches what you might call the sea region is just about there ; it is not determinable with precision any more than you can determine on the St. Lawrence, where the River St. Lawrence ends and the Gulf of St. Lawrence begins, but that you are passing from one region to another is in our submission manifest—one class of region to another.

Our whole case is this is river till it empties itself through the Narrows to the sea.

4 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord WARRINGTON : You say that is a line two miles long.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Two miles across at that point. Your Lordship notices that beyond that line, the line joining Ticoralak and Turner

4 O

p. 628

Headlands, you have a trumpet-shaped opening, an opening out such as one is familiar with in the ordinary case where a river joins the sea. You have got the Ivucktoke or Hamilton Inlet, from the sea there that is all plainly sea, we say you come round there and you leap the headlands at that point because these headlands are really the mouths of the river Hamilton. That is where the river Hamilton joins the sea. Then you come into the real bay, the inlet, which has a trumpet-shaped opening in the coast, such as one is familiar with in many other situations. The reason no doubt of there being a controversy about this is because this particular Lake is going near the sea and is connected with the sea by this channel which runs through the Narrows ; at its narrowest point it is a mile wide, it is wider at other points, if it had been further inland I do not suppose there would have been any question at all, that it was not the sea, but being so near, the suggestion is, this inlet, you have to pass through the Narrows and you are still in the Hamilton Inlet and still in the sea till you have got right up to the top of it, and at the top of Lake Melville you are still on the sea-coast of Labrador, indeed the top of Goose Bay, if you are standing on top of Goose Bay you are still on the sea-coast of Labrador. Our submission is that you are not, you are on the coast of a lake, called Lake Melville.

Lord Sumner.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord SUMNER : Supposing your boundary runs across there (describing), that is like your boundary on the land.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes.

Lord SUMNER : A line that you cannot pass without consent, so you are cut off from navigation connecting you with the sea by this invisible boundary.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I would even be in a worse position if the boundary went round the top of Lake Melville, because it is quite true it is an incident of this boundary, but they would be entitled to say that one is not to pass.

Lord SUMNER : Quite. I only wanted to be sure you did not draw any distinction.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I wish I could.

Lord SUMNER : For the purposes of Canada Lake Melville is an inland place.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, perfectly, your Lordship is quite right ; it is of cause a feature of this boundary.

Lord SUMNER : For the purposes of those who want to convey wood pulp from the interior forests without the consent of Newfound—land they must all go over land and over the height of land, either to Hudson's Bay or to the River St. Lawrence, or down to Ungava Bay, and wait till the Straits are free of ice.

Mr. MACMILLAN : If Newfoundland chose to close its doors to Mr. Macmillan commerce. We had the evidence that in the past Newfoundland found it very profitable to have Customs tariffs and the goods which passed through that strip of Newfoundland had to pay taxes as they came into the interior.

Lord SUMNER : In 1763 that must have been, in the minds of those who appreciated the language used, the result.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, that there was a strip along the coast.

Viscount HALDANE : I suppose they thought it was Indian territory ?

4 Nov., 1926.

Lord Sumner.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord Sumner.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, it was a tributary to these hunting posts, they did not mind as far as I can see, at that time it did not concern them, but it is quite true this boundary is a strip along the coast which would entitle them to say to any person moving from the interior outwards “ you cannot pass over this without paying toll to us,” or “ you shall not pass at all if we like to prohibit you.”

Lord SUMNER : It is a strip of uniform width all the way, whether it is drawn along the face of a cliff or the top of a cliff ; where is it drawn, from high water or low water ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : High water mark. As I have said over and over again my measure is the utility of the land and the purpose. You have various measurements, for instance, Newfoundland itself has chosen to reserve ; it has made a number of grants of timber rights since the matter has been in controversy, therefore, as they cannot naturally found upon and have not founded upon——

Lord SUMNER : The materiality is in the uniform width.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Your Lordship will see it was to that they were directing it in those leases. Newfoundland has uniformly retained a strip of five miles. They seem to consider that five miles must be kept free from these timber concessionaires in order that that may be reserved for fishery interests, I take it, it is not an uncommon problem to have to consider. In those five miles also they may have to pass over cliffs and other things.

(Adjourned for a short time.)

AFTERNOON SESSION.

4 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount Haldane.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : My Lords, I may first lay on one side this aspect of the case. We are concerned in ascertaining the coast, and I think it will be clear that the word coast has no application to a river. If I am in a position to demonstrate that the River Hamilton persists to the Narrows, then the banks of that River, whether wide or narrow, are not coasts in the sense of sea coasts. The word coast has no application to a river, but it is the proper word applied to the sea. I am using there language of the highest authority, Lord Stowell's language, who used these words : " Coast, a word very strangely applied to a river, but the proper word applied to the sea." That doctrine causes no difficulty in acceptance. Another quotation I have is that " the term coast, in its popular sense is, we believe, applied to the land fronting on the open sea, or inlets off the sea, or bays, but is never applied to that fronting on rivers." If, therefore, you were satisfied we are dealing here with a river, then the word coast would be non-applicable to the banks of a river. On the other hand, the question of when a river passes into the sea, it merges into the sea, is necessarily a question to some extent of degree, and it presents difficult problems. An elementary case is the one that presents itself in the St. Lawrence. Where does the River St. Lawrence end and the Gulf of St. Lawrence begin ; what, in other words, are the criteria of a river as distinguished from inlet of the sea because you are constantly confronted with this state of matters, and as a river flows into the sea there is necessarily contact between these two things, the point at which a river ceases to be within banks and emerges into the sea.

4 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount HALDANE : Can you take this as an abstract question as you are putting it, after all in 1763 they were considering what was required for the establishment and the protection of fisheries.

Mr. MACMILLAN: Yes.

Viscount HALDANE : On the Labrador coast, it was a naval question.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I shall show shortly that the cod fishery cannot be prosecuted inside here at all, the sea cod which are the object of the Newfoundland fishery do not go in there.

Viscount HALDANE : They do not go into Hamilton Inlet.

Mr. MACMILLAN: No, they stop short of that, but there are many other features as well. Your Lordships will ask me this, what are the criteria whereby one can distinguish a river from a strait or a bay or an inlet of the sea. Various criteria have been suggested and various criteria have been rejected also judicially because the problem has had to be considered more than once in other contexts. Possibly a criteria that is most reliable is the existence of a difference of level, consequently of current. As long as you can have a river current you are still in the region of water that is emptying itself out into something else. The sea in popular acceptance is level, one talks of the sea level, it really is not, but in the popular acceptance one talks of the sea as a level plane, into that you have the waters of the land flowing from a height, and as long as there is a current, a flowing current into the sea, then you have something not the sea but which is adding itself to the sea by flowing into it.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : At low water from the rivers.

Mr. MACMILLAN : At low water from the rivers, curiously enough the matter has been before your Lordships' house in the House of Lords more than once, generally in Scottish cases. The question has had to be considered at various points.

Lord SUMNER : Do you mean as far as there is a natural outflow it is not sea.

Mr. MACMILLAN : As long as there is a current flowing from a higher to a lower level. I say that advisedly, because there are several good examples perhaps my Lord has in mind you can get fresh water, for example, in the Amazon about 150 miles out, and in the Rhone in the Mediterranean you can dip your bucket into the water there and get fresh water, but that has ceased to be a current, you are undoubtedly, indubitably, in the sea at that point. The existence of a flow or current of water from a higher level, which is the source to a mouth where it discharges, is one of the most predominant criteria, and one of the most reliable. The point of level is therefore one of considerable importance. There are other tests which have been suggested which are not reliable at all. The fact that a river is tidal, for example, is no criterion. The Thames is tidal opposite the door of this Council Chamber just beyond us here.

4 Nov., 1926.
Mr. Macmillan.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Up to Teddington.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Up to Teddington, which is really Tideendington in derivation. Nobody is going to suggest that we are maritime dwellers on the sea-coast here in London because we are on the River Thames. The circumstance that the tide ebbs and flows in the River Thames does not make that portion of the Thames the sea. That test has been suggested more than once as a test for discriminating between the sea and the river, but manifestly that will not do. Another test which has been suggested is navigability. That test also cannot be regarded in any way as conclusive, as we may again exemplify. There is a constant volume of traffic up and down the Thames here, which is purely river traffic. Navigability is not the test. Solidity, composition of the water again is not a test.

p. 632

The LORD CHANCELLOR : If it is tidal.

Mr. MACMILLAN : The consequence of it being tidal is that salt water goes up and permeates the river bed. Curiously enough, this question of the degree of solidity was discussed in a well-known Scottish case of Horne v. Mackenzie which came before the House of Lords on the question of where does the river reach the sea. Quotations from the case of Horne v. Mackenzie (1839) will be found in Volume V. page 2415. It will perhaps be convenient for your Lordships to know that the documents relating to this tonic of Hamilton Inlet in all its aspects, legal and physiographical, are to be found at two places, viz., Volume V, pages 2319 to 2522. and Volume VIII pages 3789 to 3949.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Is the case of Horne v. Mackenzie reported ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes. my Lord. It is reported in Maclean & Robinson (House of Lords), page 977. It is a Scottish appeal. The case came before the House of Lords on an alleged misdirection by the Judge to a Jury. The question had been before a Jury, and the question was whether the Jury had been misdirected in law as to the principle of law they were to apply. There is a very long extract from that case at page 2415, but I am not proposing to delay over it. Much learning was expended upon the question of when you are in an estuary, and when are you in a river.

Viscount HALDANE : Who was Lord Chancellor then ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Lord Cottenham. There is much discussion of the question upon whether the prevalence or presence of salt water is a criterion to discriminate between sea and river.

4 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Sir JOHN SIMON : They were really construing some statutes, were they not ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, but it was necessary for that purpose that they should address themselves to the inquiry.

For my present purposes I was enumerating the possible tests, and I had pointed out that the fact that there is tide, navigation, and salt water are none of them conclusive criteria that you are in the sea. All these may be present, and are constantly present in rivers properly so-called, and therefore none of these is a determining factor. It is very difficult to find what is truly a determining factor. Apparently the best test is the difference of level combined with what I may call the general physiographical details—the whole concomitants.

Viscount FINLAY : The difference of level make the current.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Necessarily because there is a difference of level.

Viscount FINLAY : If there is a difference of level there is a current.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes. Here you are dealing admittedly with the outlet of a fresh water draining from an enormous interior land. All that water-covered land drains into this Inlet. The drainage basin of the Hamilton Inlet is an enormous area. All that water passes through the Narrows. It must necessarily pass through the Narrows into the sea. It is true that the counter-effect of the tide rising, as it so often is, is to affect the stream at the flood tide. It keeps it back, and also travels up into the body of the water, just as it does in the Thames. But the salt water, being heavier, goes to the bottom, and you will find in Lake Melville—at least this is the description that we have—the surface is at many places almost fresh, and on the other hand, if you were to take a sample of water from the lower holes—because there are very deep parts of this Lake—you would get practically salt water which had come in and had not gone out again.

There are in addition to this question of the current certain other indicia which are of importance. There are a great number of reports in the parts of the Volumes to which I have just given a reference dealing with the various aspects of Lake Melville from different scientific points of view. Those are very illuminative. If one could post oneself on the shore of this Lake and look round one judged by the surroundings would one say that one was on the sea-shore—like a loch in Scotland with which one is so familiar—or would one say one was on the shore of an inland lake which runs out into the sea ? The passages I am going to read will be designed to show that the surrotnulings of this lake, when you are standing on the bank of it, are all suggestive of an inland sheet of water to which the sea has access rather than of an ordinary branch of the sea. The kind of things which are regarded are, for example, the presence or the absence of ordinary sea fish, the character of the fauna and flora, the climatic conditions, the character of the water itself, the geological conditions, and a great number of other things, taken altogether, will give your Lordships a picture of what sort of sheet of water we have to deal with here. The scientific gentlemen who have applied themselves to this matter have supplied us with a vast amount of material. There are arrayed on the two sides of this controversy many names of considerable eminence in geology and other branches of science, and they have all taken the opportunity of expressing themselves at great length on their particular hobbies. It is very difficult to handle such a large amount of material, and I should never think for a moment of inflicting it upon your Lordships. It is difficult to give the gist of long scientific disquisitions in short paragraphs, but I propose to do my best to select one of their summaries where they have described their views. One report I would particularly suggest for your Lordships' consideration—not that I am going to read it, but if I may say so it seemed to me to put our case probably as well as any of the essays—because they are really essays that are contributed to this volume—is Professor Johnson's report in Volume VIII, page 3789. I will not read it now, it is far too long, but I suggest if your Lordships would be good enough to look into this matter you will find that Professor Johnson's paper is from our point of view as good a summary as one can get.

Viscount FINLAY : What Professor Johnson is it ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Professor Douglas Johnson is Professor of Physiography in Columbia University, New York City. During the World War he made special geographical studies in Europe for the Department of State of the American Government and for the American Geographical Society. At the Peace Conference in Paris, 1918–19, he served as Chief of the Division of Boundary Geography of the American Commission to negotiate Peace, as member of several international territorial Committees dealing with boundary problems, and as a geographical adviser to President Wilson and the Department of State in the Adriatic and other boundary disputes. He has specialized in shoreline and coastal studies, having published two volumes on these subjects (“ Shore Processes and Shoreline Development ” and “ The Nature and Origin of Fjords ”) and having received a number of native and foreign distinctions for his work. Therefore he is an expert in this branch of science. He has supplied us with a disquisition on the physiographic aspects of this problem. I do not know whether I am asking too much of your Lordships' indulgence in requesting that your Lordships will look into that paper as containing, in summarised form, on this part of the case, a very accurate and fair representation of our case.

Viscount HALDANE : I see he says Lake Melville is not a bay ; Lake Melville is a true lake.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord. There is a good deal of that. And he gives his reasons such as they are, and I think he does so with moderation. Your Lordship will judge of that, however. May I take one or two of the other papers from which I may be able to extract certain summaries.

Viscount HALDANE : What is his view about fiords ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : There is an immense amount of learning to be found among these papers. Among other things which frankly I had not known before, one finds that there are three different things : fiords. fiards and rias. Professor Gregory of Glasgow University, a well known geologist, and various other geologists, have occupied a great deal of time and paper in discussing these things.

Viscount FINLAY : I should like to appreciate Professor Johnson's view. Put very shortly, what is his reason for the conclusion you have stated ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : He has had put before him all the other scientific aspects of the case, and he has, so to speak, brought them to harmonise. He says : Having regard to all these things I do not, as a physiographer, regard this as an inlet, but as an inland lake.

Viscount HALDANE : It is right to say that he goes very much on geological considerations in what he says.

Viscount FINLAY : I do not think there is much doubt, taking any particular case, whether it would be right to call a thing a lake or an inlet, but it is extremely difficult to extract a principle which is capable of application in the great majority of cases.

Mr. MACMILLAN : May I most humbly accept that view. It is rather like the question one so often has in questions of degree. You are unable to define, but you are able to say in the given individual case. It is like the problem of saying whether something has happened in the day time or in the night time. It may have happened in the twilight, and no one can say when the twilight begins and ends. There is often a debatable region. Here we are in one of those cases where it may be said we are here on the dividing line between sea and river.

Viscount FINLAY : If Professor Johnson had professed to lay down some infallible test which would fix it, I should have rather distrusted his treatise, because I doubt whether it is possible to do that.

Mr. MACMILLAN : He has not attempted to do so. He has rather collected all the relevant data with regard to this sheet of water, and he says : If I take all this into account, it appears to me as a person who has had to deal with physiographer questions of that sort, I would stamp this not as a part of the sea but as an inland lake.

Viscount HALDANE : At page 3835, I see he says : “ Lake Melville and the Narrows are terrestrial water bodies, a true lake and a true river, merely modified to a limited extent by accidental entrance of the sea. Remove the sea and they remain intact. Hamilton Inlet is a marine water body, a true arm of the sea, dependent on the sea for its very existence. Remove the sea and it disappears entirely. The point where the true sea inlet ends and the Hamilton River system begins is thus clearly indicated. It is at the inner end of the disappearing bay, at Tikoralak Head." That is the substance of what he says.

4 P

p. 636

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I see the Admiralty cartographers call the whole thing Hamilton Inlet.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : " Lake Melville " is written by the Admiralty cartographers across the lake.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : And " Hamilton Inlet " is written along the edge of it.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is quite true, my Lord. But the sheet of water itself is called " Lake Melville."

The LORD CHANCELLOR : But the whole thing, including what you admit to be an estuary, is called " Hamilton Inlet."

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is quite true. It is written along the top of it.

Viscount HALDANE : Professor Johnson goes on the principle that if you remove the sea the lake would be there just the same ; but if you remove the sea the Inlet will not be there.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is rather a good test, because if it is a lake it will still be there although there is no sea. Supposing you lower the level of the sea, then Lake Melville will still be there, though the water would have a longer fall before reaching the sea. I gather from the description here that this is one of those basins of erosion that have been scooped out from an old river valley by the passage of the water, and it has made one of those expansions which are so common a feature in river basins.

4 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount Finlay.

Lord WARRINGTON : It is very much deeper than the falls leading into and out of it. I notice it is 100 fathoms in one place.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is clue to the gouging action.

Lord WARRINGTON : Take away the sea and you would still have a lot of water there.

Mr. MACMILLAN : You would have big pools of water. A very good example is Loch Morar on the west coast of Scotland. That is one of the deepest holes in the British Isles, and it is only separated from the sea by a little ridge of about half-a-mile or a mile. It happens to be one of the best fishing places I know. Therefore you have far deeper holes in the fresh water of Loch Morar than in the sea outside.

p. 637

Viscount FINLAY : Not far from Edinburgh there is a quarry adjoining the sea, and I think about some 50 years ago the barrier separating that quarry from the sea was broken through in a storm, and ever since that time, at least for a long time, the tide used to run into the basin of the quarry. I do not know whether it is now annexed as part of the sea, or whether anything has been done by way of turning the sea out.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is near Granton, where the stone came from for the building of Edinburgh.

Viscount FINLAY : Craig Leith Quarry. Do you happen to know whether that has happened to be annexed as an inlet of the sea ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, my Lord.

Viscount HALDANE : Craig Leith Quarry is a long way from the place where stone came from for the building of Edinburgh.

Mr. MACMILLAN : But I think a lot of the old stone came from there.

Viscount FINLAY : The storm broke down the barrier, and the tide rose and fell in there.

Mr. MACMILLAN : There are numerous examples in Scotland. There is one close to Inverary Castle, which my Lord may remember, called the Dhu Loch. It has a little stream connecting it with the sea, and you can row up it at high tide.

Lord SUMNER : Have you any examples in Lancashire ?

4 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN: I have not. I am afraid that is my misfortune.

Lord SUMNER : Perhaps Lancashire does not have these things.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is less likely to have them because it has not a coast of the same indented type. This gentleman has considered all the various data which have been put before him, and he says : Having all these in view, it partakes of the character of an inland lake rather than of a branch of the sea. In doing so he has had before him a considerable amount of information. May I try and vouch one or two of the important data. First of all, take the question of the slope of water. That matter is investigated by several scientific gentleman. At Volume V, page 2319, you have a report by the Chief Hydrographer of Canada. He tells us he was stationed there and made certain gauges and that these were under observation for a long time. At page 2320 he says : “ At Lake Melville, as an average, high water occurred 3 hours 33 minutes and low water 3 hours later that at Leslie Point, showing a considerable retardation in the progress of the tidal wave for so short a distance, the channel between these two points is deep and extends nearly the whole width of the inlet, so that this retardation cannot be ascribed to friction against a rapidly rising bed. Mean tide level, obtained at each gauge location, from over 2,800 simultaneous half-hourly readings, shows a mean tide level slope of 419 of a foot, or 5 inches, between the Lake Melville and the Lester Point gauges. At each instant of time there is a definite slope of the surface of the water between the two gauge points. The mean slope was calculated at springs and neaps and showed that at springs the outgoing mean slope was 40 per cent. At neaps when there is less influx from the sea, the difference is still more pronounced ; the outgoing slope being being double or 8 inches more than the incoming slope, with three hours more duration. The inference to be drawn from this is that on the ebb there is a considerably greater volume of water discharging through the Narrows than can be accounted for by the influx of flood tide.” There are certain diagrams in our Atlas. We show there the slope in the Hamilton, Ottawa, St. Lawrence, and Hudson Rivers. The vertical scale is exaggerated. It is No. 14 in the Canadian Atlas. The top one shows the slope between Lake Melville and Hamilton Inlet, using Hamilton Inlet as the sea. These are cross sections on two scales. The horizontal scale is, of course, different from the vertical scale. The horizontal scale is six and two-third miles to an inch, and the vertical one, one foot to an inch. The top one shows diagrammatically the Hamilton River slope and fall. Then we have given one or two illustrations of other rivers. If you take the St. Lawrence between Kingston and Prescott you see the amount of fall there on the same scale, and the Ottawa River from Ottawa to Grenville, and the River St. Lawrence, Quebec to Tadousac, and the Hudson River, Albany to New York, all to show the extent of fall on established rivers as compared with the fall which we have ascertained to exist between these two points in the River Hamilton before it reaches the sea.

Lord WARRINGTON : Where the slope comes down in this diagram that is the Rigolet Lester Point.

Mr. MACMILLAN : The back way is not quite clear, because the gauge was not put exactly at the same point. The gauges were so placed by these hydrographers as to ascertain as well as they could whether there was a difference of fall between Lake Melville and the sea outside, in the bay. That was the result, and they ascertained as the result of 2,800 half-hourly readings that they got a difference of fall which compares, as you see on that series of sections, with the slope of certain well known rivers.

p. 639

Mr. Montgomery at page 2324 tells us that he took part in this work : “ he definite object of these operations was to ascertain by direct measurement whether Lake Melville was above mean sea level, To determine the exact elevation of Lake Melville on mean sea datum was not attempted. Time was not sufficient, nor did the purpose that actuated this expedition require this more exact information.” After telling you what he did, he satisfied himself that there was a difference oi[sic] elevation. Mr. Jones, at page 2333, also tells us of his participation in this task, and after giving you the data upon which he proceeds he says at line 18 : “ From the foregoing facts regarding the current, its strength and duration of flow in the two directions, it is evident that the mean level of the water in Lake Melvillo must be appreciably above the mean sea level.” The first element there[sic] of slope or fall, with its necessary concomitant of current, is established. Would your Lordship look at Dawson in Volume V, page 2320, for a very useful summary. This is a paper by Dr. W. Bell Dawson. I think I shall read the whole of this, because it is only to pages, and it is a useful summary. I should explain his qualifications ; he is Superintendent of Tidal and Current Survey, Canada, and is a Doctor of Science, and so on. “ The Hamilton River enters a large Lake (Lake Melville) which in turn connects with the ocean through the narrows at Rigolet. The lake is practically fresh water at the surface, although sea water at the freezing temperature penetrates below this, at the greater depths. Regarding the Rigolet Narrows, and the bay opening eastward from them towards the ocean, the question from the physical standpoint is whether they resemble an ordinary inlet of the sea, or show the characteristics of an estuary or river mouth, as indicated by the tidal conditions. (I) In an ordinary estuary the rise of the tide increases until the tidal undulation reaches the mouth of the river proper, when the rise begins to be cut off and decreased by the river slope. In the case of Hamilton Inlet, our investigations show that in the outer bay with shores which converge from the open ocean towards the Narrows, the tide maintains the same rise from Indian Harbour at the mouth of this bay, almost to the Narrows ; notwithstanding the inflow into the large expanse of Lake Melville. This indicates a resemblance between the outer bay east of the Narrows, and an ordinary estuary. The tendency of the tide to increase its range in its progress up the bay, is counteracted by the inflow during the rise into the immense expanse immediately within the Narrows. The estuary conditions in this respect thus manifest themselves as far as the configuration permits ; for the tide is able to maintain its full range to the head of the bay (at Ticoralak Island) notwithstanding the adverse influence of the inflow through the Narrows. In Lake Melville itself, the rise of the tide falls to a small amount, as may naturally be expected in the circumstances. (II) It is usual in river mouths for the sea water to find its way along the bottom, especially during the rise of the tide ; whereas the fresher water of the river itself keeps to the surface. When the tide begins to rise, there is thus inflow along the bottom while the surface flow is still outward; and it takes some time before the surface flow is checked and reversed.

When the tide is falling, the undercurrent is the first to be checked and reversed, because of the bottom friction and its greater density. This inflow of an undercurrent of salter water in river mouths whenever the tide begins to rise, has been verified by the investigations of the Tidal Survey in St. John Harbour at the mouth of the St. John river, and in the delta”—that is, of course, the St. John in New Brunswick ; not the St. John we have been talking of so much here—“ of the Fraser River on the Pacific Coast ; and it appears to be a general feature of river mouths. This is what occurs here in the Rigolet Narrows. During the fall of the tide, the conditions are more apt to be modified, as in the case of a river in freshet as contrasted with its summer behaviour ; or as at Rigolet where there is a large expanse above the Narrows. The behaviour during the rise of the tide, however is very typical and characteristic. (III) In both estuaries and tidal rivers, the outward flow or ‘ ebb stream ’ during the fall of the tide, is stronger and continues for a longer time than the inward flow or ‘ flood stream,’ which is weaker and of shorter duration because opposed to the current of the river. As a rule, also, the vertical movement of the tide shows the same inequality between the duration of rise and the duration of fall, as the horizontal movement does. In the observations obtained by the Tidal Survey at Rigolet, special efforts were made to verify these features ; and although a steamer was not available for the work, a scow was moored in the middle of the Narrows (where much exposed) to avoid any local disturbance of the main current if nearer shore. The observations were frequently continued day and night to obtain balanced observations. A spar-buoy placed near the north side also afforded more extended observations to supplement those in mid-channel. The three features of a tidal river were thus made manifest : (1) The longer duration of the outward flow, (2) the much greater strength of the current on the ebb than on the flood, and (3) the longer period in the fall of the tide than in the rise. To make the verification complete, the observations were taken under all the various phases of tidal conditions during the lunar month. (IV) The longer duration and greater strength of the flow during the ebb than during the flood, make it clear that the average level of Lake Melville must be at a higher elevation than the average or mean tidal level of the bay to the eastward of the Rigolet Narrows. The amount of the flow is one of the surest indications of difference of level, even where a direct measurement of the difference may be difficult to determine.” My Lords, on the question of density, solidity, and temperature of the water, duration of the tidal rise and fall, and progress and amplitude of the tide undulations, Mr. Jones and Mr. Kindle give us their conclusions in passages to which I shall give references : Jones at 2331 and 2390, Kindle at 2394 and 2395, and also at 2360. The result of those gentlemen's investigations is that when compared with the sea water outside, ordinary sea water, the water content in Lake Melville is less dense, less salt, and of higher temperature.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Was your last reference right, 2360 ?

p. 641

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is a Table, I think. It was under the head of duration of tidal rise and fall. It gives you the rise and range of tide in that table at these different points. Indian Harbour is out in the sea ; Rigolet is just beyond the Narrows. These other points are further inland.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Do you say that that is part of Mr. Kindle's evidence ? Kindle begins on 2362.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It cannot be, my Lord. I thought that was one of the tables he had before him, but I may be wrong. That table was compiled by the Tidal Survey Branch of the Naval Survey, my Lord, but I think, unless my note deceives me, it must have been part of the material which Dr. Kindle had before him, although I would not like to say for certain. Dr. Dawson also, at page 3876, provides us with further information. His summary is there. His second report begins at page 3871, and he says, I think very truly, in the opening words of it : “ In the discussion of the question whether Lake Melville is an arm of the sea or part of a river system, it may be well to note at the outset that this can only be decided by considering the physical conditions which characterize the waters of true inlets and river estuaries.” Then he goes through all the features again. It is not a long report. Pages 3872 and 3873 are all very much to the purpose, and so is page 3874. He summarises the position afresh at page 3876: “ The conditions in Lake Melville and the Narrows that connect it with the ocean may be summarised as follows : The rivers that flow into Lake Melville dilute the sea water to such an extent that sea fish do not enter the lake ; the volume of the inflowing rivers is so great that it maintains the level of the lake above sea-level, and modifies the ordinary tidal action of the sea ; this higher level, together with the large river volume, causes the outflowing ebb in the Narrows to be stronger than the flood; and the point where the tide attains its maximum range is outside the Narrows, which shows that the river system extends as far as this point. The features are all those of a tidal river, as distinguished from an inlet or arm of the sea ; and accordingly the Lake Melville area may properly be considered part of the Hamilton river system, with the mouth of the river at the outer end of the Narrows.” At page 3900 Mr. Kindle collects together certain data. At line 10 he says : “ The contention of the Dominion that Lake Melville should be regarded as an expansion or widening of the Hamilton river rather than as an inlet of the sea is supported by at least four separate classes of facts. The character of the water in the lake, the physiography of the shore and outlet, the distribution of the plant life, and the character of the animal life in the water all strongly support the classification of Lake Melville as a part of the Hamilton river drainage system or as an integral part of the river. Perhaps the most satisfactory, as well as the simplest way, to decide whether Lake Melville should be classed as a part of the Hamilton river drainage system or as an inlet of the sea is to taste the water. This simple test I applied by cooking and making tea with the lake water for two days at one of my camps near McLean Point east of Goose Bay. This test happened to be made because a camp site convenient in other respects was remote from any small stream. The water was found entirely usable—a statement which certainly could not be made of the water of any true marine inlet or bay.” Then the conditions are different at different seasons. “ The physiographic considerations which lead me to consider Lake Melville a part of the Hamilton river drainage system may be briefly stated as follows :—The Hamilton river, in common with hundreds of other rivers throughout the glaciated parts of North America, has had parts of its valley transformed by glacial scour or by morainal damming into lakes during the Glacial period. One of these lakes, called Lake Winokapau, is located about 200 miles above the Narrows and has a length of 34 miles and a depth of 427 feet. Lake Melville differs from Lake Winokapau chiefly in having been formed so near the old river outlet that the tide comes in and makes it brackish. The slight width of the Narrows through which Lake Melville empties into Hamilton inlet, about one mile, and their length, approximately 12 miles, are dimensions which perfectly fit the conception of a river channel. Its junction with the head of the trumpet-shaped enbayment called Hamilton inlet appears to be the most suitable point to designate as the mouth of the river. A careful inspection of the shores of the Narrows at low tide shows that the sea weeds of various kinds, including Fucus, gradually become scarce and disappear altogether after passing the entrance to Lake Melville. The molluscan life characteristic of the intertidal zone reacts to the changed environment at the outlet of the lake in the same way. Two of the most abundant creatures in the shallow water everywhere along the Atlantic coast of Canada are a small shell called Littorina and the common barnacle. These are found on the seashore wherever it is rocky, hundreds of individuals to the square foot often being present. Both of these hardy shells grow scarce in approaching the head of the Narrows from the sea. But a few stragglers persist to the vicinity of Henrietta Island, where they completely disappear.” Henrietta Island is that island like a cork in the mouth of the lake : “ Briefly summarised, Lake Melville is a part of the inland waterway with a long narrow outlet of the river type. The water is fresh enough towards the western end to drink, and completely excludes such characteristic marine fish as the cod and the common marine creatures and plants of the intertidal zone which can be seen at low tide anywhere seawards from Rigolette.”

4 Nov., 1926.

p. 642

Mr. Macmillan.

The LORD CHANCELLOR: I see that he, like Professor Dawson, fixes upon the outlet of the Narrows as the point where the sea is.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, it is a little above. They seem to think that that is the embouchure of the river. I do not know whether it is interesting, my Lords, for you to look at one or two diagrams in that volume. If you will just turn back a page or two you will see what Dr. Dawson has to say about one or two examples of rivers, and how they go into the sea. He gives us first the Thames. That is supposed to end, as shown there. It is from the British Tide Tables ; it is after page 3876 ; it is just an inset.

p. 643

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Where does it end ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : It ends where the blue ends—Foulness. “ The Thames is considered to extend to Foulness ; and the Nore light-ship is off its mouth.” That is all taken from the British Tide Tables. Then the River Forth, the next one, is taken to extend down to the Forth Bridge ; beyond that you are in the sea. The River Shannon is shown on the next page.

Lord WARRINGTON : On the Thames the river is not considered to go down to the Nore, is it ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord.

Lord WARRINGTON: I fancy the Southend people would not agree.

Mr. MACMILLAN : These are all taken, at any rate, from the British Tide Tables. They are not prepared by us specially. For instance, if you look at the River Forth : “ The whole expanse, above the Forth Bridge, is included with the River Forth, as a part of it.” It is the Forth to where the river narrows at the bridge, and beyond that is the sea : but there is a large expanse, of course, where the water is salt above the Forth Bridge, up to Rosyth.

Viscount HALDANE : What does he say about the Tay ?

Mr. MACMILLAN: The Tay is not among our examples here. I could not say whether it is above the Tay Bridge or not. It begins to get very shoal above the Tay Bridge ; there are a great many sand-banks there. You Lordships' House had to consider the question in the Dundee Harbour cases, where the wrecks took place, some time ago. Then the Shannon. is given next ; it is not very illuminative. Then the Maas is given on the next page. There you see a great lot of tidal navigable inland water is treated as part of the River Maas. The River Amazon is on the next page and there is an enormous area of water there which is still in the River Amazon. Then the Rio Grande, on the next page, is a very curious one ; it is the sixth of the illustrations there. The Laga dos Patos is a lake running practically parallel with the sea coast, and, as you notice, communicating with it by a little neck. The Laga dos Patos is part of the Rio Grande ; the Rio Grande runs out there at that point, but of course that is affected by the tide, and that is called the Rio Grande. Then the next illustration is the James river, and then the St. Lawrence.

Mr. Macmillan.

4 Q

p. 644

Lord SUMNER : That is interesting.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord, the point there, you notice, is much higher up the river than the point that Sir John and I agreed upon this morning for the question of the rivers flowing into the St. Lawrence. For tidal purposes, or navigation purposes, you are said to be in the River St. Lawrence when you get across the line between Point des Monts and Sta. Anne des Monts.

Viscount HALDANE : Where is that ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is considerably up ; a good way up.

Lord WARRINGTON : According to that view, the Gulf of St. Lawrence extends much beyond the west end of the Isle of Anticosti ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, much. Of course, up there, although it is shown in blue, it is eminently navigable, it is thoroughly salt, and it is tidal, and yet it is the River St. Lawrence.

As to the geological features, Dr. Kindle reports on them at page 2362 in Volume V. He describes the visit that he paid. After discussing the various considerations, his conclusion, at line 20 on page 2364, is : “ that Lake Melville can be more properly regarded as a lake-like expansion of the Hamilton than as a fiord.” At line 34 he says : “ Since neither the lake nor The Narrows conforms even approximately with the definition of a fiord, The Narrows may be technically regarded as the mouth or outlet of great Hamilton river enlarged by the waters of Grand lake, Kenamu and Kenemnich rivers (which join the Hamilton north and east of Goose Bay). From the standpoint of a physiographer the term seacoast would, therefore, not be applicable beyond or southwest of the junction of The Narrows and Hamilton inlet.” Then he describes the geological features at considerable length and explains how valleys of that sort come to be made.

Viscount Finlay.

Another expression, this time by Dr. Low, describes it as the sub-marine portion of a river valley. That is at pages 2598 and 2600.

Viscount HALDANE : My criticism of all this is that it is physiographical. It does not give the naval point of view of 1763.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I appreciate the criticism ; and it is that which has made it so difficult to handle this material, because it has been so attractive a topic for these scientific gentlemen to range over.

Viscount FINLAY : The witnesses you have mentioned so far all agree to treat it as a lake and not as an inlet. What is said by the witnesses on the other side ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : The witnesses on the other side controvert practically every one of the witnesses' statements that I am giving,

They say it is a fiord and that a particular law of Canada had called it a fiord.

Lord SUMNER : I suppose they are all of equal authority ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : I suppose these experts will be introduced to your Lordship with the same prestige ; the only difference perhaps that I might point to is that they were not there and mine were.

Mr. BARRINGTON-WARD : Dr. Low was there.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Dr. Low was there, but he was one of mine.

Mr. BARRINGTON-WARD : He calls it a fiord.

Mr. MACMILLAN : He called it a fiord, and that almost put the heather on fire, because one finds then that valiant champion, Dr. Gregory, of Glasgow—a valiant expert Witness if there was one—and another of the experts, crossing swords as to what is a fiord ; they say that science has advanced so much that Dr Low's vocabulary is out of date. These are things which scientists say about each other, and with much determination. But, my Lords, there are certain facts of nature which do not alter, however much scientists may say about them ; and one of the facts of nature is that there is a flow of current at this place, that there is a predominance of fresh water on the surface, that there is an absence of marine life in this sheet of water, as I will call it, that the fauna and flora are such as you would expect to get on the shores of a lake as contrasted with a coast of the sea.

Viscount FINLAY : So that these points may be excepted from the catalogue on points on which they are in conflict with your witnesses ?

4 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Subject to this, that two botanists have fallen out very badly as to whether a particular plant is one that requires salt water or not. That has occupied a good deal of time, perhaps unnecessarily for the present purpose. But certain plants are selected as being typical of the sea coast. Every botanist, however elementary, knows that there are plants which cannot grow on the sea coast at all, there are others that can grow only on the sea coast, and there are others which tolerate both conditions.

Viscount FINLAY : They are amphibious.

Mr. MACMILLAN : They are amphibious. The best example of all, perhaps, is the ordinary sea pink which is found along the cliffs. That is found on the very tops of mountains, but it is not found in the intermediate zone, which is a very curious thing. But apart from minor controversies of that sort, the fact that the types of vegetation to be found along the banks of this sheet of water are characteristic predominantly of inland water shores rather than of a sea coast, is, I think, if I may so, established by the actual reports of those who went there and who know about these things. The cod are not to be found there. That I have thoroughly established and that perhaps is more important because it has a bearing on what my Lord Haldane has in mind : what were people thinking about in 1763? A. In 1763 people were thinking in terms of cod, as they style it, in the Newfoundland Banks. It has been judicially held in the Courts of Newfoundland that when you use the word “ fish ” you mean cod. That has been judicially found under an insurance contract; and salmon has been held not to be a fish, which is a rather remarkable decision. but it has been so held on the vernacular of Newfoundland ; and a person there has been known to say : “ If you cannot give me fish, I will take a little halibut.” That is perhaps a type of criterion that is of more importance.

I will venture to give my Lords a few references to the question of the denisons of Lake Melville. At page 2385, line 30, Dr. Kindle says : “The cod is unknown in The Narrows and the waters west of them. Cod fishing is confined to the waters adjacent to the islands in the eastern part of Hamilton Inlet. Commercial fishing in Lake Melville and the western part of Hamilton is confined to salmon fishing.”

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Is this disputed ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : I think it is, my Lord, because there is some evidence, I think, that they get rock cod in the Narrows. I do not know whether my learned friend disputes that the ordinary cod of Newfoundland is not found in Lake Melville. Perhaps I ought not to ask my friend whether he admits it or not ; at any rate I can only proceed with the evidence with regard to it. He says at page 2394: “ A consideration of the fish fauna of these waters leads to a similar conclusion The cod, which is a typical salt–water fish, is not known west of Rigolet. The caplin, which are extensively used as codfish bait are common at Rigolet, but were not seen west of Henrietta island. West of this island salmon trout are the only fish taken by the fishermen.”

4 Nov., 1926.
Lord Sumner.
Mr. Macmillan.

Lord SUMNER : On page 2385, at line 34, he says : “ The grampus whale may be seen daily near Rigolet.”

Mr. MACMILLAN : Would your Lordship just cast your eye down a few lines further. He says at line 43 : 'It will be seen from these notes that typical marine animals like the guillemot, grampus whale, and cod are unknown west of The Narrows, the cod not even extending into The Narrows.'

Lord SUMNER : I see he contradicts himself a little later. He says

p. 647

the grampus whale is unknown west of the Narrows. At any rate Rigolet and the Narrows I think are to the west of your line.

Mr. MACMILLAN : To the west of my line, but I think probably the gentleman is quite consistent. He says he sees them at Rigolet and Rigolet is in the Narrows, but he does not see them west of the Narrows.

My Lords, I was reading at page 2394: " The absence of typical marine fishes west of Henrietta Island, and the disappearance of the marine intertidal fauna in that vicinity, both indicate the considerable change in the composition of the water which occurs near the eastern end of Lake Melville. West of Henrietta island the waters of Lake Melville, though somewhat saline, are too fresh to support a marine fauna in the intertidal zone." Then Mr. Jones, at page 2336, lino 38, says : " Enquiries were made with regard to the fishing of cod-fish and it was learned that occasionally, and late in the fall only, they were caught in the vicinity of Double Mer Point, presumably for food supply, and not as an industry. The strength of the current makes Fishing difficult, and it is not customary to make the attempt. Thus, one party said that three years ago cod-fish were caught here, and another said that none to his knowledge had been caught in the last five years."

Then at page 2399 is a Memorandum from the Dominion Commissioner of Fisheries on the subject : "The results which were obtained in regard to temperatures and salinities in Labrador waters, included in the work of officers of the Hydrographic Survey, during July, August and September, 1921, are sufficient to satisfy an expert Marine Biologist that the conditions existing in Lake Melville are so unfavourable for cod that neither their spawning, nor their life-development, nor their adult life would be possible in the waters referred to." Then some of the life history of the cod is given and it is agreed that the cod is a typical salt water fish.

Then Dr. Hjort, of Kristiania. at page 2403, says he has had this information before him, and this statement is put to him (line 11) " that the conditions existing in Lake Melville are so unfavourable for Cod, that neither their spawning nor their life-development, nor their adult life would be possible in the waters referred to," and he goes into the subject at great length. He is a Norwegian expert, and he says that all the conditions are such as to render these waters unsuitable for cod.

Then Dr. Grenfell, speaking more as a layman, at page 2566 says, as to the extent of fisheries up estuaries and rivers : “ The fact that cod fish are not fished commercially in fresh water precludes their being fished far up long estuaries into which flow many large rivers, such as Hamilton Inlet and Sandwich bay. The former has, besides the Hamilton, some twenty other rivers at least, while Eagle, White Bear, Dove Brook, Paradise, Muddy, and other rivers make Sandwich bay at its head of no value for cod fishing. It is safe to say that few cod fish enter Melville bay, a fact that is attested by the Eskimo cod fishery at Caravalla. This is at ‘ the Narrows,’ or only entrance to Lake Melville, and is about 20 miles inside Rigolet. They have always led me to understand that all they get are Rock cod, a fish that so far has no value for Newfoundland fishermen. They are accustomed to reject these when taken by mistake amongst the cod on the outside. That no cod fishery by Newfoundlers or Canadians, or anyone, except for rock cod by native Labrador men, further up the Hamilton Inlet than the Narrows, or ever has been, is fairly certain. At any rate, during the past 32 years I would assert with great confidence that none has been.” My Lords, the climatic conditions are entirely different also. As your Lordships are probably aware, the peculiarity of this area is that the shore is washed by the Arctic stream carrying the icebergs South from the Polar regions, and is entirely cold. The cold water, of course, passing down these shores keeps the temperature down, with consequent results on both the flora and fauna of the coastal belt ; but inland, on the other hand, there is quite luxuriant vegetation ; and one of the Reports says : It is like passing from winter to summer to pass from the coastal belt into the interior. You there get away from this cold douche of the Arctic current, and in the summer time you get very high temperatures indeed in the inner part of Labrador and very luxuriant vegetation, beautiful flowers, and altogether a very different type of climate from what you get along the cold rock-bound coast washed by these Arctic water. The sides of the shores of Lake Melville have all those pleasant attributes of an inland lake climatically when you pass from the cold outer zone into the interior and warmer zone.

Viscount HALDANE : Is Hamilton cold ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord, it is actually on the sea coast, there is no doubt about that.

Viscount HALDANE : It is cold in the same way.

Mr. MACMILLAN : The cold currents wash past there. If you come inland to the margin of Lake Melville, you there find yourself in a different climate in contrast to the outer porch, if one may so call it, of the opening into the sea. There are a great many passages dealing with the flora, and I do not know whether my Lords would be good enough to take one or two references rather than I should detain your Lordships by reading them. Flora is dealt with at page 2369, fauna at 2384, the trees at 2380, the seaweed at 2376 ; and, apparently what is regarded as very distinctive, the presence or absence of barnacles and periwinkles at page 2392. The distinctive climate is dealt with at pages 2368 and 2380, where the expression is used : “ There are the two Labradors,” the Labrador of the Coast and the Labrador of the interior ; and a very good description, which rather embodies my submission., is given by Dr. Kindle at page 2396, where he summarises the position by saying that in his estimation this sheet of water is an inland lake with direct marine connections rather than a bay or inlet of the sea. Of course, one knows that, geologically, there are lochs or lakes which have been formed by land and ultimately emerge into the sea by geological submergence ; on the other hand, you have the equally familiar phenomenon of a branch of the sea becoming an inland lake. That is well exemplified in two well-known instances—Lough Neagh in Ireland and Loch Lomond in Scotland. Lough Neagh has herrings in it which are imprisoned there and fished for, and they are descendants of the original marine herrings which were entrapped there when the geological cataclysm shut them in ; and from the deep holes in Loch Lomond they have dredged up marine zoophytes and other primitive forms of life left undisturbed from the time when there was a connection between Loch Lomond and the sea. These are the freaks of geology. This is one of those cases of an inland lake communicating with the sea rather than a branch of the sea which has been shut off by the land ; it is a sheet of water which looks to land rather than looks to sea, and flows out into the sea. These are all the factors as I submit them to your Lordships ; they are, I frankly confess, traversed, and vigorously traversed, by scientific gentlemen on the other side. I have endeavoured, without exaggerating the importance of the evidence from our side, to give your Lordships the important facts physiographically on this matter, and from the scientific aspect. As to the nomenclature, I do not know that your Lordships will attach very great importance to the nomenclature part of it.

Viscount Finlay.

Viscount FINLAY : It all depends on whether the names are rightly given.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord ; of course, the names may be said to be some indication to reflect to some extent the popular impression of the place. On this, I do not know that either my learned friend or I can get very much comfort, because in some old maps the word “ bay ” is used, and in others “ river ” is used ; but many of those maps are imperfect maps in the respect that they do not show the extent of this inland sheet of water. There is an opening shown and some of them show a larger or smaller inland sheet of water, but in some instances it is right to say that the word “ bay ” is used, and in other instances “ river.”

Viscount FINLAY : Is there any witness's evidence, which lies within reasonable compass, which summarises the point of view of those who say that this is an inlet of the sea.

Mr. MACMILLAN : If my learned friend will tell me which is his best authority, I will read his summary. Do you think Professor Gregory ; he is a very eminent person.

Mr. BARRINGTON-WARD : We would rather deal with this ourselves completely.

Mr. MACMILLAN : My learned friend would rather deal with it himself. Professor Gregory is an eminent geologist, and he thinks it is a fiard [sic].

Lord WARRINGTON: “ Fiord.”

Mr. MACMILLAN : He says “ fiord,” does he ? There is a very strenuous battle over that question between the geologists ; it probably does not matter very much what you call it, it is much more important to know what are its features. Then there is a contest about the flora, but I do not think it would be right to take up your Lordships' time at any great length upon it. I suggest that the absence of the cod fish from it, is one of the most distinctive things for our present purpose. I suggest that the ordinary surroundings of this sheet of water. if one were able to place oneself on the shores of it, would lead you to describe yourself not as being “ on the coast of Labrador,” but one would say : “ What a charming lake this is,” rather than regard it as merely a sheet of water attached to the shore. It is upon that material, as I say, that the nomenclature varies vary much, but perhaps I may just give an example or two. Take the first map of Ballin, that is in 1669, the name “ Bay Sauvage,” is applied to the present Hamilton Inlet.

Viscount FINLAY : That you would not quarrel with.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It depends on what you call “ the Hamilton Inlet. ”

Viscount FINLAY : I thought the Hamilton Inlet was separate from the Hamilton Lake.

Mr. MACMILLAN : If the expression “ Inlet ” is confined to the seaward portion, I have no objection to its being called the Bay Sauvage, if it is intended to extend on to the Lake Melville region, then I say that is an inaccurate name to apply. I am afraid these early maps are really of no use, because they do not show anything in sufficient detail. If you come to No. 7 in the Canadian Atlas, I think we there get a little more.

4 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount FINLAY : Is this called “ The Legend on the Map ? ”

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord. the nomenclature on the map. I am sorry that that map I have given you, No. 7, does not show Lake Hamilton at all, it merely shows an opening, but it calls the opening “ River Kessessaskion ” ; perhaps that is of importance as showing that that part was regarded. as the outlet of river ; it is a river month that is entered there at a point outside the Narrows.

Lord WARRINGTON : That is the sea part of it.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Ballin's map, which is perhaps important, shows

p. 651

the River Kessessaskiou as the interior waters flowing into the Bay St. Louis or Bay des Esquimeaux, ciding, Bay de Kessessaskiou ; that is perhaps one of some authority from a geographers point of view

Lord WARRINGTON : Which number is that ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is No. 19 of Canada's Atlas. Your Lordship will see in Ballin it is the entrance. Does your Lordship see River de Kessessaskiou, that is all seaward of Lake Melville, and that is what flows into the sea according to Ballin.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Where are the Narrows ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : I think the Narrows are probably at that place where you see the peninsula, and immediately upward from there is an island which is probably Henrietta Island. The drawing is very imperfect, of course.

Viscount FINLAY : After all, these are merely pictures drawn on more or less imperfect knowledge.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord.

Viscount FINLAY : We now have surveys which put beyond controversy the physical features.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is much more important, my Lord, for the purpose of assisting your Lordship, I recognise that. I do not know whether the language used by a navigator is of any interest, but the Log of H.M. Brig "Clinker," which entered the Narrows on the 13th July, 1821, as appears from the Appendix, Volume 8, page 3862, records itself as having entered the River Ivucktoke ; and the Arrowsmith in No. 29 map of Canada, applies the names "Hamilton Inlet," "Lake Melville" and "Hamilton River" for the first time, and applies them to the bodies of water now known by those names. Arrowsmith is a person who is regarded as of some authority ; and in the Admiralty Charts this body of water is described as "Lake Melville" ; but it is right to remind your Lordships, as the Lord Chancellor has reminded me, that there is marked along the whole thing "Hamilton Inlet," but the actual body of water itself is described as "Lake Melville." Now the word "Lake," of course, is not applied to arms of the sea at all, it is applied to fresh water bodies.

4 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount FINLAY : But that is a very near relation to a lake.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is, my Lord. It is regularly used. There are sea loughs on the West coast of Scotland, and in Ireland also ; but I think I am right in saying that the word “ lake ” is never applied to salt water.

4 R

p. 652

Viscount FINLAY : The term “ lough ” is sometimes applied to fresh water.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord ; but the interesting thing is that there is only one lake in Scotland, namely, Lake Monteith. That is the only one.

Viscount FINLAY : And that is a long way from the sea.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord ; but there is no other “ lake ” in Scotland. I think I am on very firm ground when I say that nobody ever describes the sea as a lake. Therefore you have here the ordinary acceptance of persons who describe this place, without any motive either one way or another, and they describe it as “ Lake Melville,” whereas all the other places on the coast are described as “ bays ” and “ inlets,” and so on—all language of a maritime character.

Viscount FINLAY : Certainly a lake is a lough in the ordinary way.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord, ordinarily it is so. It is used for both.

Viscount Finlay.

On these grounds, my submission to your Lordships is this, that the measurement inland of the depth of coast to which the jurisdiction of Newfoundland is confined, is a measurement which should be made from the coast of Labrador, and that at Lake Melville, from some place about the narrows—we think the headland of Ticoralak is the place which the evidence rather supports as being the real point of transition from river to sea—you come across from one side to the other ; and that the depth inland should be measured, not round Lake Melville, but from a line drawn across the entrance to what we call the expansion of the Hamilton River.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount HALDANE : That is, treating the Inlet as coast.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Certainly, my Lord, treating the Inlet as coast and the rest of it as the river.

4 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount FINLAY : That proceeds on the assumption that, by convention, I suppose, or by agreement, a certain strip of a certain width is to be conceded to those who have these rights on the coast.

Mr. MACMILLAN : This all assumes that my learned friend has not succeeded in establishing his right up to the height of land. If he has established that, then this question does not arise ; but if, on the other hand, your Lordships are satisfied that the coast of Labrador, as I have so frequently insisted, is a coastal strip, then your Lordships have to determine how far inland it goes. That is the question put by Lord Knutsford, how far in you are to go.

p. 653

Viscount FINLAY : As regards that, a question will arise in each case whether it falls fairly within the limits of the use of the coast.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord ; and it is upon that that I have ventured to give your Lordships some indications. I say that it is measured by the use and requirements of the fishing industry. Then I have given your Lordships the facts as to what was done in the French case, where you have an actual determination (by convention no doubt, and not actually ratified) of a quarter or half a mile. as being a sufficient amount.

Viscount FINLAY : And it would be a very convenient thing if, after a sufficient experience of the working of any system on the coast, you came to the conclusion that a particular distance was a fair distance to allow.

Mr. MACMILLAN : So far as Canada is concerned, our view would be this, that we would be quite content with any line which the Board thought would cover the maximum requirements of the fishery industry. I gave an example. I said that Newfoundland itself had selected 5 miles inland in all its recent leases ; a whole lot of them are given.

Lord Warrington.

Lord WARRINGTON: It is supposed that that boundary was made in 1763.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord WARRINGTON : That is the assumption.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is the assumption.

Lord WARRINGTON : That it was made then.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord.

Lord WARRINGTON : Then supposing it was a boundary which depended upon the necessities of the fishing industry, that would be a constantly varying boundary, because in one part of the coast there might be no necessity whatever for going more than 100 yards inland, and in another part you might have to go several miles inland, and you might be entitled to go several miles inland.

4 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That my Lord, is exactly the problem which Newfoundland had to face when it had to consider what should be the fishing zone round Newfoundland. It is the same problem as the Governor was faced with when he was told that he was to keep 200 yards or 600 yards safe for fishing. It is a question simply of what is a reasonable zone. Dr. Grenfell discusses it, and perhaps I should have read to your Lordships the passage where he says that you will find no houses along there more than 250 yards from high water mark.

Viscount FINLAY : The proper width of such a zone may vary from time.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord.

Lord Warrington.

Lord WARRINGTON : It may vary very much, too, from century to century.

Mr. MACMILLAN : And so also may the height of land.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord WARRINGTON: There are alterations in the methods and facilities of communication and so on.

Mr. MACMILLAN : And so also may the height of land vary ; not to the same extent, but it may vary, and I know of instances of that.

Lord WARRINGTON : I only mean that it may alter by the usages of mankind. You have said that the climate in the upper part is better than the climate on the shore, and it may be that the fishing population, with modern methods of communication, may be able to get up to the liner climate.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I am sure that my Lord is not less sympathetic to my view than to that of my learned friends at the moment. The height of land was also present to the minds of those people in 1763 ; but I suggest that what was more likely to be present to their minds than the height of land was the question of the necessities of the thing that they were thinking of, namely, the cod fishery.

Lord WARRINGTON : The necessities then would be very different from the necessities now.

Mr. MACMILLAN: The same thing might have been said with regard to the French rights on the shore which they got by treaty, and which they regarded as being intensely important. This was at a time when the whole attention was devoted to the question of fisheries, rather than to the question of territory. However, it is not for me to urge the matter more fully than I have done, but your Lordships appreciate the outlook.

Lord WARRINGTON: Yes.

Mr. MACMILLAN : There are two ways of looking at it, and they both imply that there was something present to the minds of those who wrote in 1763. My learned friend says that what was present in their minds was the height of land ; I say that what was present to their minds was what was necessary for the fishery.

Mr. Macmillan.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : You were referring to the leases. What is the reference to that ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is Volume V, page 2257, and it is rather interesting, because it shows how Newfoundland itself on the coast is setting about matters. That is quite important, and my learned friend, quite properly, does not use it against me as showing what is the position, but it is showing what has been done by Newfoundland in granting great concessions with regard to timber, and in every case you will notice that a reservation of land within 5 miles of the sea and main rivers is made. There are five examples given there. Therefore, I think I may say fairly enough that the Government of Newfoundland would regard five miles inland from the sea as being a sufficient reservation for any maritime purposes or any fishery purposes.

There is another reference that I may give, if your Lordship is interested in this topic. Will your Lordships please note page 2169, where there is what is called an “ Extract from report of an official visit to the coast of Labrador by the Governor of Newfoundland.” The Governor of Newfoundland went there in August, 1905, and this what he reports : “ The conservation of the forests of this Island in the interests of the fishermen is so well recognized and understood that a three mile margin is preserved for them all round the Island on all the Crown lands of the Colony.” That is on Newfoundland that they reserved a three mile line, but apparently, on the coast of Labrador, as is shown on page 2257, they practically standardised the distance of five miles as being the depth to which they might reserve their land for the purposes of the fishery and other interests.

4 Nov., 1926.
Mr. Macmillan.

Now, my Lords, I think I may conclude. The whole of my argument to your Lordships upon the main case really comes back to what is stated in comparatively brief summary in the printed case which is in your Lordships' hands. The whole of my address has been directed to supporting what is there stated in summary, and the propositions there set out. My submission upon the whole matter is this, that those who, in the year 1763, used the critical language of the Proclamation, did so having regard to fishery questions and fishery questions alone ; that they entrusted to the Governor of Newfoundland, who was a naval officer on a ship, the very proper duty of supervising the fisheries of this coast, which had now come into British hands ; that they selected him because he was a suitable person for the purpose, suitable to receive this jurisdiction ; and that what they gave him jurisdiction over was “ the coasts of Labrador,” meaning the maritime coasts of Labrador, seaward and landward ; seaward so far as necessary to patrol the fishing boats which resort there, and landward so far as necessary to enable the fishing industry to be carried on there ; and that that subject matter, the subject matter of those transactions in 1763, preserved its identity throughout the whole series of transactions in 1763, 1774, 1809 and 1825 ; and that in none of those cases was the subject matter of transaction the great green territory, twice, nay, nearly three times the size of Newfoundland, and larger than the whole area of Great Britain; and that no one ever thought that this maritime official was being entrusted with jurisdiction over that great territory of land, for the management of which he was entirely unsuited, and which was entirely unnecessary having regard to the end and purpose with which the coasts of Labrador were placed under his care and inspection.

My learned friend, Mr. Geoffrion, who is to follow me, will take up one compartment of the case principally, which your Lordships may have noticed that I have not dealt with, namely. Acts of administration on the part of Canada and Newfoundland respectively in the disputed areas. There is a great amount of material collected in these books ; I think Mr. Geoffrion will not delay your Lordship very long over it, but as my learned friend, Sir John Simon, has dealt with some of it, we have thought it proper to put before your Lordship our argument upon that matter. My learned friend, Mr. Geoffrion, also has some arguments to offer on the general case, but he will probably not detain your Lordships for very long.

MORNING SESSION.

The Lord Chancellor.

Mr. GEOFFRION : May it please your Lordships, I feel much inclined to apologise for inflicting another address upon your Lordships after all this time ; but the case is so extremely complicated with all sorts of facts and from all sorts of angles that I hope I shall be pardoned for believing that I can still offer some useful suggestions to your Lordships. I will, however, offer your Lordships one small consolation : your Lordships' Order provides for a third address on the part of Quebec. There will not be any third address. It may be that that is because my observations to your Lordships will be in the nature of a merger of the junior Dominion brief and the Quebec brief—because I was retained by Quebec specially—and also because I cannot see, and none of us can see, that there is the slightest difference between the cases. The question is whether the piece of territory that is in dispute falls into Canada or not ; and the reasons why it should fall into Canada, may and should all be given by Canada.

Mr. Geoffrion.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : It was not put to us in that way when we were asked to give leave for a third speech ; but no doubt you have reconsidered the matter since then.

Mr. GEOFFRION : If your Lordship pleases, I will cover whatever there is to be said both as Junior for Canada and in the name of Quebec ; and therefore I am instructed on behalf of Quebec to waive any privilege in that respect.

Now may it please your Lordships, my suggestion, which I think is admitted, is that this is primarily, and one might almost say exclusively, a question of construction of the relevant documents of 1763, in the light of the then existing circumstances, and with the aid, the interpretative aid, of contemporaneous interpretation ; and therefore this case must be decided upon the meaning of the words used in the proclamation, contemporaneous utterances from the King, with (to a certain extent although to a lesser degree) the interpretation given to it immediately afterwards and in the three subsequent Statutes of 1774, 1809 and 1825.

5 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Geoffrion.

I suggest that all the rest is, if not entirely, almost completely irrelevant. Your Lordships have frequently had before you what I would suggest to you is an analogous ease. Over and over again your Lordships have had to pass upon the construction of the British North America Act, as to where the Dominion had a provincial jurisdiction, and your Lordships have never been embarrassed by the construction put in Canada, or construction put by the Legislature, upon it. There are many instances where what has been confirmed and claimed by the Dominion, and acquiesced in by the Provinces for years and years, has afterwards been declared, upon the proper construction of the British North America Act, to be Federal, jurisdiction. I could give many examples of your Lordships holding, and unquestionably—it is impertinent for me to say “ properly ”; but your Lordships have held that you were there to construe a will superior to that of the Parliament, namely, the Imperial will.

Now, my Lords, if that is right as to the construction of an Imperial Act as to the division of legislative jurisdiction between Dominion and Province, is not the reasoning equally sound as regards the construction of Imperial proclamations and Statutes with regard to the territorial division between Canada and Newfoundland ?

I therefore suggest to your Lordships that the question is necessarily (and, as I say, almost exclusively) the question of what was meant in 1763, chiefly by the Proclamation (which I will come to in a moment) and, of course, what light is added by contemporaneous exposition and what light is added by subsequent Imperial legislation. If that is the case, then 90 per cent. at least of the argument of my learned friend Sir John Simon becomes irrelevant. He almost admitted it.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I hope you are not addressing that observation also to Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. GEOFFRION : I am in a difficult position my Lords, because he did what I myself shall have to do, that is to say, not assume that the points that I have made have been accepted by your Lordships, and go on answering the argument which we suggest is irrelevant. We do suggest that this is irrelevant, but we are going to answer it all the same.

Now, my Lord, if that is the case, it is important to come first of all to the Proclamation. I wish to emphasise the Proclamation, notwithstanding the interesting debate as to whether the commission is the germ, or whether the Proclamation is the germ, and for this reason, even if we do not have any decided view upon the question as to whether the germ or origin of the Newfoundland jurisdiction is the Commission or the Proclamation, I do not think it makes much difference or needs to be decided. There is one thing that is certain, and that is that the paragraph in the Proclamation is more than a mere recital : it is the first authoritative Proclamation by the King to his subjects of what he has done. There is a big difference, I suggest to your Lordships, between the recitals of what has already been promulgated, as in the preamble to a Statute referring to previous Statutes, and the first announcement by the King to his subjects that he has done something. This is his authoritative and well-considered definition of what he has done; it is his announcement to his subjects of what they should understand that he has done ; and, therefore, these words stand at least as high, if not higher, than the words of the Commission, regardless of the question of where, on the metaphysical aspect, we decide that the germ of the Newfoundland jurisdiction is to be found.

p. 662

Now, my Lords, if that is the case, then I will come to the next point, and that is as to the proper way of construing the paragraph on page 154 of Volume I, which has been so often read to your Lordships, at about line 13 or line 14. I have to apologise for the fact that I shall have to ask your Lordships to look at this text, and the text on the following page again in a few moments, although your Lordships have unquestionably looked at them often before. I suggest that the germ, and perhaps the answer to the whole question, is there. My suggestion to your Lordships is that we must in that Proclamation contrast all the time, for the purpose of construction, what the King says at page 154, line 14 : “ and to the end that the open and free fishery of our subjects,” and so on (which I will read in a moment) with what the King says on page 156 at line 23, namely, the clause respecting the Labrador coast and the clause respecting the Indian reserve ; because in this document the King says what he gave to Newfoundland and he says what he reserved to himself. We cannot easily presume that there is a conflict. Surely, what he gave he did not reserve, and what he reserved he did not give. Therefore I suggest to your Lordships that the proper atmosphere in which to approach this question is to contrast primarily—I will not say exclusively—the paragraph at line 13 on page 154, with the paragraph at line 23 on page 156. It is by contrasting those two paragraphs that we can get at the meaning of each of them. Each of them is on the same footing. One has quite as much importance as the other, and each must be construed by the other ; because what the King gave he did not reserve, and what he reserved he did not give. Now, with your Lordships' permission, I will read, perhaps for the twentieth time, the passage on page 154 at line 14. It says this : “ And to the end that the open and free fishery of our subjects may be extended to and carried on upon the coast of Labrador, and the adjacent islands, we have thought fit, with the advice of our said Privy Council, to put all that coast”—I desire to emphasise the word “ that ” for the moment ; I will come to it later—“ from the River St. John to Hudson's Streights, together with the islands of Anticosti and the Madelaine, and all other smaller islands lying upon the said coast, under the care and inspection of our Governor of Newfoundland.” Now, my Lords, the first point that strikes one is that the word “ coast ” is used. The case on behalf of Newfoundland may be stated, brutally, in this way : “ Coast means watershed.” That must be their case, upon the main point.

5 Nov., 1926.
Mr. Geoffrion.

The first suggestion that occurs to one is : “ Why did not they say ‘ watershed ’ ? ” Nobody will deny that the word “ coast ” is an ambiguous word. Why did they not say “ watershed,” which was so easy for them to say ? A little earlier in the Commission they refer to the height of land, and I should suggest to your Lordships that this is rather an illustrative argument. If your Lordships will look at page 153, line 25, your Lordships will see that in giving the limits of Quebec, just a few lines before this, they say “ from whence the said line, crossing the River St. Lawrence, and the Lake Champlain in forty–five degrees of north latitude, passes along the high lands which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the said River St. Lawrence, from those which fall into the sea.” There is one thing that is noticeable. There is “ high land ” there. In the Gaspé Peninsula you have the highest land of the Province of Quebec ; you have a well known chain of mountains, a well known geographical feature, supplying a convenient political division. The Appalachian Mountains start in the Gaspé Peninsula, and they go down into South Carolina ; and there the King took the height of land as the watershed. I protest against the idea that your Lordships can find anywhere the suggestion that the watershed is the universal boundary, or the implied boundary. The watershed is the boundary when it is the convenient boundary ; a river is the boundary when it is convenient ; and when neither the watershed nor a river is convenient, they take a geographical line, as a rule. But here they take the watershed, because there was a well–marked watershed present in Gaspé, and I would point out that when they chose to take a watershed as the boundary, they said so. It seems to me to be fair to suggest that if they intended to put the watershed under the control of the Governor of Newfoundland, they might have used the expression here, namely, “ the coast from the River St. John to Hudson's Straits, or the high land that divides the rivers emptying themselves,” and so on. I would not mind the use of the word “ coast.” In the proper context you can give a meaning to the word “ coast ” ; you can give it the meaning that you want. Here the context is against my learned friend, and it narrows the meaning of the word “ coast ” instead of broadening it. I will come back later on to the meaning of the word “ coast ” ; but I would now like your Lordships to turn to the words that I desire to contrast, and to which I attach importance, on page 156, at line 23.

A good deal has been said by my learned friend, Sir John Simon, about the lakes, and things of that sort, and about the noble Iroquois, the noble Redskins, and things of that kind ; but very little has been said about the precise and special wording of this paragraph. I suggest that, logically speaking, the first thing to look at in order to find out what the King intended to reserve to himself, is what he said. Just let us see it : “ And we do further declare it to be our Royal will and pleasure, for the present as aforesaid ”—your Lordship will note that it is a temporary measure—“ to reserve under our sovereignty, protection, and dominion ”—therefore not in Newfoundland—“ for the use of the said Indians ”—we will see what they were in a moment, my Lords ; we see by the previous paragraph that they were Indians—“ all the land and territories not included within the limits of our said three new governments, or within the limits of the territory granted to the Hudson's Bay Company.”

Now, my Lords, I pause there, because I consider that the rest of it is immaterial. Your Lordships will note that, contrasting with the putting of a certain coast on which a fishery could be carried on under the care and inspection of an Admiral of a ship who is there for six months and who is made Governor, you have here the giving for the present, as a temporary measure only, until further informed, of a residuum.

I am sorry that I forgot, in respect of the other text, to suggest an argument which I think may be drawn from the use of the word “ that.” The words on page 154 are : “ all that coast.” Now, if your Lordships will look at “ that ” coast, it is the coast referred to in the second line of the paragraph. What is that coast ? It is a coast on which an open and free fishery for British subjects may be carried on. Is not that more than suggesting that the fishery is a motive, and was a purpose, or a reason ? Is not the coast that is put under the care and inspection of this Admiral, who is the Governor of Newfoundland, a coast upon which a free and open fishery for British subjects may be carried on ? We know that the only free and open fishery that could be carried on there was a cod fishery, because the salmon fishery is not free and open. You must occupy land and monopolise a space for salmon fishery, and it is the same with whale fishery and seal fishery. But neither seal, whale nor salmon add anything to my learned friend's case, as I will show later on, because they all were at that time strictly confined to the coast.

Now, my Lords, going back to the grant to Newfoundland, I suggest that it is “ that coast ”; and therefore it is ex definitio, by the definition, a coast on which a free and open fishery of British subjects may be carried on. I respectfully suggest that this is doing more than making the fishery a motive rather than a purpose or an end, although I hardly support the argument that the purpose is material when there is ambiguity. But I go further. This is part of the definition.

Now, my Lords, going back to the Indian question, I want to point out that it is a residuum. The attitude of the King is very easily understood. They must have assumed that the information as to that territory and the Indian situation was very incomplete ; and, historically, we know that at that time the Pontiac rebellion had broken out and the Indians were giving trouble.

5 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Viscount FINLAY : What rebellion is that ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : The Pontiac rebellion. The Pontiac was a chief who almost, immediately after the English conquest started rebelling in the west.

Viscount FINLAY : In the west ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes, around the great lakes. I will point out to your Lordships later on that in a petition to Governor Murray, it was affirmed that the Montagnais were probably the only people who remained loyal to the British Crown at that stage. But that is another branch of the case. I am only pointing out now the probable reasons why the King did not limit his reservation to the land around the great lakes, or to any particular ground, and did not even make his reservation depend upon whether it was hunting ground of the Indians, or whether they were under his protection. The King, I presume, after

p. 665

Lord Warrington.

due consideration, took words entirely different from those which my learned friend Sir John Simon found when he looked for them elsewhere than in the material documents. The King used words that he wanted to be over-cautious by reserving too much rather than not enough, and by reserving a residuum subject to certain well-defined exceptions. The reason is obvious : his reservation was “ for the present as aforesaid,” which, referring to the previous paragraph, means for the present and until our further pleasure be known. That is line 17. Therefore it is not a decision of what he will do, but it is a keeping back to consider a situation, a keeping back to consider a situation to reserve a residuum, which implies that he purposely used the broadest language possible, and he did it, my Lords, because any wise governor would do it if he was really inclined, for humanitarian, political, and legal reasons. There were legal duties towards these Indians, I think, under international law ; there were political reasons in not irritating them ; and there were humanitarian reasons in not harming them. Therefore, not being peculiarly interested in giving hundreds of miles of hinterland for cod or whale fishery, he reserved it in the broadest terms, being sure that he could always undo it, and announcing that he could always undo it. He wanted to be over-cautious and that is the reason why he reserved everything in sight. He did not wait to enquire.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Lord WARRINGTON : But how far do you say it goes, because you see, read literally, the whole of Newfoundland itself, and the coast, whatever is meant by that, is not included in the limits of the three new governments, or the limits of the Hudson's Bay territory.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Your Lordship appreciates that islands are clearly excluded. There are no Indians on the islands.

Lord WARRINGTON : But, reading these words quite literally, they would include everything not in the three governments or in the Hudson's Bay territory.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes, my Lord.

5 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Lord WARRINGTON : I only want to know how far you go.

Mr. GEOFFRION : The objection—we use the word “ objection,” but I do not know whether it is the proper word—the difficulty suggested by your Lordship is one that I intended to answer later on, but I will deal with it now. The suggestion made involves both Newfoundland proper and the coast. As regards Newfoundland proper, I think it can be disposed of in this way : there is no dealing with islands in this part, and the reason is that it does not except Grenada, the fourth government, which was an island. There could be no question of taking care of the islands, because nobody suggested that there was any Indian problem in respect of the islands. The difficulty, however, remains, I confess.

The Lord Chancellor.

My learned friend suggests to me another excellent answer, namely,

p. 666

Mr. Geoffrion.

that what he is dealing with is “ the security of our Colonies.”—That is line 8 :—“ and that the several nations or tribes of Indians with whom we are concerned, and who live under our protection. should not be molested or disturbed.” Therefore, again, Newfoundland not being a colony at that time—on the contrary, it was a fishery—a temporary fishery was the only object, and not a plantation. and therefore there would be no reason to except it. But the island idea is out of it, and that is, I suggest, clearly demonstrated by two factors : first, that there is no Indian population there ; and second, that Grenada, which is the fourth government, is not mentioned, because in that case it was too clear. Nobody could conceive or imagine that Grenada would be involved. But the objection remains for the coast.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Do you say that the whole of Labrador was reserved, and that no territory was granted to Newfoundland on Labrador ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : I was only trying to meet the island part of the difficulty. Now I must meet the coast part of the difficulty. All that I have to say as to islands is that the islands are clearly excluded ; but I have not yet eliminated the difficulty, and I will now try to do so. In that respect I have two distinct answers. The first answer is : If we are right in our view, then at that stage there was a jurisdiction given, and that is all. We spoke of easements and proprietary rights and territory, and so on, but there was a jurisdiction given of an extremely limited nature, on such part only on the coast as was necessary for the fisherman to land, dry their fish, cut a few trees to make necessary repairs, and so on. It was such a coast as, for example, was given to the French in Newfoundland at the same time—a matter upon which I want to dwell later on—and there can be no conceivable curtailment of any imaginable hunting ground. The Iroquois had been allies of the English for centuries, and the English were fairly informed of the situation ; and there is no conceivable conflict between the use of any coast for fishing

5 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Geoffrion.

The Lord Chancellor.

and the use of the territory for hunting, because these Indians hunted fur animals in the thick forest where they must live. These Indians are not seal hunters ; they are fur animal hunters in the hinterland ; and your Lordships have literature before you, which I will not read again, showing that the big divide was between that barren, cold coast, and the comparatively warm hinterland, between the Esquimaux sea dweller and the Red Indian hinterland dweller, which I might amplify by pointing out that the boats of the Esquimaux were fitted for the sea and not for inland rivers, while the boats of the Indians were fitted for the inland rivers and not for the sea. I think your Lordships have appreciated that ; and therefore, there was a clear distinction between that coast (which as we know was inhabited by Esquimaux, but which was reserved exclusively for fishing purposes, for salt water or sea-fishing purposes), and the hunting grounds of the Indians, and no one could any more conceive that there was an

p. 667

infringement on the hunting territories of the Indians if that alone was reserved, then he could conceive that there was an infringement of the hunting grounds of the Indians by not including Grenada, which is left without special mention. If it goes to the watershed any Government with any sort of caution would have said : Well that may very well be, and any Governor with General Murray's report before him would have said there probably is a large hunting ground there of people which I am affecting.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : You mean “ all the land and territories ” means all the land and territories used as hunting grounds, or are capable.

Mr. GEOFFRION : That might be possibly used.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Capable of being used as hunting grounds.

Mr. GEOFFRION : It may be.

Viscount FINLAY : In what line is that ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : Lines 23, 24, and 25, the King reserves “ for the present as a-foresaid ”—which means for the present and until—“ our further pleasure.” Then comes : “ All land and territories not included within ” certain limits. I am possibly over-cautious, but the form I prefer to that suggested is anything that might possibly turn out to be needed for the Indians was reserved, and of course there was no use except the fishing coast we suggest, which was in their minds, because there is no conceivable conflict in that respect. As regards Newfoundland my learned friend Mr. Macmillan suggests to me another point. It comes in a branch of the subject I intend to treat, it is that this Proclamation deals here with lands ceded or confirmed to the King by the Treaty of Paris, and that was not Newfoundland ; but that adds an argument for the exclusion of the Island to the argument in respect of Grenada. I quite appreciate that is not the biggest difficulty, the coast is the biggest difficulty.

Mr. Geoffrion.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : There must be an implied exception of whatever had been granted.

Mr. GEOFFRION : My first argument is we are dealing with intentions not with mathematics, it is much more easy to presume that the King would not think worth while mentioning an extremely narrow strip that could not in any way under any view be a hunting ground.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Do you mean there is an implied exception of that territory whatever it is ?

p. 668

Mr. GEOFFRION : I think I must concede there is an implied exception. In dealing with intention is not the tremendous significance, or the absolute insignificance of the exception valuable in other words, do not I diminish the argument to fading point according to the principle that if you take grains of sands away from a pile you would only have one grain left. I think it is a very important consideration when dealing with intention, it is far more easy if you paint the picture of what the King is trying to do, taking care of the Indian problem, saying I am not yet informed, I refuse to deal with it now, I am thinking about it, I would rather reserve too much than grant too much and have to cancel my grant, therefore I am going to make a sweeping reservation. Is not it more easy to presume that he overlooked a bare fishing coast particularly with Murray's report before him, than to presume he overlooked the whole hinterland north of Quebec, because the Hudson's Bay Company being excluded, on my learned friend, Sir John Simon's view, there was nothing north of Quebec.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : There is something north of Quebec.

Mr. GEOFFRION : The yellow, yes, but my learned friend, Sir John Simon, cannot say that, because I remember his distinctly saying this line was drawn to approximate to the height of land ; my learned friend must try and make his arguments consistent, because he has not always succeeded ; it is pardonable, perhaps I may not do it either.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : This map shows the corridor.

Mr. GEOFFRION : I am going to deal with the corridor question later on.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : He has said in his sketch that there is such a corridor.

Mr. GEOFFRION : He suggested in his argument, I could give your Lordship the page, in the view of the framers of the Proclamation they probably thought this straight line from the head of the St. John River would be fairly close to the hinterland, and as a matter of fact the Lords of Trade on which he relies preferably to the King, on whose words he relies preferably to the words of the Proclamation—the Lords of Trade do not suggest that straight line, they suggest the height of land so in their minds there was no corridor. We have no enlightenment very much on that. At all events I will rather leave the corridor aside because I think later on that can be answered.

I am trying, to deal now with the allegation based on the in that I must admit front the point of view of Land Surveyors and lawyers looking at this with a microscope that there should be an additional exception. I am trying to suggest as bearing on the probable intention of the, King that that was such an obvious and such an insignificant exception that it was not worth mentioning specially, and it might be overlooked, while if the hinterland goes with the rest extending to Hudson's Bay boundary, then, of course, it is quite different. I have another answer, this drags me into another argument, I am following the objections rather than my own plan. It is this, that is a clear case illustrative of the case we are treating with, the Hudson's Bay problem. This brings me on to the Hudson's Bay question. I suppose I can start with this, nothing is clearer than this, there could be no intention to affect the Hudson's Bay Company's rights ; the Hudson's Bay Company's rights were both Governmental and proprietary, it was a proprietary Government, therefore while the King might more easily be persuaded to restrict the commission to a Governor he could not be so easily persuaded to curtail the proprietary rights of a Company. If it was necessary I would show your Lordships how careful he is as regards the Hudson's Bay Company in this very paragraph I am dealing with. I could show your Lordships how the Government was always careful in other instances of the Hudson's Bay Company, when they give a grant to Agnew, I will not refer your Lordships to the documents, your Lordships probably remember them, when a grant was made to Agnew a few years after, the Hudson's Bay Company is excepted, when these traders in 1752 tried to get all the Atlantic lands between Cape Chidley and Belle Isle Straits and though they got a favourable report from the Lords of Trade they never got the grant. There was a good deal of reading by my learned friend, Sir John Simon, of the Report of the Lords of Trade favourable to the grant, but the grant was never made for some reason or another. There again the Lords of Trade in recommending the grant reserved the rights of the Hudson's Bay Company. I can give your Lordships the reference, but I will assume your Lordships will not doubt, unless it is argued against it, there could be no intention of affecting the rights of the Hudson's Bay Company. I hate to talk to your Lordships of precedents where they have always done it, but it is a very significant point here there is no reservation in the grant to Newfoundland of the Hudson's Bay Company's rights. I want to emphasise the point made by my learned friend, Mr. Macmillan, that at that time there was no suggestion of the heights of land being the limits of the Hudson's Bay Company's rights. It is worse for my learned friend, Sir John Simon's argument, there was a definite persistent suggestion of another line, the suggestion of Grimington Island, a line to be drawn from there south westward to Lake Miscosincke down to the 49th parallel, and then going west along the 49th parallel, a line essentially different from the height of land line, in every way ignoring it, which was first made by the Hudson's Bay Company to the Government after the Treaty of Utrecht in view of the delimitation that took place between the French and the Hudson Bay Company's interests under that Treaty and was renewed in 1759 in view of this Treaty. If your Lordships will look at Volume VIII, page 4104, the letter begins at page 4103, it is a memorial of the Hudson's Bay Company of the 6th December, 1759. Your Lordships know the Battle of the Plains of Abraham between Wolfe and Montcalm had been fought then. The letter is addressed to the Lords of Trade it opens : “ May it please your Lordships. In prospect of an approaching Treaty of Peace between this nation and France.” Then at line 23 on page 4104 they say : “ That the papers which were laid before the said Commissarys and the Minutes of their proceedings as also a Memorial relative to this matter which in the year 1750 after the Conclusion of the last war was presented to your Lordships remaining as your Memorialists believe in your Lordships Office it is conceived from thence will appear the best state of the rights of both Crowns and of the Territories and claims of the said Company that can be laid before your Lordships, whereto your Memorialists beg leave to refer.” Now the Memorial is at page 4093, it is the 1750 Memorial as they call it, and it begins by quoting the grant. Then the last line of the page : “ Comprised as your Memorialists conceive ”—they are going to give the definition—“ in the said Grant are as follows, that is to say— all the lands lying on the East side or coast of the said Bay, and extending from the Bay eastward to the Atlantick ocean,” and so on and so on. “ And towards the North all the lands that lye at the northend or on the north side or coast of the said Bay and extending from the Bay northward to the utmost limits of the land there towards the North Pole but where or how those lands terminated is hitherto unknown—And towards the west all the lands that lye on the West side or coast of the said Bay,” and towards the south, line 13, this is where I wanted. Lord Sumner may remember he asked during the argument, what was meant by the south boundary of the Hudson's Bay Company, “ And towards the south all the lands that lye at the south end or south side of coast of the said Bay the extent of which lands towards the south to be limited and divided from the places appertaining to the French in those parts by a line to be drawn for that purpose to begin from the Atlantic Ocean on the east side at an island called Grimington's Island otherwise Cape Perdrix in the latitude of $59\frac{1}{2}^{\circ}$ on the Labrador coast and to be drawn from thence Southwestward to the great Lake Miscosinke otherwise called Mistiness, and through the same dividing that Lake into two parts down to the 49th Degree of North Latitude, as described in the said map or plan delivered herewith, and from thence to be continued by a meridian line of the said latitude of 49° Westwards.”

p. 670

Viscount HALDANE : Where is Mistoseny ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : It is the great lake Miscosinke which is now known as lake Mistoseny.

Viscount HALDANE : On the general map is Mistassini then the same lake ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes, exactly, if you will look at this map you will find Grimmington then a straight line to Mistassini, the middle of it. Any map will do, because this map is geographically accurate.

p. 671

The LORD CHANCELLOR : It was never more than a proposed line, as it is called on that map.

Mr. GEOFFRION : My argument is that it is a proposed line that was never accepted, but it was semi-endorsed,—I use the word advisedly,—by being made the basis of the negotiations by the Plenipotentiaries of England after the Treaty of Utrecht for a settlement. I am leaving aside the line further south, the Davis Inlet, of which your Lordships have heard, which was proposed as the trading line, but the line these Plenipotentiaries were told to propose was the Grimmington Island line. There is this in it, while it was not binding on the Crown, it has certainly not been condemned by the Crown. It had a sort of quasi endorsement because if the Crown had obtained it under the Treaty of Utrecht, it would automatically have been the Hudson's Bay Company's land. The Crown could never have argued that what they could get from France after the Treaty of Utrecht was not Hudson's Bay Company's, since the Treaty of Utrecht provided there will be a line between the Hudson's Bay lands and the French lands, and therefore, everything England claimed under the Treaty of Utrecht was to be Hudson's Bay lands, it was only Hudson's Bay lands claimed.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Is this after the Treaty ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes, I am saying this land, therefore, got a semi-official endorsement from England by being taken as the land they were to get. It is only semi-official, it is not binding, I admit, but it shows this, there was a line which is consistent, it was the only claim of the Hudson's Bay Company from 1712 down to 1763, and it apparently remained, as far as we can see, its claims until 1814. I will explain to your Lordships why, in 1814, they thought of a new line. The Northwest had been discovered, and the new line went to the Rocky Mountains, that is why, it was an idea of genius to suggest the height of land, but in 1759, 1763 and after 1763, since 1712, there had never been a suggestion of the heights of land as the boundary of the Hudson's Bay Company by the Government or by the Hudson's Bay Company. The only suggestion made and consistently made from 1712 to 1759 was this line from Cape Grimington, persisted in consistently, and apparently not abandoned until we reach 1814, when the discovery was made that the watershed of Hudson's Bay went to the Rocky Mountains, which put new ideas into the heads of the Hudson's Bay Company. At that time your Lordships will note the Westward boundary was insignificant ; they said 49 degrees westwards, they did not care where that stopped. That line is not a line which the King in dealing with Newfoundland for a fishery purpose would have treated as certainly preposterous and condemned. I do not say he admitted it, but he would not have condemned it. It was no function of his nor any desire of his to decide ; I throw that line to the winds and I choose own accord Cape Chidley.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : What are you arguing, are you arguing that nothing was granted to Newfoundland north of that line ?

Mr. Geoffrion.

Mr. GEOFFRION : No, nothing could really affect even the trading right of the Hudson's Bay Company, nothing was granted to Newfoundland that could really be construed as affecting the substantial trading rights of the Hudson's Bay Company by going to Cape Chidley, although it was going north of what was a known claim and a not disallowed claim of the Hudson's Bay Company.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : The Hudson's Bay Company had more than trading rights, they had the land, they had a grant of the land within their territory.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Certainly.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : It is difficult to conceive if the Crown had considered that the Hudson's Bay Company's rights came down to Grimington Island they could have granted to Newfoundland the whole coast up to Cape Chidley ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : Quite.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : You are not asking us to say that Newfoundland has nothing ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : No, I am simply suggesting it throws tremendous light on the suggestion that what they were given was something which really could not prejudice the Hudson's Bay Company. There is no other way out, because I do not think it can be suggested that they intended to condemn the Grimington line irrevocably. There is nothing to suggest it, not a word, they were not dealing with that. They do not show any evidence of wanting to do that even in 1774, when Agnew in 1774 asked for a grant up to Cape Chidley but adding 60 miles deep for hunting and mining, they say that means mining rights have been granted to Newfoundland. I think it is useful to refer to that in Volume III at page 1080; if you will look at pages 1080 and 1081, your Lordships will see that what was done there with the Agnew grant. It has been referred to, your Lordships, and your Lordships have noted it before ; it has been referred to several times. Would your Lordships note about line 25, on page 1080 : “ so, on the other hand, by extending the Grant Northward to Hudson's Streights, they will take in a very large part of what has been already granted to the Hudson's Bay Company, who are entitled by their Charter to all Alines and Minerals, within the Territories granted to them.” It was a claim for mining rights 60 miles from the coast by extending it northward, not by extending it in depth 60 miles, and then if your Lordships look at page 1081, line 27, the Grant is : “ and upon the coast of Labrador, between the River St. John's, and the southern limits of the territory granted to the Hudson's Bay Company.” Your Lordships will notice they are dealing with the coast line there between the River St. John and the southern limits of the territory.

p. 673

Mr. Geoffrion.

Lord Warrington.

Lord WARRINGTON : Mr. Geoffrion, surely if there is one thing clear it is that on the east coast of Labrador up to that top point from Hudson's Bay Straits, the Hudson's Bay Company had no interest in the coast from Hudson's Bay Straits southwards. It there is one thing clear it is that.

Mr. GEOFFRION : It is clear on the words of to-day.

Lord WARRINGTON : No, it is clear on the Commission, the Proclamation, and everything else.

Mr. GEOFFRION : No.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Lord WARRINGTON : From Hudson's Straits, there was no interest of the Hudson's Bay Company.

Mr. GEOFFRION : I am suggesting that was not the view then. I am not concerned with what is the considered view of Judges or lawyers to-day, I am considering what was the expressed view then and that is why I am emphasising the claims of the Hudson's Bay Company at the time, and the way they were dealt with.

Lord WARRINGTON : But surely what was included in Captain Graves' Commission was all the coasts of Labrador, whatever " coasts " means, from the entrance of Hudson's Straits to the River St. John.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes, I did not put my argument clearly.

Lord WARRINGTON : It was not intended to interfere in any way with the Hudson's Bay Company.

Mr. GEOFFRION : I am suggesting that if it only means the fishing coast there is no interference, or such a very insignificant, unsubstantial one, since the Hudson's Bay Company were not in the fishing business, that it may be conceived the King would not have bothered, but that whenever there was a suggestion of a grant up to Cape Chidley, which clearly did involve going inland, the rights of the Hudson's Bay Company were expressly protected.

My argument is this, that whenever there has been a grant suggested or a grant made that went up to Cape Chidley and that went inland, the rights of the Hudson's Bay Company have always been expressly protected. Therefore, if there had been an intent to grant any—thing here inland, the rights of the Hudson's Bay Company would have been protected, but I suggest while it is not mathematically accurate, as I admit, as in the case of the Indians, so in this case, the King may have thought by merely granting that fishing jurisdiction,—because it is a fishing jurisdiction, it is not a grant of territory, he was not interfering enough either with the hunting rights of the Indians or with the trading rights of the Hudson's Bay Company to give any attention to it. Your Lordships have my argument in a nutshell. It cannot be challenged, I am trying to save quotation, I do not think it can be challenged, that from 1712 to 1759, in view of this Treaty, the Hudson's Bay Company made one claim, and but one claim, and had made none before except to coast posts under the Treaty of Ryswick, and one claim and no other claim, that claim was Grimington Island towards Mistoseny to the 49th degree, no western limit because the west was nothing then.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Lord Warrington.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Lord SUMNER : Did I catch you to say just now that the effect of the Proclamation of 1763 as regards the coast of Labrador is the grant not of territory but only of fishing jurisdiction.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes, that would be my point.

Lord SUMNER : If that is the point, I thought it had been conceded all through that, however narrow the strip of grant uniformly laid out along the sea coast, there was a grant of territory whether it was revocable or not.

Mr. GEOFFRION : I will try to explain, there was no contradiction in my mind, I take it the grant to a Governor is nothing but a grant of jurisdiction. The jurisdiction has developed to-day, and Newfoundland has become a self-governing colony.

5 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Lord SUMNER : I follow if you mean the grant to a Governor.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : It is not only to-day but the Acts of 1774 and 1809.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Annexed to the Government.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : And 1825, they all talk there of territory, of annexing and re-annexing.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes, by talking of annexing territories to the Government of Newfoundland what I mean is the territory remains in the King ; and the jurisdiction, more or less broad, is given to the Government. There is no doubt for practical purposes we may call it territory to-day, now these Colonies are self-governing, but there is no doubt, that the King of England had quite a considerable jurisdiction within the same jurisdiction as that given to the Governor. It was at that day a fishing jurisdiction over a certain territory, that has evolved into the jurisdiction of a self-governing Colony over the same territory, there has always been a territory involved, but that territory was always in the King, and is still in the King, but a fishing jurisdiction was first given over that territory in those days, and was a very narrow one if you look at the instructions, and now a complete self-government jurisdiction is given to that Government. That is the evolution, the evolution has gradually taken away the appearance of what is a sort of jurisdictional easement, if I can use the word, and converted it into what is a sort of proprietorship, but in reality it is only an extended jurisdiction front that of fishing controller, because that is all the Governor of Newfoundland was, to that of a self-governing country ; that is a representative instance. It is on the same territory all the time, therefore we are concerned in order to know what territory Newfoundland has, to find out on what territory that Government got a fishing jurisdiction.

I suggest there is no other way of conciliating these two documents, and the words about the Indians and the words about the Hudson's Bay Company ; there is no other way of conciliating them, except the way I suggest, that the fishing jurisdiction granted by that Council was so limited to fishing—and there are instructions there showing it was fishing and nothing else—this Governor had no jurisdiction to do anything in the hinterland by the things he is told to do ; he is given only fishing jurisdiction—I am not speaking of the Instructions to inquire into the facilities for trade and conciliating Indians, which is rather a fishing jurisdiction, because it was to secure the coast to the fishermen, but he is given a limited jurisdiction for fishing purposes on the coast, and in that view it is easily conceivable that the King would have thought that he was not interfering, except in a theoretical way, with the trading rights of the Hudson's Bay Company, or with the hunting rights of the Indians. He was theoretically interfering with those rights, but not practically ; but if he gave jurisdiction to the height of land he was very materially interfering with the Hudson's Bay claims unless their claims were to be disallowed immediately, and he was very materially interfering with the Indian Reserves, and perchance, a thing which he must have supposed, in view of Murray's report, and which undoubtedly was a possibility in his eyes, with the possible hunting rights of the Indians there, I suggest that in the principle de minimis non curat lex—it might be de minimis non curat rex—I get at the applicable principle to the interference—that the right is so insignificant that one can easily understand the King overlooking it ; but the interference is so substantial both as regards the Hudson's Bay Company and the Indian that it cannot be suggested that it has been overlooked in the case of Newfoundland—I hope your Lordships will excuse my elaborating it ; I want to suggest that I cannot concede the proposition that there is nothing more clear than that the height of land, or Cape Chidley, was the Newfoundland limit. The documents, on that point are conclusive : I gave your Lordships Volume VIII, page 4014, and pages 4093 and 4094 ; then if your Lordships like to go backwards, page 4068 in the same Volume shows the same claim. These are representations, of the Hudson's Bay Company in regard to the line to be drawn under the Treaty of Utrecht, and your Lordships know that this line was given to the plenipotentiaries of England as the line to fight for. Therefore. I suggest in those dates, first the Hudson's Bay Company did not bother about any Western limit, its limits were 49 South : Grimington Inlet and so on to the 49th parallel. In 1815 the Hudson's Bay Company began to concern itself about the height of land, and it is quite obvious why : the tremendously wealthy North West had been explored, and it had been discovered that the rivers which started at Alberta emptied into the Hudson's Bay ; so the Hudson's Bay Company, by that new idea in 1814, was getting the new North West, a theory which was never admitted, and which was condemned by your Lordships in the Ontario–Manitoba and Government of Canada Boundary Case : but in 1763 it had not been dreamed of, and it is another line. It is difficult to suppose that no one would have mentioned, in the correspondence about the Treaty of Utrecht, the height of land, if the height of land had been any material point. I can easily understand why it NI as not mentioned because the height of land is a land surveyor's idea, and it has never concerned diplomats and statesmen, unless it was a good natural boundary, and that is another matter.

Viscount HALDANE : It was the boundary between the Hudson Bay Company and a hostile Power, namely France. In that ease you would have a defined boundary, not a mere vague natural one.

Mr. GEOFFRION : It would be rather important for the Hudson's Bay Company to have—it would be very important to have a good boundary.

5 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Viscount HALDANE : Exactly.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Even against a Governor like the Governor of Newfoundland.

Viscount HALDANE : But it was particularly against a hostile Power that it was done.

Mr. GEOFFRION : But it is generally in the case of hostile Powers that the height of land is taken as a boundary.

Viscount HALDANE : It depends on how you put it.

Lord Warrington. Mr GEOFFRION : It depends on what is a good geographical picture. My whole case is that nobody thought of the height of land

p. 677

then. The height of land, as I say, grew when the North West had been discovered and the Rocky Mountains and the Drainers Basin. Then no one thought of it because there is no height of land there, because all these traders knew that the height of land is a most unnatural boundary to cut up the trading of these Indians, who, according to their caprice or whom, go to the St. Lawrence, Hamilton Inlet or Hudson's Bay. No one thought of it, that is why it was not mentioned. I have no need to speculate on why it was not mentioned, it was not mentioned, and it cannot be supposed that the Imperial Government, which had taken so much care in the Agnew Grant to protect the Hudson's Bay Company, good or bad, from Grimington Inlet to Cape Chidley, by saying that the North Boundary of Agnew's Grant would not be Cape Chidley, as he asked, but would be the Southern limits of the territory granted.

Mr. Geoffrion. Lord WARRINGTON : I thought, as I said just now, that if there was one thing clear it is that the Hudson's Bay Company did not claim anything on the coast of Labrador, whatever that means, beyond the entrance to Hudson's Straits, and I remembered that Sir John Simon mentioned that some enquiries were made of the Hudson's Bay Company before the Commission ; but I was unable to find the letter ; I have found it now, it is in Volume VIII at page 4110, and it is a letter from the Hudson's Bay Company to Lord Egremont, dated in March : " Having this Evening received from Mr. Rivers a Letter signifying Your Lordships desire to know as soon as possible what are the Limits upon the Coast between the Hudson's Bay Company and the Coast of Labrador, I have laid the same before Sir Wm. Baker as Governor of the said Company, who has Directed me to present his Compliments and acquaint Your Lordship, he will wait on You thereupon to Morrow Morning or at any other more convenient Time that shall be appointed." Now that was on the 23rd March, and the Commission was granted in April 1763. Now surely it is a natural inference to draw that the result of that conversation was that the entrance to the Hudson's Straits was the extent of the claim of the Hudson's Bay Company with regard to the Coast of Labrador.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Sir John Simon.

Mr. GEOFFRION : May I be allowed to say something on that remark, my Lord ; my remark is this : the inference is based on silence, because we have nothing between the two.

Sir JOHN SIMON: Forgive me, we have something between the two.

Lord WARRINGTON: Lord Egremont is enquiring what are the limits of the Hudson's Bay Company's claim as regards the Coast of Labrador ; he is told that the Governor will see him, and a few days afterwards he grants the Commission giving to Newfoundland the Coast of Labrador from the entrance to the Hudson's Bay Straits.

The Lord Chancellor.

Mr. GEOFFRION: But your Lordships are facing, if I may be allowed to suggest it, two documents, and I should like to draw attention to them. I suggest there is an answer, if I may point out the answer.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Would my learned friend allow me to correct a misstatement of fact. It is not accurate to say there is nothing between the two. I would point out that the day after the letter of the 23rd March, on the 24th March, you will find in Volume II, at page 389, the exact consequence of that interview—the very next day. The Secretary of State having got his information, as that letter shows, the very next day communicates with the Lords of Trade.

Mr. GEOFFRION : I maintain my assertion.

Lord WARRINGTON : Yes, it is the 24th March, written by Lord Egremont.

Sir JOHN SIMON : The very man to whom this other letter was written.

The Lord Chancellor.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : That was the limit laid down in the Charter of the Hudson's Bay Company itself in 1670 ; it is as old as that.

Mr. GEOFFRION : It is the limit, my Lord.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : They tried to get more, of course.

Mr. GEOFFRION : That is the limit, my Lord, that is put in the Proclamation. This letter I suggest does not add to the Proclamation, it says what the Proclamation later says, so that, in so far as that is concerned, this letter does not add anything material, since it only announces in a letter what the Commission does contain. If that is the case I come to my previous statement that all we have is a statement, of which we know nothing except the wording of the Commission after ; but I remain with two points which I would like to put forward, one is, that later, in 1774, they were disallowing, as regards Agnew, that limit. I have evidence both before and after my Lords, in writing.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : All that was said as regards Agnew was that his concession was to go to the Southern limits of the Hudson's Bay Territory, without saying what the Southern limits were.

Mr. GEOFFRION: But he had asked up to Hudson's Straits.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I know, but he did not get them ; the Southern limits wherever they were.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Let us see what is on pages 1079, 1080 and 1081, to put the facts before your Lordships ; as I suggest he asked from the Hudson's Straits to the River St. Lawrence on page 1079, and he is told at page 1080 : if you get the grant North of the Hudson's Straits, that will take in a large part of what has already been granted to the Hudson's Bay Company, and then comes page 1081 : “ Upon the Coast of Labrador between the River St. John and the Southern limits of the territory granted to the Hudson's Bay Company.” I say that therefore you have the picture that in 1774 they were still unwilling to grant in express terms up to the Hudson's Straits.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : This is a very small part of your case.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Your Lordships have my argument.

5 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Geoffrion.

The Lord Chancellor.

Mr. Geoffrion.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : You will take much longer to persuade me that that line which you call the proposed line was ever confirmed. However, as I say, it is a small part of your case.

Mr. GEOFFRION : It is, as regards the Indian Reserves and the Hudson's Bay Company. I suggest coming back to the Indian Reserves that it was dealing with what you call a residuum ; coming back to the Reserves, it is a residuum for the present ; it is significant by the exceptions it mentions, and much more even by the exception it does not mention. I have dealt with the exception it does mention, Newfoundland ; but the exception not mentioned is the Hudson's Bay Company. The Hudson's Bay Company there was no reason to except at all for many reasons. The Hudson's Bay Company was not in territory dealt with by the Proclamation, because it had not been territory ceded to or conferred on France under the Treaty of Paris. The point I wanted to make was escaping me: the territory of the Hudson's Bay Company is quite clear, so how could they overlook the other. On my learned friends theory the territory of the Hudson's Bay

Mr. Geoffrion.

Company is just near alongside the territory of Newfoundland, but my learned friend says the Reserve did not deal with that part of the world, it dealt with the Great Lakes. I will have to suggest later to your Lordships why it does not deal with the great Lakes ; but, may it please your Lordships, it is noticeable as I pointed out a minute ago, that in 1759 the Hudson's Bay Company were not concerned with its Western limits. The limits it was concerned with, and the limits which were then claimed, were the limits Grimington Inlet to 49 degree and stopping there, so that when the Proclamation refers to the limits of the Hudson's Bay Company, they are the very limits in the Labrador Peninsula, because the others were not yet a concern to anybody, and if they were the limits in the Labrador Peninsula, then how can it be suggested that this Reserve did not apply to the same territory ; how can it be suggested that this Peninsula was so far considered to be included as to make it necessary to exclude the Hudson's Bay Company, and that it was so far not included as to make it unnecessary to reserve

the Newfoundland Grant ? I suggest that since the exception applies to the Hudson's Bay Company, which is just a neighbour, it is almost inconceivable that Newfoundland would not have been mentioned if the hinterland had been intended to be given. My Lords, I suggest that the maps about Indian territories to which my learned friend has referred, help us in so far as they play a part, particularly the map introduced by my learned friend Mr. Macmillan on that point, which is very strong, but it seems first that where we must look for the reservation is in the terms of the Proclamation, and the thing did not reserve what was occupied by Indians conditionally on its being occupied by Indians. It reserved it completely. I can make the same remark to the various phrases to which my learned friend refers in the letters of the Lords of Trade. It is true the Lords of Trade speak of lands around the Great Lakes. I might answer " but it happens that the King did not take those words, he was not satisfied with those words, and used other words," and therefore, their value as a contribution to the interpretation is very slight ; but there is more : If these words of the Lords of Trade were discarded as insufficient—probably they were not suggested with the intention that they would be accepted, but only as a description—if they are to be considered, I find something in my favour in them. I must come back again, my Lords, to that phrase which has often been read to your Lordships (I will say only a few words about it) in Volume III, at page 910, line 20, where they suggest a reserve of the lands lying about the Great Lakes and beyond the sources of the rivers which flow into the River St. Lawrence. Now, my Lords, I take it that " Lands beyond the sources of the rivers " in the plural, which fall into the River St. Lawrence, are lands beyond the height of land ; I cannot conceive of an area behind the sources of the rivers which is on this side of the height of land ; if there is, it is because you use the distinction between a river and a brook and a stream, and say, there is the river's source, and there is a brook beyond. Obviously, this is the way of defining the height of land—

5 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Viscount HALDANE : You say it is interior waters.

Mr. GEOFFRION : I say it must be a name for a watershed substantially, and your Lordships must not forget that at that moment the Lords of Trade were suggesting as the boundary, not the boundary ultimately accepted, of a straight line for Quebec, but the height of land. Having suggested the height of land as a boundary, they then suggest a reserve of the land lying about the Great Lakes and beyond the sources of the rivers which fall into the River St. John from the North, to be thrown into the Indian country. Now that is beyond the water shed : when they were suggesting the North water shed was as the limit of Ouebec. It cannot be in Hudson's Bay Territory, because Hudson's Bay Territory is excepted in anything, and the King would not purport to put that in the Indian lands, so there is nothing left, not either the whole of or a part of the disputed territory, in that Peninsula, when you have taken the Hudson Bay watershed, the

Lord Warrington.

Mr. Geoffrion.

p. 681

Atlantic Ocean water shed, and the St. Lawrence water shed, you have excluded that ; in fact, one of the peculiarities of the use of the word “ coast ” by my learned friend is that except in very exceptional parts of the world, like the Caspian Sea, all Continents are composed of coasts.

Lord WARRINGTON: You must pay some attention to what the Lords of Trade are talking about.. In this paragraph they are talking about the settlement of the boundaries of the New Government of Canada. That is what they are talking about, not of Newfoundland or Labrador, or anything of that sort ; they are considering what shall be the boundary of the New Government of Canada, and in settling those boundaries, they say certain lands should not be included, but left to the Indians, that is what they are talking of.

Mr. GEOFFRION : They are clearly dealing with it, if I may suggest it, in view of the Proclamation they are going to draft, and in that Proclamation there is to be a Reserve of the rights of the Indians ; there has been a discussion about it, and the Reserve for the Indians cannot be in Newfoundland.

Lord WARRINGTON : I was proposing to ask you at some time or other what really is the effect of the reservation. Is not it reserved so as to prevent—the words of the last clause of the Proclamation seem to show it, the acquisition of ownership in the land that is reserved : settlement and ownership.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Of course, my Lord, this is going to the root of my argument.

Lord WARRINGTON : It is still reserved to the King, you see the King has jurisdiction and must administer it through some agent.

Mr. GEOFFRION: No, my Lord, if I may suggest, the correspondence which was read to your Lordships——

5 Nov., 1926.

Lord WARRINGTON : Just look at the words of the

Mr. Geoffrion.

Proclamation again.

Mr. GEOFFRION : I have them before me, my Lord.

Lord WARRINGTON : It seems to me they are important. You see that paragraph which we have read so often on page 156, the reservation is expressed in these terms, “ To reserve under our Sovereignty, protection and dominion, for the use of the said Indians,” and then it ends with the words, “ and we do hereby strictly forbid ” and so on, “ our loving subjects from making any purchase or settlements whatever, or taking possession of any of the lands above reserved.” That is not a reservation, surely, directed to saying that the land shall not be invaded by the settlers.

p. 682

Mr. GEOFFRION : It is more than that, if it was that, it would be a definite policy. May I suggest that it is a reservation “ for the present as aforesaid.” The King, as the correspondence shows, had not made up his mind ; he dissented with the Lords of Trade at first ; the Lords of Trade wanted him to keep the Indian lands under his dominion ; he wanted to give the Indian lands to Quebec : he yielded, but only temporarily, because we find him doing it in 1774. He yielded to the Lords of Trade suggestion in 1763 by keeping the land under his dominion, but, during his pleasure, “ for the present as aforesaid,” until his further pleasure is known, and we know his further pleasure was known in 1774 when he gave it to Quebec.

Lord WARRINGTON : Yes.

Lord Warrington.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Because he discovered, quite naturally, that Quebec was the only Government which could really handle the Indian problem on account of its previous experience in the matter ; but at all events, I suggest that this is not consistent with its inclusion in the Newfoundland Government ; I do not see how you can reconcile, after having said We will put the coast of Labrador under the care of an inspection of the Governor of Newfoundland, saying, “ We reserve under our sovereignty protection and dominion for the use of the Indians,” all the following lands. It cannot be suggested that he was thereby putting the same territory (that is my suggestion) under the Newfoundland Government and at that same time reserving it under his sovereignty protection and dominion for the present as aforesaid. Of course, that goes to the root of my argument, but my suggestion is that there is incompatibility between the two.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Lord WARRINGTON : Up above, where he first says “ for the present,” he says, “ no Governor or Commander in Chief in any of our other Colonies or plantations in America, do presume for the present, and until our further pleasure be known, to grant warrants of survey, or pass patents for any land beyond," certain limits. I agree he is talking there about the Governors of the old Colonies, but the object of the King in reserving the land, appears to be to prevent any ownership of the land so reserved being established by other people.

5 Nov., 1926.
—
Mr. Geoffrion.

Mr. GEOFFRION : This provides for the free trade with these Indians, my Lord.

Lord WARRINGTON : Yes.

Viscount Haldane.

Mr. GEOFFRION : That involves regulation. Regulation is required for the free trade with the Indians. For these Indians, this was their protection ; they should not be curtailed by settlement, but there was not only that, they should be protected against the white man's raids and lawlessness, apart from settlement. Their trade should be regularised, there were a lot of things to do, and the King knew he was not in a position to shape a policy then, and he reserves it for the present, and later places it on the Government of Quebec, but I suggest it cannot be said he was reserving it to himself, or giving it to Newfoundland. That is my point. at all events.

p. 683

Mr. Geoffrion.

Viscount HALDANE : Let us see what has been the issue of this. The Indian lands when Confederation took place in 1867 were handed over, not to the Provinces, but to the Dominion, and the Dominion had to keep them, the same lands, but if by arrangement with the Indians they were sold to the Provinces, then it was decided by this Board that the title would be in the Province and not in the Dominion ; the Indian lands, in other words, were taken out of the ambit of the Dominion of Canada ; they were encased by themselves and could not be got rid of except by special arrangement with the Indians, and then they became Province lands. The Indian lands have always been kept apart from the Provinces ; and that condition in the regulation of 1867 was inherited from the policy of the arrangement with Quebec before, so one would expect here the Indian land would remain under the Crown subject to special arrangement for the benefit of the Indians, and would not have been transferred either to Quebec or any other of the Provinces. As a matter of fact, they got into Quebec later perhaps because Quebec was an enormous Province, including what is now known as Lower Canada, and it was thought convenient to take not so much out of the boundaries of Canada. The policy seems to have been to withhold the Indian Lands from the Provinces of Canada.

Mr. GEOFFRION : It was the policy undoubtedly, in 1763. 1774 gets a little more doubtful. The question whether it was in 1774 or 1880 that these Indian lands fell into Canada is an interesting question, our suggestion is it was in 1774, but there has been considerable doubt on that and other views are maintained. It is not material to our ease, because we got it anyway if it was reserved. All I say is that in 1763 this was reserved by the King provisionally, because his mind was not made up, and in the broadest widest possible words, and he cannot have given it to Newfoundland under those words. I next say if our view of the 1774 Act is right, in 1774 it was thrown into Quebec, including Ontario presumably, because they discovered that there was a whole routine in Quebec for taking care of these people which was non-existent anywhere else ; they used to come to trade down to the Quebec shores. Then we come to consider, Quebec having been cut into two Provinces in 1791, that this matter, which belongs to the old Ontario and Quebec, was transferred to the Dominion by the Confereration Act or it may have been transferred to the Dominion only in 1880. That is the other question. But there is undoubtedly an express decision or policy to keep the Indian lands for the Indians out of any control in 1763 : it is admittedly a provisional decision which was possibly altered in 1774.

Viscount HALDANE : Is there any information to be obtained from the case in which Lord Watson delivered the judgment in regard to the Indian right being a usufructory right.

Mr. GEOFFRION : The case is the St. Catherine's Milling & Lumber Co. v. The Queen on the Information of the Attorney-General for Ontario. That is the case where they decided the Indians right was a usufructory right. That is reported in Law Reports, 14 Appeal Cases, at page 46 ; the passage begins at page 53.

Mr. MACMILLAN : There is also a reference in the judgment of Mr. Justice Duff, in the case of The Attorney-General for Quebec v. The Attorney-General for Canada, which is reported in Law Reports (1921) I, Appeal Cases at page 401, on the subject of the Indians carrying forward what Lord Watson said. It is merely a passing reference to the effect of the Proclamation there, in the judgment of Mr. Justice Duff ; it was not necessary for his judgment, but it was mentioned incidentally ; the incidental reference is to be found at page 410.

Lord WARRINGTON : What is the name of the case ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : It is The Attorney-General for Quebec v. The Attorney-General for Canada.

Sir JOHN SIMON : There are two cases running with that title, my Lord ; it is the first one of the two.

Mr. GEOFFRION : They are dealing with the Act of 1850, and I want to begin at the beginning of the phrase, near the bottom of page 410 :—“ and the view that the Act was passed for the purpose of affording legal protection for the Indians in the enjoyment of property occupied by them or appropriated to their use, and of securing a legal status for benefits to be enjoyed by them, receives some support from the circumstance that the operation of the Act appears to extend to lands occupied by Indian tribes in that part of Quebec which, not being within the boundaries of the Province as laid down in the Proclamation of 1763, was, subject to the pronouncements of that Proclamation in relation to the rights of the Indians, a region in which the Indian title was still in 1850, to quote the words of Lord Watson, ‘ a personal and usufructory right dependent upon the goodwill of the Sovereign.’”

My point is, and that definition by Lord Watson of the right of the Indians supports my suggestion, that on the words of this proclamation the King was reserving to himself provisionally, until his further pleasure be known, all these lands.

Viscount FINLAY : For the benefit of the Indians.

Mr. GEOFFRION : For the benefit of the Indians ; and he was not fully informed yet, and that is why he did not take the narrow words suggested by the Lords of Trade.

p. 685

Mr. Geoffion.

Viscount HALDANE : At page 59 of Lord Watson's judgment (14 A. C.) he says this : “ It was urged that the exclusive power of legislation and administration carried with it, by necessary implication, any patrimonial interest which the Crown might have had in the reserved lands. In reply to that reasoning, counsel for Ontario referred us to a series of provincial statutes prior in date to the Act of 1867 for the purpose of showing that the expression ‘ Indian reserves ’ was used in legislative language to designate certain lands in which the Indians had, after the royal proclamation of 1763, acquired a special interest, by treaty or otherwise, and did not apply to land occupied by them in virtue of the proclamation. The argument might have deserved consideration if the expression had been adopted by the British Parliament in 1867, but it does not occur in Section 91 (24), and the words actually used are, according to their natural meaning, sufficient to include all lands reserved, upon any terms or conditions, for Indian occupation. It appears to be the plain policy of the Act that, in order to ensure uniformity of administration, all such lands, and Indian affairs generally, shall be under the legislative control of one central authority.” The Indian title was defined by Mr. Justice Duff, quoting the words of Lord Watson, as “ a personal and usufructory right dependent upon the good-will of the Sovereign.” The Sovereign retained control.

Mr. Geoffion.

Mr. GEOFFRION : May it please your Lordships, I dealt with Volume III, at page 910. As I said this is beyond the height of land ; it cannot be in Hudson's Bay territory, so the suggested Indian Reserve must be in the controverted territory. It therefore suggests that it was not the corridor which the people were thinking of then, because it is beyond the corridor ; I call the corridor the yellow area to the height of land. The only answer that was made was based on the use of the words “ the source of the rivers which fall into the River St. Lawrence,” and therefore it excluded the rivers that fall into the Gulf of St. Lawrence. This suggestion, I respectfully submit, is putting an undue precision on a mere letter of recommendation that was only descriptive, generally and did not intend to suggest the very words. Then any idea that the Reserve would stop east of the rivers falling in the River St. Lawrence, once we have decided where the river stops, seems untenable. You first determine where the River stops. Let us assume, as was suggested during the argument, that it stops at the River St. John ; then you must determine in what direction your straight line will be drawn. Will it be due north from the source of the River St. John ? If it is, it takes in all the western extension of the watershed ; it takes in all these sources and the big lakes at the lead of the River. Your Lordship will notice that if you extend the River St. John all that sort of appendix to the Newfoundland claim would be in the Indian Reserve. Now it cannot be seriously suggested that the Lords of Trade wanted to cut it up by that illogical

p. 686

line, and that the mere use of the words “ rivers flowing into the River St. Lawrence,” meant that they wanted to put into the Indian Reserve the part of the Atlantic watershed shown by a line cutting off that appendix that your Lordships see on the sketch map, leaving the rest of the watershed to Newfoundland. It is a preposterous Indian Reserve to make. It is obvious that my learned friend is in great difficulty with his watershed theory the moment that he does not stop at the height of land, and it is obvious that on that phrase on page 910, the Lords of Trade were dislodging him from the most substantial and perhaps the most valuable part of that height of land.

The Lord Chancellor.

My learned friend, Mr. Macmillan kindly draws my attention to the fact that the prolongation due north of a straight line from the source of the River St. John would take Sandgirt Lake into that Indian Reserve, the line passing somewhat to the eastward. I will read an extract from Low's Report on Explorations in the Labrador Peninsula, which your Lordships will find at page 2644 of Volume V : “ Sandgirt Lake is an important gathering place for the Indians of the interior, on account of the number of routes that centre here.” It is a place where they gather, whether they want to go to Hudson's Bay, Esquimaux Bay, or Melville Bay or the St. Lawrence, and the suggestion would be that the Lords of Trade would have intended by those words to limit the Indian Reserve by a straight line drawn due north from the head of the River St. John.

Mr. Macmillan.

I suggest that view is untenable, and my learned friend, once he is dislodged from the height of land, starts down away close to the sea ; and undoubtedly this phrase of the Lords of Trade, if it had been repeated in the Proclamation, would have dislodged him from the height of land and would have taken away a very notable proportion of the watershed which he now claims. Of course, the words are even broader than that, but the real answer is that these words were not used.

Sir John Simon.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I rather incline to your view that they did not intend to draw a precise definition between the River and the Gulf. If that distinction were material I am quite satisfied myself that the River is not so far down as Anticosti. You remember we had yesterday a discussion about the Hamilton Inlet, and there was a map produced showing the River St. Lawrence coming at the Point des Monts. I remember there was a discussion about it, and Sir John accepted it.

Mr. MACMILLAN : My Lords, may I say the reason I think we both had in mind was that the River St. John is described as falling into the River St. Lawrence, in the contemporary language, and I think that probably was in my friend's mind.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I am much obliged : I am not seeking at all to qualify it, though I think I did guard myself by saying that I did not agree the use of the term had been consistent throughout.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It has not.

p. 687

Sir JOHN SIMON : I thought for the purpose of my friend's present point he was not putting it, if I may say so, unfairly, and I did not want to quarrel with him about what is necessarily a vague line. I do not think the use of the language is quite consistent.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I do not think it matters very much, but I thought it, right that attention should be called to it.

Sir JOHN SIMON : At any rate I do not think anybody would say it goes down further down.

Mr. GEOFFRION : I am going to say it in a minute ; I am going to find it in the Report of the Lords of Trade. My argument, of course, is that the Lords of Trade could not have intended to base their limits of the Indian line on the east on such a hazy expression as the rivers emptying into the River as distinguished from the rivers emptying into the Gulf.

Therefore my learned friend gets into difficulties, because if they take part, they want to take the whole. It is my case that there is no importance in the distinction. If the pursuit of the subject be interesting your Lordships will find in the same report of the Lords of Trade a definition of what they called the River St. Lawrence, rightly or wrongly. That is at page 905, line 16. " This Claim, and the Possession in consequence of it, of the whole Southern Coast of the Gulph of St. Lawrence, from the streights of Canceau to Cape Roziere, at the Mouth of the River, appears to Us," and so on. Now from the position of Cape Roziere, I think that will carry it probably to the western end of Anticosti. As I say, my argument is that the Lords of Trade cannot have intended to base the eastern limits of the reserve on such a hazy basis as the distinction between the river and the gulf ; not only hazy in law but drawing an absurd line in the Indian territory. Therefore the moment my learned friend is dislodged by this phrase from part of his territory, he is in trouble with respect to all his territory.

Mr. Geoffrion.

My Lords, this brings me to the second branch of the Indian argument, on which we may be wrong, but to which we attach very great importance. I have been arguing on the assumption that it is irrelevant whether there were at that place Indians under the protection of the King of England, whose hunting ground the territory was. That was my first point that I have been trying to develop ; that the King made a provisional measure and wanting to be on the safe side, did not condition his reserve on that, but reserved his decision. I now come to the second point, which was so brilliantly developed by my learned friend, Mr. Macmillan, but to which I have another chapter to add ; that is the chapter with regard to the history and possession and occupation, namely, that there were there not only some Indians, but relatively to the other tribes, a substantial number of Indians whose hunting ground it was. They were unquestionably under the protection of the King of England. They were the first Indians of whom the French and English would have thought, and the last ones they would forget. and it was their livelihood which was involved.

p. 688

Viscount HALDANE : How far north did they come ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : There are two tribes, there are two subdivisions of the immense Algonquin tribe. That starts from Lake Superior practically, or perhaps west of that.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : There were the Montagnais ; I am not quite sure about the Nascopies.

Mr. GEOFFRION: The Nascopies are practically Montagnais, and Nascopie is a word of contempt ; they are further north because they have been beaten.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : They are called Cree in this map.

Mr. GEOFFRION: The Algonquins are Crees, my Lord.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : They are distinguished on this map.

Mr. GEOFFRION : They are obviously of the same stock. Montagnais is a name given by the French ; it means mountaineer ; it was not their Indian name. Each tribe had an individual unpronounceable name that soon went into disuse in French mouths, and these were given the name of mountaineers because they came from the mountains behind—the plateau which we are dealing with here. What was read by my learned friend, Mr. Macmillan, and I hate to read it over again, describes the situation. The Indians, previous, of course, to the coming of the white people, lived exclusively on hunting for themselves ; they killed for their food, for their clothes and for everything. The coming of the white people, the French, in that region introduced a considerable change in their habits ; they killed to barter and they lived on the things they got that way. This introduced a new factor. I do not say that they did not still kill for their food at all ; but in both cases they killed and they hunted, and therefore their hunting ground was like the farm to a farmer in Europe ; it was their livelihood. These Indians had defined hunting territories, much as we have defined kingdoms and republics here, settled by immemorial usage. There were wars about them undoubtedly, like there are sometimes here, but at all events that was the position and the Montagnais hunting ground is described as being south of the Hamilton River and north of the St. Lawrence.

Sir JOHN SIMON : What description are you referring to ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : It was read in argument. My learned friend seems to doubt that, and I will get the page again.

Sir John Simon.

Mr. Geoffion.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I am not doubting it. I am asking what date you are quoting from. If you are quoting from a finite recent thing, I understand, but I thought you were referring to things hundreds of years ago.

Mr. GEOFFRION : I am content to base my argument on what my learned friend, Mr. Macmillan, read, I think, on the first day of his argument on that question. There is much more material. There are hundreds of pages. The Nascopies were north of Hamilton River; it was a marvellous natural boundary ; and the Montagnais were south. There is no suggestion anywhere of the Montagnais' hunting ground being cut up by any height of land. The character of the height of land and of the country would be against such a suggestion. It was a very flat place, and the passage by portages and the method of these Indians of travelling by light bark canoes which they carried on their backs would be against such a suggestion.

Viscount HALDANE : Do you say the Montagnais were exclusively to the east ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : The Montagnais went to Lake Mistassini. We find posts showing that they went to the Mistassini River.

Viscount HALDANE : Then the height of land was not their boundary ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : No, the height of land was nobody's boundary as regards the Indians.

Viscount FINLAY : I very much doubt whether, in determining the hunting ground, the height of land would form the boundary.

Mr. GEOFFRION : There is no doubt that the Indians of the west always would have their boundaries made by the Rocky Mountains. Here according to the passage read by my friend, and according to an inspection of this relief map and a knowledge of the Indians' habits, the watershed did not and could not play any part in the hunting ground question. It is proved in various ways. It is proved that the same tribe of Indians comes to trade at three places, the St. Lawrence River, Esquimaux Bay and Hudson's Bay. Later on, when discussing another aspect of the question, I will point out to your Lordships passages in ancient authorities indicating that for all these Indians the three posts were competing posts ; the Hudson's Bay post, the Lake Melville post on the Atlantic and the St. Lawrence River post were competing posts. When Widow Furnell, in the dying days of the French regime (I will give the reference later), asked for a concession at Lake Melville for trade, the objection made by the lessee of the King's Post is that this post at Lake Melville would draw away the trade which he gets at the St. Lawrence post. Well, if the hunters would hesitate between going

Mr. Geoffrion.

p. 690

to that Lake or going to the St. Lawrence, is there any better evidence against the view that the watershed was the factor ?

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Do you know the elevation of what you call the height of land, above the sea, at the part that you call the appendix ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : I cannot say at the moment, but I can get that for your Lordship.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I think you may take it generally as described as a flat plateau.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I can tell your Lordship at once.

Sir John Simon.

Mr GEOFFRION : May I give your Lordship something that may be illuminating, not as to the level, but as to the incline. In Volume V. at page 2603, is a report by Mr. Low on the geology. He says : “ The strong glaciation of the highest hills in the interior, on the edges of the neve region, the constant directions of the striae over hill and valley, and the fact that the general slope of the plateau from the interior outwards is very slight and does not exceed two or three feet per mile until within a few miles of the coast, all point to a considerable thickness of ice in the interior such as to cause the strong, radial flow of the ice evidenced by the glaciation of the region.”

Sir JOHN SIMON : I can answer my Lord's question, if he would care for it ; the figures are here, if my friend does not mind.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Not at all.

5 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : If, for instance, you take the lake which is called Attikonak Lake, that is to say, at the southern end of that, you will find that the lake has a height above the sea of 1,700 ft ; if, on the other hand, your Lordship travels a little north-west to the extreme western limit of my enclave, I see that 1,750 ft. is the height of the water running into the Lake Menihek ; in the same way I see there is a little lake called Flour Lake or Lobstick, which is 1,630 ft., and close by it is 1,650 ft. I think your Lordships may take it that is the kind of height.

Viscount FINLAY : 1,600 or 1,700 ft. ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord, 1,600 or 1,700 ft. above the level of the sea.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount HALDANE : What is the breadth of the plateau ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : It slopes down. There is evidently a fairly
p. 691

Mr. Geoffrion.

sharp drop at certain points. That, of course, would mean a most significant drop to the falls of the Hamilton River, which is very substantial indeed.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Otherwise it looks rather like a gradual incline.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I believe it does, my Lord, I believe that our little Plasticine model has been made, as far as proportions go, pretty accurately ; it was made very carefully.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I happen fortunately to have collected the phrases about this matter from both sides, and I find that Professor Gregory, the geologist, described that as a plateau country, while Dr. Low described it as a high plateau, almost flat.

Mr. GEOFFRION : With regard to what my learned friend, Sir John Simon, said about Hamilton Falls, I would point out that Hamilton Falls fall into a deep gorge ; therefore, it does not mean that the level of the land changes so abruptly as he suggests. If your Lordships wanted details of the level, your Lordships have them at page 2594.

My Lords, I was approaching the question of the character of the Indians, and so on. The Montagnais was name given by the French to a branch of the Algonquins, because they lived in the mountains behind Quebec. They had their hunting grounds indefinitely in the direction of the Atlantic ; there was nobody to stop them in that direction ; they were the only ones ; and to the Hamilton River north, the Naseopies, their cousins, being beyond, and it is suggested that they sought to stop at the mouth of the St. Lawrence River to the west ; the western boundary is not very important. What we are concerned with is the eastern boundary. The height of land between the Atlantic and Hudson's Bay, or the St. Lawrence and the north, played no part in the limiting ground. Its character would prevent it. But the fact that there was competition between posts for the trade would show it, and the description of the area of the hunting ground is across it. These Indians, as I will point out later on, were first the allies and subjects of the King of France. The connection was established in 1603, before the founding of the Province of Quebec. They were the continuous allies of France down to the capitulation, and were the closest neighbours of Quebec and were thus better known, and they must be those who were principally thought about when in the capitulation of Montreal a clause was inserted for the protection of the Indians.

Viscount FINLAY : Are you talking of the Montagnais ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : I am speaking of the Montagnais. They were in the hunting grounds all across that watershed. All this territory was unmistakably connected with and under the protection of—

4 Y

to use the words of the Proclamation—the King of France. I suggest that both under the capitulation and under the ordinary rules of international law those who were under the protection of the King of France passed under the protection of the King of England by the Treaty of Paris, unless the King of England chose to treat them as enemies, or as Lord Campbell says, “ put them all to the sword,” which is not the method practised in these modern days. What I desire to point out is that that was the understanding when Governor : Murray came, and that was the attitude of the new Government. But this point cannot be treated except by reference to the historical chapter, and my friend left me the historical chapter to deal with. For the present I will suspend that point.

I now want to say a very few words about the Commission of Captain Graves. A good deal has been said about the word “ Coasts ” being in the plural. I should have thought that was an extremely narrow point, but I suggest it is answered by pointing out that the singular and the plural are used indifferently in the Commission.

A good deal has been said in respect of the phrase which is to be found at line 32 on page 151, Volume I, in the Commission to Captain Graves, “ the coasts and territories of Labrador.” The phrase is important because my learned friends have quoted it expressly in their final memorandum. They have quoted this phrase as helpful to their case. I however wish to draw attention to the fact that the quotation is incompletes. I would like to complete it, because in my humble suggestion it is very material to complete it. The words really are : “ and all other inhabitants of our said islands, and the coasts and territories of Labrador and islands adjacent thereto.” It is quite probable that the “ coasts ” apply to Labrador, and the “ territories ” to the islands, because they have been speaking all the time of the coast of Labrador and nothing else. I see my learned friend, Sir John Simon, smiles. I do not see why when the word “ territories ” is introduced for the first time it should not be presumed to refer to something else than Labrador, when elsewhere where Labrador is spoken of, the phrase “ coasts of Labrador ” is always used. It would seem therefore when they speak of “ territories ” they are speaking of the islands themselves. At all events it Aras worth while putting the text accurately in the final memorandum. However, it is not a very important matter, because we concede that the jurisdiction was territorial. It was for fishery purposes and limited to the fishery district, but was undoubtedly in a certain sense territorial. It does not seem to me that the Commission adds very much to the solution of the question, and where we must look for the key to the situation is where the King announces to his subjects in the Proclamation what he has done.

5 Nov., 1926.
Mr. Gcoffrion.

Going back to the Proclamation therefore, my learned friends have put forward an argument against us based on the description of the Government of Quebec at page 153. My learned friends point out that there it says the Government of Quebec is “ bounded on the Labrador Coast by the River St. John, and from thence by a line dawn from the head of that river, through the lake St. John, to the south end of the Lake Nipissim.” My learned friend, Sir John Simon, says the River St. John is therefore a boundary in depth, and it must also be presumed to be a boundary in depth in the grant to Newfoundland referred to at page 154. I have two short answers to make to that, which I think are worthy of consideration. When you come to page 154 the River St. John is contrasted with Hudson Strait. It is “ all that coast from the River St. John's to Hudson's Streiglrts.” If the River St. John is a boundary in depth, there, why is not Hudson Strait not a boundary in depth ? There is no reason why one should be any more than the other. I do not think my learned friend can draw much satisfaction from the suggestion that the River St. John is to be deemed a boundary in depth there, and I do not suppose that even the description of the territory of Quebec the River St. John when first referred to is taken as a boundary in depth.

Viscount Finlay.

Viscount FINLAY : What do you mean by a “ boundary in depth ” ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : I mean a boundary that does not stop at the coast but goes right up to the source of the river. My friend's argument, as I understand it, is this. When you say “ bounded by the River St. John ” you mean bounded by the whole of the River St. John, and not only by the mouth of the River St. John. He says, therefore, the coast went as far as the head of the river.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Viscount FINLAY : “ Bounded by the River St. John ” would be equally applicable whether you are talking of the whole extent of the river, or of only a part of it.

Mr. GEOFFRION : That would be my answer. The word is ambiguous, and does not advance the matter.

Lord Warrington.

Viscount FINLAY : Any part of the River St. John might bound a territory.

Mr. GEOFFRION : This expression, in my submission, does not refer either to the mouth or to the whole river, and you must be governed by the context. But my learned friend tries to say that it is the whole river, and therefore the coast goes up to the head of the river.

Sir JOHN SIMON : If I might suggest it to my friend. I think he should read the next three or four words in the sentence.

Mr GEOFFRION : I am coming to them.

Lord WARRINGTON : Surely it is the River St. John itself which is referred to as the boundary. It is bounded on the Labrador coast by the River St. John, and the next step is to go to the head of that river and take the line.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Mr. GEOFFRION : But I am dealing with the meaning of the words “ River St. John ” in the boundary of the Newfoundland jurisdiction. My learned friend's argument consists in transferring the meaning of the “ River St. John ” in the Quebec boundary to the place where the “ River St. John ” is referred to in the Newfoundland boundary.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : We have got this point, I think. You said you were going to deal With the historical point, and I am very much interested in that. I do not want to curtail your argument in any way, but the historical point does interest me.

Mr. GEOFFRION : I was only intending to say a few words on other points, and I will do it as briefly as I can, my Lord. Of course I will not dwell on the words “ care and inspection.” I suggest that while they do really involve annexation in the sense that it is put under jurisdiction, nevertheless it is an indication of the limited character of it in the intention of the grantor. I want your Lordships now to contrast two grants. I am really trying to answer a remark made by Lord Sumner when he asked whether a grant could be found anywhere with no limit specified. I want to refer your Lordships to two grants which I wish to try and demonstrate are applicable to this point. One of those grants is the grant to the Hudson's Bay Company. The other one is the Treaty respecting the French shore. As regards the Hudson's Bay Company may I suggest it supplies in my humble view an answer to the objection, and a formidable argument against my learned friend with regard to the meaning of the word “ coast.” If my friend is right when he said they were given the coast of Hudson's Bay and Strait, and stop there, particularly as they were given it in full property, particularly as it included governmental authority most ample, and given it for the purposes of trade and commerce—if the putting under the care and inspection of the Governor of Newfoundland of a coast fit for a public and free fishery involves the hinterland, the Governor having only very limited fishing control powers, how much more would the giving of the coast of Hudson's Bay and Strait to the Hudson's Bay Company, who were to be full proprietors with full power of government and for the purpose of doing not fishing but trade and commerce, carry with it the hinterland Nevertheless they were so little satisfied that they had a page of description added, which shows how completely insufficient the word “ coast ” is. Your Lordships will find the grant in Volume II, page 368. I suggest that there is there a contrast, if you consider the words used. There is a broader jurisdiction given to the Hudson's Bay Company than to the Governor of Newfoundland, and the purpose is for trade and commerce, and not for fishery. The words are : “ Do give, grant and confirm, unto the said Governor and Company, and their successors, the sole trade and commerce of all those seas, straits, bays, rivers, lakes, creeks and sounds, in whatsoever latitude they shall be, that lie within the entrance of the straits, commonly called Hudson's Straits, together with all the lands and territories upon the countries, coasts and confines of the seas, bays, hives, rivers, creeks, and sounds aforesaid.”

Viscount FINLAY : But it is a tradeable land.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Your Lordship will see they are given first the sole trade and commerce of all these territories including the land and territories upon the countries, coasts and confines of the seas, bays, lakes, rivers, and so on ; and they are to be lords and proprietors of all the said territories places and limits ; and then later they are given governmental powers of a vast character. They were a plantation. Here is a grant where the word “ coast ” is not found sufficient, although it is for trade and commerce, and not only for fishing, and although they are to have full governmental powers and not merely incidental governing powers are given. In answer to Lord Summer's difficulty, no limit was given there, and it was a grant. So that there is nothing so unheard of in that, after all. In fact I would ask my friend to indicate a grant of the coast pure and simple, or for fishing purposes, that has ever been carried by interpretation to the watershed. Your Lordship will bear in mind that notwithstanding all these words the idea of the height of land being the limit of the Hudson's Bay grant arose only in 1815 when the beauty of the north-west territory from the trading point of view had been discovered, and also when Mr. Munroe, President of the United States, first suggested in the Louisiana, fight that the watershed was a good theory for the solution of international problems, but not in the year 1763.

When we come to the French coast point, I quite appreciate that that is a Treaty, but it is more important there should be a definite limit in the grant by Treaty by the King of England to the King of France of the subjects and rights on the coasts because, when once that is done, it is irrevocable. That is a Treaty binding by international law and conscience, and it is very much more important to settle the jurisdiction than when you are dealing with the King's own property, the fishing industry on the shore and an impenetrable wilderness behind. Your Lordships have appreciated what sort of impenetrable wilderness that was from the Atlantic. The Indians never came to the coast on account of the Esquimaux. There was a war of hatred between them, and a difference of climate on the way. But beyond that there were only the missionaries, and very few of them managed to go there. It was most important, it seems to me, that there should be something definite as to the extent of the territory to which the subjects of France had an easement, if I might call it so, by the Treaty of Paris for fishing. Is not the analogy very close ? This is the grant of the use of a coast for fishing purposes, and it is of great importance that its extent be defined. But they are content to leave it at “ coast,” and thus restrict it to a very narrow margin. Here we have a grant of very limited jurisdiction for fishing purposes only, on a coast. Why should they not be content to leave it undefined ?

5 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Geoffrion.

p. 696

Lord Warrington.

Lord Sumner has put another idea into my head which may possibly be useful. His Lordship has said there are tremendous difficulties in marking out jurisdiction. There might be judicial, civil or criminal, or fiscal duties to perform. I might first answer by saying the same problem arises for the French shore. It was a very important administrative point to keep the French at a certain distance. Can I, then, suggest this problem did not exist ? In those days it was the definite policy under statute to keep settlers away, but it did not succeed. Squatters came in and no grants were made. Those squatters were evaders of the law, but they were tolerated. A few miles from the coast it was practically impossible for any white man to live long. It was the domain of the Indians. The Indians did not come to the coast, and the Esquimaux did not go inland through mutual fear of each other. What the Governor was supposed to do was to come on his ship during the summer season to see that peace was maintained among the fishermen in the boats, or when they landed on shore for fishing purposes. If a criminal escaped from the coast and went inland he could be safely left to come back, or die there. There was no jurisdiction for the Governor to take his marines off the ship, and go and hunt for that man in the wilds. The man was gone. So that no difficulty arose in that way in those days.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Now I want to say a few words about the Act of 1774. Yesterday something was said about the use of the words “ territories, islands and countries ” as applied to what had been annexed to Newfoundland. I think Lord Warrington will remember that difficulty being raised. The words occur at line 15, page 159.

5 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Geoffrion.

LORD WARRINGTON : You mean these words : “ All such territories, islands, and countries, which have, since the tenth of February 1763, been made part of the Government of Newfoundland, be and they are hereby, during his Majesty's pleasure, annexed to, and made part and parcel of, the Province of Quebec.”

MR. GEOFFRION : Those are the words. I want to deal with the words “ territories, islands, and countries.” Your Lordship will see it is a formula repeated throughout the Act. It has not originated in that place. It is to be found at line 9, page 158, and then again at line 26, page 158. The only point I want to make is that there was this expression running through the Act, and therefore it can be of very slight importance in deciding what happened in 1774 from what was intended in 1763.

That brings me to the Act of 1825. I have very little to say on this point. The reference is to be found on pages 210 and 211. I will not repeat what my learned friend has so ably argued on this point. It is sixty years after. They were not then in a very much better position to know what was meant in 1763 than we are, and they do not purport to construe or alter. They expressly purport not to change.

Then there is the point made by my learned friend, that this is merely a landmark and stops short of the indefinite north, because as your Lordships will readily see it would give, nearly all the Atlantic coast to Quebec if you produced the line further.

p. 697

The LORD CHANCELLOR : That is the point Mr. Macmillan made.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes, I suggest, alternatively, my Lord, this : Assuming for the present everything my friend Sir John Simon claims, what does it show ? Assuming that this is a depth line, it does not show that Parliament was then of the opinion that the coast did go deeper. It only shows that Parliament's opinion was that it might go deeper. In other words, that Parliament was having some of the difficulties which we are unmistakably having to-day, of construing, 62 years afterwards, what was the meaning of the word " coast," where it went to at a time when the watershed idea had become a well known idea, and therefore whether the watershed—which was not thought of in 1763 I suggest—was being thought of there. We can assume that if they had the slightest doubt as to the possibility of that going to the watershed, they professed not to decide it, but to leave it open. They simply re-annexed all the coast, leaving, as Lord Haldane said, it to mean what it meant in 1763. But they said, if perchance that coast goes north to the 52nd parallel we stop you there. That does not advance the matter at all. It leaves your Lordships a point to settle which they did not professionally intend to settle.

The Lord Chancellor.

In view of your Lordship's suggestion I have just taken the most important points, and this brings me to my last point, the point of possession. There are three branches of that subject. I have devoted considerable thought to trying to make them as short as possible.

Viscount HALDANE : You mean the point of possessory title

5 Nov., 1926.
Mr. Geoffrion.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes. But nevertheless I must deal with the Newfoundland possession, the French regime possession, which is very important on the Indian question, and the Canadian subsequent possession. I will begin with the Newfoundland possession. May I suggest first that except for the possession by Newfoundland contemporaneous practically with 1763, the rest is of a very doubtful relevancy. The fact that Newfoundland may have claimed a jurisdiction—I will go further and say the fact that Canada might not have challenged that jurisdiction—could not really alter the Imperial will. Contemporaneously it is an indication of how those who lived then understood what had been said, and it throws light on what they meant. But afterwards, I suggest, it becomes irrelevant.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : The act of possession has always been accepted as some evidence of title. That is why I think this chapter may be of use.

Mr. GEOFFRION : I am prepared to meet it entirely. The question is purposely drafted so as not to let the construction of the

p. 698

The Lord Chancellor.

Mr. Geoffrion.

legal document be influenced by anything of that sort. Your Lordship will read the question as drafted. It is expressly limited. It is not, What is the title of Newfoundland on the Labrador coast ? But it is : “ What is the location and definition of the boundary as between Canada and Newfoundland in the Labrador Peninsula under the statutes, orders-in-council and proclamations ? ” It was decidedly not limited, because there was no intention to let in possession.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Is that common ground. Ought we not to look at Acts ?

Viscount Haldane.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Contemporaneous ones are quite different. Your Lordships have the form of suggestion.

Viscount HALDANE : The suggestion put by you is that it is very long usage.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. GEOFFRION : And very intense usage. Could I put it in this way— ?

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Lord Warrington points out the special provision in paragraph 7 on page 127, which seems to give greater latitude than you suggest.

Mr. GEOFFRION : That is what the Board may look after, but the question they must decide is the formal question. In so far as possession may be a good help to the construing of these documents, I concede it. My point is it must be only such possession as is relevant to the intention of the documents.

Viscount HALDANE : Of course, you cannot by admission put into the Statute, but you may by very long possession and usage put a conventional interpretation, and it is taken to be the original meaning of the Statute. There is a case in the House of Lords in which it was laid down what amount of usage would suffice to ascertain the construction of an Act of Parliament.

Mr. MACMILLAN : The matter was discussed in Laird v. The Clyde Navigation Trustees. That is a leading case. There was a very interesting case of that sort in connection with the Caledonian Canal, where there was an early statute.

Viscount HALDANE : Do any of those cases lay down the proposition of the length of time it takes ? It takes a long time.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is generally recognised that the usage must be definite and prolonged.

Viscount Finlay.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Viscount HALDANE : Simple admissions will not do against the statute.

Mr. MACMILLAN : No. It must be in relation to an ancient document, and it must be contemporary.

Viscount HALDANE : Where is the case of Laird v. The Clyde Navigation Trustees reported?

Sir JOHN SIMON : It is in 8 Appeal Cases. It is a matter for consideration whether, in an inquiry of this sort, a rather wider rule may not be applied.

Viscount FINLAY : The words are : “ What is the location and definition under the Statutes, Orders in Council, and Proclamations ” ; but that does not mean that you cannot hear as legitimate evidence any evidence of possession which may throw light upon the question. Paragraph 7 is on the same lines. I should have thought that they could have had long continued possession, being a possession under the Statutes, Orders in Council, and Proclamations.

Lord WARRINGTON : Paragraph 7 is very wide : reference may be made to any evidence of which judicial notice may be taken or which (having regard to the nature of the case and the parties to it) the Judicial Committee may think material and proper to be considered.”

Viscount FINLAY : That is merely to exclude the idea that they are only to look at printed papers, if by oral testimony any fact could be added which might throw light on that question and what the definition was.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Lord Watson said this : “ When there are ambiguous expressions in an Act passed one or two centuries ago it may be legitimate to refer to the construction put upon these expressions throughout a long course of years by the unanimous consent of all parties interested, as evidence of what must presumably have been the intention of the Legislature at that remote period.”

Mr. GEOFFRION : I do not challenge that at all. My point is not that you cannot look at possession. I did not mean to make it a big point. You have only one thing to do, and that is to construe these documents. Your Lordships can construe them by all the tests that the law recognises for their construction. That is my point, my Lord.

Viscount FINLAY : If you are dealing with documents which lead you to a conclusion inconsistent with the long continued practice of parties professing to act under those documents, you would find it very 4 Z

difficult indeed, I should think, to establish such a construction which would vary with the acts of the parties.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Your Lordships have been doing that with the Act of 1857 for Canada as regards the distribution of powers in the provinces. The Confederation started with the idea that all the powers were in Ottawa, and the provinces had hardly anything. A big fight began many years ago and an appeal to this Board gained for the provinces quite a number of powers which, there was obvious evidence in the legislation of Canada, had never been dreamed of, either by the Dominion or the Provinces, for the first 20 years of the Confederation. Now, my Lord, I made that as an opening point. I intended to discuss possession, and I hope to satisfy your Lordships that it might have been a very happy result if your Lordships decided that we do not need to. As regards the contemporaneous Acts of 1763 by Newfoundland, may I sum them up. Curiously enough the Government did not succeed in getting control of the narrow margin within the Straits of Belle Isle. The Canadian position was so well established that your Lordship will see as regards the margin from the Straits of Belle Isle towards the River St. John the Government of Newfoundland practically never got its foot in, which, according to the Statute, it should have. The lessees of the Canadian Government continued, and the Indians who came down from there from the far away hinterland continued to trade with those Canadians beyond any Newfoundland control. The Newfoundland control being essential, there would be no sedentary fishery there outside the Belle Isle Straits. There are some things which are all absolutely consistent with the narrow margin of the sea as an incident of the fishery. It is an open and free fishery which is referred to. Nobody would suggest that cod fishing would cause acts of possession as far as the hinterland. Cod is being fished, as it has always been fished, and they need a very narrow margin to dry their fish, and occasionally to cut trees.

Viscount Finlay.

Viscount FINLAY : I suppose that margin may vary from time to time. The fishery may develop. The more fish there is, the more there is to be done on the margin at a particular point.

5 Nov., 1926.

Mr. GEOFFRION : The margin would extend in length more than in depth.

Viscount FINLAY : It seems to me it may extend in depth also.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Very little, my Lord.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Viscount FINLAY : Little or much does not matter ; the question is the principle, whether the margin is to be taken as definitely fixed in point of depth.

p. 701

Mr. GEOFFRION : The margin should be ascertained by what would be needed by any prosperous cod fishery.

Viscount FINLAY : Yes. In some years the fishery is prosperous ; in others it is not.

Mr. GEOFFRION : I quite appreciate that the margin must be fixed, on our view—Viscount FINLAY : If you have a run of good years the margin may become wider.

Mr. GEOFFRION : The margin must be fixed for the maximum prosperous fishery of cod. Whale and seal will not carry my learned friend very far inland. The salmon fishery, which is not mentioned in the instructions but appears in correspondence very shortly after, is apparently an afterthought that arose very soon ; but salmon fishery does not carry my learned friend any further. The salmon fisher is not a sportsman fishing with a fly and rod in the upper streams of the rivers ; salmon fishery is the netting of fish at the entrance to the river. They might cast their nets a little higher or a little lower, but the condition of the country as well as the chief interests of the men there would compel them to put their salmon nets right at the entrance, because they were cod fishermen conducting a cod or whale or seal fishery, and going to the salmon fishery as an incident, and this salmon fishery would be where they had their seal fishery. The seamen, who were seafaring men coming over from Devonshire and other coasts, were not likely to go inland ; the forbidding character of the inland would keep them near the shore.

My learned friend spoke of the fur trade. It is important that your Lordships should have in your present memory the distinction between the fur trade and trapping. The fur trade is the buying of furs from those who trap ; trapping is what the Indians did, and what some Canadians started to do much later. Reference to the fur trade means meeting the Indians on the coast, because that is where the trade is always done.

Viscount FINLAY : The trade is disposing of the article which has been produced by trapping.

5 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Here the fur trade for the white people was exchanging European produce for the furs of the Indians, but the taking of the furs was the Indians' work inland. The fur trade was done on the coast. I do not see anything else that is even suggested at that date. I have looked, and nothing else is suggested, except shortly after the Moravian Missions were established. The Moravian Missions open a chapter upon which I shall have to add a few words. May I point out to your Lordships a few additional points in respect of the

p. 702

Moravian Missions ? One of the grants, the later one, which you will find on page 1347, Volume III, contains no area whatever. They are told to settle on the coast. The two other grants on pages 1321 and 1331 mention areas of 100,000 acres. There are three such grants, and the grant on page 1331 gives two areas of 100,000 acres north and south of the Hamilton River. As a matter of fact, they did not settle there ; they settled further north. These areas marked on these maps have no warrant whatever in the Imperial grant, and I doubt if they have any justification in possession ; I will come to that in a minute.

Viscount HALDANE : Will you give me the references.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Pages 1321 and 1331 and 1347. I do not like to take your Lordships through them. I have read them carefully and I find no area in one of them, and 100,000 acres as to three areas in two of them.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I think that is right.

Viscount HALDANE : What did the grant say ? Did it grant them property ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : I will give your Lordships the wording.

Viscount FINLAY : Will you take one typical grant ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : The operative part is on page 1323: “ His Majesty taking the same Report into Consideration was pleased with the advice of his privy Council to approve thereof and accordingly doth hereby permit and allow ” the gentlemen whose names are set out “ In Trust for the Unitas Fratrum and its Society for the furtherance of the Gospel, to Occupy and possess during his Majesty's pleasure one hundred thousand Acres of Land in such part of Esquemaux Bay on the Coast of Labrador as they shall find most Suitable to their purpose.” That is one with an area.

Viscount Haldane.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Then he directs the Governor of Newfoundland.

Mr. GEOFFRION: I am now dealing with the area, my Lord. I will give a reason why it has to be that, it could not be otherwise. I want first to point out that they were to go on the coast.

5 Nov., 1926.

Viscount HALDANE : You notice they have pitched upon Esquimaux Bay and pray for the grant of an area of 12 square miles. It is very curious thing. There is no grant to these people, but they have authority to possess and occupy there during His Majesty's pleasure. That, of course, would be perfectly intelligible if the Indian lands had been reserved. It is on Esquimaux Bay.

p. 703

Mr. Geoffrion.

Mr. GEOFFRION : On the coast. We consider that Esquimaux Bay is the coast.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : If you spread out 100,000 acres into a one-mile strip it would be a very long one.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Your Lordship will see that they did not go inland ; they built along the coast. There are four parcels in all.

Viscount FINLAY : The buildings would be scattered.

Mr. GEOFFRION : I do not think any sensible mission would have taken that square, because under the conditions it would have been absurd.

Lord Warrington.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Would any sensible mission have extended 100,000 acres into a long strip along the coast ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : For the Esquimaux that is just it. The picture is lacking. For the Esquimaux it was the only way of doing it.

Viscount HALDANE : Is Esquimaux Bay a very large bay ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes, my Lord, it is Hamilton Inlet.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Lord WARRINGTON : What they asked for was this : “ They have pitched upon Esquimaux Bay and praying for a grant on that spot of one hundred thousand acres of land, or about twelve miles square.”

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes, my Lord.

Lord WARRINGTON : That seems to have been granted to them, but not in those terms. The actual grant was that they might “ occupy and possess during His Majesty's pleasure one hundred thousand acres of land in such part of Esquimaux Bay on the coast of Labrador as they shall find most suitable to their purpose.”

Mr. GEOFFRION : I am trying to demonstrate that 12 miles square does not mean a square of 12 miles, for good reasons. I am trying to get to the operative part of the grant. We have in the third grant no area at all. The two first grants involve three areas of 100,000 acres which in one phrase is called 12 miles square, which is a mathematical calculation.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : It is 200,000 acres in one grant.

Mr. GEOFFRION : That is why there are three areas and two grants. There are four areas in all, although there are three grants, because one is for two separate places : but the principle does not change.

Viscount FINLAY : The licence is to occupy during His Majesty's pleasure.

Mr. GEOFFRION : It was an Imperial grant. Then, my Lord, I need not point out that there is nothing that determines what will be the depth. Might I again remind your Lordships of the fact that it was essentially an Esquimaux mission, because these men had boasted that they knew the Greenland Esquimaux and they thought that they might be able to approach these men whose language nobody knew. It was for the purpose of preventing fights between the fishermen and the Esquimaux ; and the Esquimaux being coast dwellers the mission was useful on the coast. The boats could not go inland ; they could go hundreds of miles on the sea, but they were not built for going inland.

5 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Lord SUMNER : For what purpose do you understand the fact that 100,000 acres were required ? Was it for tillage ?

Lord Sumner.

Mr. GEOFFRION : No, my Lord, there was no tillage.

Lord SUMNER : What did they want it for ? How many Moravian brethren could have their cabins and places of worship erected on the 100,000 acres ?

Viscount Finlay.

Mr. GEOFFRION : May I give your Lordship a suggestion? All I can say is that in those days they were very generous in areas.

5 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Lord SUMNER : I am unable to understand why 100,000 acres are granted to one of these missions in a way that is consistent with its being confined to a strip nowhere more than one mile from high water mark. It seems to me they could not plough the fields, they could not fell timber because there was no timber, and unless they occupied themselves in catching fish, which would be to the exclusion of other people, I do not see what it could be for.

Viscount HALDANE : It was granted out of Crown Land, according to this.

Lord SUMNER : It is apparently not a fixed area of 100,000 acres, but they were to select ; so there appears to be a good deal of ground for thinking that they were to go some distance inland.

Viscount FINLAY : They seem to have contemplated a sort of Esquimaux settlement under the care of the Moravian Missionaries, a sort of town.

Mr. GEOFFRION : And several of them, possibly. Your Lordship

p. 705

Viscount Haldane.

Mr. Geoffrion.

must appreciate that these Esquimaux dwell in length, if I may use that expression. They do not go inland. They travel fast along the shore. The intention of the Moravians may have been to choose the best places along the shore where the bulk of the 100,000 acres would have been useful. Tilling is out of the question in one mile and two miles. I think I can suggest that the King was thinking of having granted only one mile ; but one mile, two miles, or three miles would give them timber in all the valleys—not very big timber, but enough timber for their needs. They would have to choose certain good places along a tremendously long shore. Your Lordships have photographs in this book of that shore, and you could have a very long area of two or three miles in depth where there would be comparatively few havens to select missions for the Esquimaux. These Moravians' own information was slight. They had scarcely been there at the time. They were not established there ; it was a venture. They had discovered only one thing, which was that these Esquimaux were cousins of the Greenland Esquimaux, and therefore spoke the same language, and they could probably be approached by these Moravians who had been to Greenland. They would ask for a big strip of land, which would be granted, and no Government in England would think that they were seriously encroaching on any hunting ground of the Redskins by giving 100,000 acres where the Esquimaux could be reached, considering that the Esquimaux, with their training habits, mode of life, and enmity of Red Indians, do not go inland at all. Dr. Grenfell says in Volume V at page 2568, that he knows of no building that was ever further than 250 yards from the coast along the Labrador shore ; and Dr. Grenfell is a very great authority.

Viscount HALDANE : I am not very much troubled about how far it extended, because, after all, the Governor of Newfoundland was the person who had the military forces of the Crown there under his command, and he was the person to protect people, even if they were not in his own jurisdiction.

5 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Your Lordships appreciate that the main answer is the answer made by Mr. Macmillan ; but a lawyer may be pardoned if he tries to give an alternative answer when he does not know whether the main answer has been successful. That is why I am making this point. The main answer is an Imperial grant. I want to challenge the idea that there was an intention of going very far inland ; they would not go inland on account of their purpose.

My last point is : Was the Governor of Newfoundland specially delegated by Imperial instructions as to this ? Who else could be ? There was no government ; it was under the direct home Government. The only access to the territory was by sea. Who else could be chosen to bring these men there, to see to their welfare, to their protection, control them, and so on, except the Governor of Newfoundland ? Certainly not the Governor of Quebec.

p. 706

Viscount HALDANE : There was no one else with any troops.

Lord Sumner.

Mr. GEOFFRION : It was not troops, my Lord, it was ships.

Viscount HALDANE : But there are ships full of troops.

Mr. GEOFFRION : It would have been beyond the jurisdiction of the Governor of Quebec anywhere except when you come to the last grant, the grant of 1818, when it would have been in Quebec ; partly, not all. But the first two grants where the areas are mentioned were made when the hinterland was Imperial property and not Quebec property.

Viscount FINLAY : But these Esquimaux were children of the sea ; you never find them going far.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Mr. GEOFFRION : They cannot. They feed on sea products, they live on the sea shore, except in certain climatic conditions ; they have not the canoes to travel inland.

Lord SUMNER : Dr. Grenfell says, on page 2569 : “ Esquimo Indians, natives, are in an entirely different category. They must have winter houses, and these must be in, or near, woods. Distance from high water no longer matters, for good transportation is afforded by sledges over the snow and ice.” He points out on the previous page : “ Since the nearness of timber to the landwash recedes as one goes north, it is obviously impossible to draw any line that would be suitable for all regions. North of Cape Mugford, wood is not cut by Newfoundlanders at all ; north of Hebron there is none to cut.” So apparently the Esquimo Indians who must live in or near the woods in winter had to go some distance inland.

5 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Your Lordship will notice when I made my statement I qualified the season. I had that part in mind and I qualified the season. My point was exclusively the canoe navigation proposition. Then I come to the winter. In winter they need not go 12 miles inland in that area of Esquimaux Bay to find wood. When you get to Ungava Bay the amount of wood that grows there is extremely scarce you are in the desolate regions, but though the Esquimaux live where there is hardly any wood, they prefer a forest if they can get it. According to Dr. Grenfell, the Moravians built houses near the sea. I might say the hinterland was nobody's until 1774, according to our view. From 1763 to 1774 we say that the hinterland was Imperial; when I say it was nobody's, I mean Imperial. From 1774 onwards we say it is Canadian, unless we are wrong on the Quebec Act. and then it remained Imperial until 1818. But could it be suggested that in the earlier grant, when admittedly Quebec had no right there, the Governor of Quebec would be ordered to take care of these people or both Governors jointly ? It had to be the Governor of Newfoundland. That is what I have to say on this particular question, my Lord.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

Mr. GEOFFRION : May it please your Lordships, I had reached 1826. I suggest that until 1826, subject to what I said with regard to the fishery and fur trade and Moravians, there is nothing in any Newfoundland action that can be suggested as bearing on the question. I gave my reasons why neither of these aspects were of any help to Newfoundland. 1826 is pretty far away from 1763, sixty-three years after. We found one thing. Would your Lordships refer to Volume III, at pages 1406 and 1412 ? All the Newfoundland possession is contained in Volume III.

Lord WARRINGTON : This is a complaint about a salmon fishery ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : We have it that he was recently appointed by the Newfoundland Governor as a Judge under some recent legislation providing for the better administration of justice on that coast.

Lord WARRINGTON : This is the salmon fishery in Rigolet.

5 Nov., 1926.
Mr. Geoffrion.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes ; it is litigation about the Kinnamon Brook salmon fishery. We find there, my Lord, that the Honourable William Paterson of the Royal Navy has been made a Judge. I wish to dwell upon that. It is suggestive of the sort of jurisdiction. This Naval Officer was made a Judge, and so the Court must chiefly have sat in ships, although not exclusively. The fact against us suggested is that he is applied to by Brunet of Quebec through their partner, Tourzeon, which is a well known French name, who resides at Rigolet. He wants to sue Joseph Bird of Sturminster, England, by his agent Timothy Craze of Tub Harbour in this Bay (Tub Harbour is in the bay outside of Rigolet) about the trespass of some sort upon the salmon fishery in Kinnamon Brook. In 1826 we find this Naval gentleman being a Judge, authorising the suit, and on page 1412 we find him visiting the property. Beyond that the thing ends ; he never gives judgment apparently.

5 A

Sir JOHN SIMON : I called attention to a passage where Judgment is recorded.

Mr. GEOFFRION : I am sorry ; I must have missed that. I am under the impression that there is none. If I am mistaken, I apologise to your Lordships, but I do not think there is any.

The Lord Chancellor.

Sir John Simon.

At all events, my learned friend will correct me if I am wrong. It is not very material, because that is not my point. It is not part of my argument whether he did or not. I am instructed that he did not give Judgment in this case. My argument is this : Brunet is one of the several Canadians who were in Lake Melville long before the Newfoundland Government knew it existed and had been there very shortly after the conquest. He has a fishery there, and some gentleman who lives in England and who apparently has a fishery on the coast proper at Tub Harbour, where he has an agent is guilty of trespass on that river. It is the most natural thing in the world that Brunet's agent living at Rigolet should apply to a Judge who happens to come for the first time, and who has jurisdiction over Tub Harbour on the coast, where the Defendant trespasser has property, and ask him to adjudicate. I do not exactly see what use a suit in Quebec would have been to Brunet against Mr. Bird living in Sturminster, England, and having an agent at Tub Harbour on the Newfoundland Labrador coast. It is a case where the plaintiff, trespassed upon in his property (I do not care where it was) applies to the first Judge he finds coming from Newfoundland, to get his remedy out of the property of the Defendant which is all, in my submission on the Newfoundland-Labrador Coast. I do not think that there is any significance in that particular point.

Then, my Lords, that is the judicial function that we find. My learned friends will find reports of that Judge in that year going round visiting various places.

5 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Geoffrion.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I do not think, Sir John, that you gave us the reference. I have got a note of your argument at that point, and I find these pages noted up to page 1412, and then my record ceases.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I very much regret it if I failed to do so, my Lord, but I know that there is such a passage. Very possibly my memory has taken the place of my words.

Lord SUMNER : There is another judge, several years afterwards, who deals with the case.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Certainly. I am certain that I read that to your Lordships.

Mr. GEOFFRION : But that is 60 years afterwards, in 1880, and it is another Judge and another suit. That is something else. I am going to deal with that point later on, but I am speaking of the incident of 1826 and not the 1880 incident.

p. 709

The LORD CHANCELLOR : The Court was abolished in 1834.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes, my Lord. That is another Court entirely.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : It was abolished in 1834, and it was set up again in 1863.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes, my Lord. I have seen elsewhere in this record, information about the visits of Captain Paterson to various place, and his staying at various places, but I have not noticed that he has suggested having exercised any jurisdiction or done anything in respect of what we claim is not the coast.

I might point out to your Lordships that we are not interested in challenging acts of jurisdiction upon what we admit to be the coast. I am willing to admit that there is here a suggestion of Rigolet on the coast, and I am willing to admit that it is, in so far as it goes, a microscopic argument in favour of Newfoundland's jurisdiction of Rigolet proper, because this Captain apparently moored his ship in Rigolet harbour, heard the complaints of this Rigolet resident against the Tub Harbour resident, which we admit is on the coast, and possibly he did something in his judicial capacity whilst at Rigolet. No doubt he was on board his ship and not in the most uncomfortable houses there ; but at all events, this was insignificant and it is not worth while dwelling upon it. I do not see that it is a great affirmation of jurisdiction to Newfoundland that, being asked to adjudicate in respect of a trespass committed in Canada, he would go and visit the scene of the trespass. That is all that there is there. Otherwise, I do not deny that you can find passages where this gentleman says that he went to many places ; but I do not see that he has done anything anywhere except this, and we do not hear of him any more.

5 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Now, my Lords, I should not like to take your Lordships through every point which was mentioned by my learned friend, and I can only give my general answer, answering individually only those points referred to by my learned friend which seem to me to be of the most significance. I suggest that, with regard to this period round about 1826, this is the biggest point that can be made against me. Even if it involved Rigolet slightly, it certainly involved nothing else ; and there is a debatable question as to whether Rigolet is still on the coast or within the margin of the coast, and so on. Rigolet is one of the most doubtful points, certainly.

I will not take up your Lordships' time by dealing with an incident in 1863, when a certain doctor on a ship went in and vaccinated the Indians at the head of Lake Melville. I take it that humanity, and not the assertion of jurisdiction, would be involved in that.

5 A 2

Then I do not think that I need concern myself much with what happened after the year 1890. In 1888 Judge Pinsent was warned by an objection to jurisdiction taken about a murder. Your Lordships no doubt remember the passage, and the dispute upon the question, and the correspondence which took place, which has been read to your Lordships, and which I will not refer to again. Sir John Macdonald asserted Canada's position. A few years afterwards they met at the Halifax conference, where the question was made open; and anything that happens after 1890, I venture to suggest, cannot be very illustrative. I am always trying to reduce the question to essential proportions.

Sir John Simon.

Previous to the year 1880, I have dealt with the vaccination incident and the Kinnamish River incident. I do not think I need deal much with the argument which was put forward by my learned friend, Sir John Simon, based upon a lot of affidavits about residents on the coast who say that they go and trap inland. To what extent is that an assertion of jurisdiction, or an opinion upon political limits from anybody? Gradually, through the Hudson's Bay posts and otherwise, people have, without grants from anybody at all, settled in these wild coasts. When the winter comes, they go and earn their living as they see the Indians doing, by going trapping and furring. It might be the United States or it might be China or anywhere else. Is the fact that these men go trapping inland, an assertion of jurisdiction by Newfoundland? Is it a recognition of jurisdiction in Canada? Is it the opinion of these gentlemen as to where the jurisdiction of Newfoundland stops? And even if it were, what would it be worth? I suggest that that group of facts does not bring us anywhere. But I have found two documents, or at any rate one, which I think will be very helpful upon another aspect of the matter.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Will your Lordships allow me now to give the reference that I had in my mind? I think I did read it. Lord Sumner's memory about it was quite right. It was a separate and later judge. The passage that I had in my mind, and which I thought that I had read, is at the top of page 1486. It has reference to a judicial officer of the name of Berteau in the year 1881. He says : " I performed magisterial duties where necessary. I remember determining a dispute between Fortesque, chief factor of the Hudson's Bay Company, and MacLean, in relation to the alleged barring by the latter of the River Kinnamish against Salmon." That is the passage I had in my mind, and I thought that I had read it.

5 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Mr. GEOFFRION : I had that in mind, and I was going to answer it, but I maintain what I have already said, that it has no conceivable relation to the matter of 1826 of Judge Paterson, which was never disposed of Sir JOHN SIMON : I thought my learned friend said that there had been no judicial determination of the matter.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Upon that point.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : It cannot have been a judgment in that suit.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I did not mean to say so, my Lord. All I said was that it was not correct to say that it had never been judicially determined.

Mr. GEOFFRION : I did not say that. I said that that case had never been determined. Those people were dead, and other litigants arose. It is not the same people who are fighting this trespass here. It was not the trespass previous to 1826 which was under consideration here.

Now, my Lords, it may be that perhaps in an over-zealous endeavour to save time, I had skipped this exercise of jurisdiction, which, as your Lordships will see, is from 1881 to 1890. We do not know when, but it is 9 years from 1881. I think it is so very close to the material period that its significance is extremely slight, and I thought that I might not refer to it ; but at all events, the arguments that I have given as regards the first apply to the second : and I cannot deny that there has been some exercise, or some claim, of jurisdiction on Rigolet. My claim is that the maximum of Newfoundland's claim to possession consists of isolated and very spasmodic exercises of jurisdiction on Rigolet, and it stops there.

With regard to the two documents to which I was going to refer your Lordships—

Viscount HALDANE : Upon what point is this ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : I am trying to dispose in bulk of all the affidavits, by saying that they deal with hunters generally, and that they are opinions, and that they are too late. But I want to ask your Lordships to look at page 1559, the affidavit of Thomas Blake, which gives your Lordships something which I suggest, and when it is put with what I will read later on upon the Indian question, is very illuminating. He says, at line 33 on page 1559: “ I never heard of any claim of Canada until four or five years ago, when there was a dispute between some of the trappers amongst our people and the Indians residing in the interior in connection with the fur ground which the Indians claimed to have been their fathers and grandfathers and they now wish to exclude us.” That is an indication of the Indian tradition that this hinterland was traditionally from ancient times their hunting ground. That is all that I want to make out upon that point. Alone, it does not amount to much, but it will link up with what I will read to your Lordships later on at page 1475 in the same volume, Volume III, and what is interesting there is the description of these Indians. I am going to emphasise the Frenchified—if I may use such an expression—and Catholicised character of these Indians, as being one of the strongest pieces of evidence of long and intimate connection with the French regime ; and your Lordships are only referred to that as one of the very numerous passages that I could read in support of that proposition that these Indians were all Catholicised. I do not care how deep their Catholicism is. That is not material to my question.

Lord WARRINGTON : I suppose that these Roman Catholics were probably Montagnais, who were constantly visiting Canada.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes, my Lord.

Lord WARRINGTON : They were the people who traded with the St. Lawrence, the King's posts.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes, my Lord ; and since the Hudson's Bay Company opened a post up at Lake Melville, some of them took that direction also. That is illuminating, with regard to the Frenchified or Roman Catholicised character of these Indians ; and I might suggest to your Lordships that your Lordships may assume that “ Catholic ” and “ French ” here mean the same thing. In those days the religion was part of the Government. In Canada at least the evangelising of the Catholic religion was part of the activity of the King to make them French allies ; and it is so much that I do not think they would understand or know what is an English-speaking Roman Catholic priest.

5 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Geoffrion.

We have a very interesting illustration of that in a debate between the Archbishop of Newfoundland, who was a Roman Catholic archbishop, and the Archbishop of Quebec, The Archbishop of Newfoundland, when this shore was given to Newfoundland, had to recur to the help of the Archbishop of Quebec and ask him to fulfil his function to go and meet these people when they came down to the coast. For these Indians, and for the French Government, “ French ” and “ Roman Catholic ” are the same thing. We have that piece of evidence, and that also shows how unimportant in commercial and ethnological matters the divide is. These people were going to the coast when there was no post at Lake Melville, and now that there is one, they go to Lake Melville.

5 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Geoffrion.

With regard to the point about the administration of justice in Newfoundland, I find in the same volume a series of pages, showing that from 1834 to 1863 the justice was a blank.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : We have had that. The Court was abolished.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes, my Lord, but beyond that there were appeals and complaints and so on ; there was disorder, and everybody was complaining, but that made no difference. I suppose that your Lordships will accept my summary of it, but I have the pages and can refer to them if necessary. They are pages 1425, 1426, 1427, 1430 and 1492.

p. 713

Now, my Lords, the Customs Duties Department of Newfoundland is the only point that I have not yet dealt with. My suggestion is that that remained until 1863. There was an attempt made in 1841 to collect duties, and your Lordships had the correspondence read to you about it, where the merchants complained against Newfoundland exacting Customs duties, and the Imperial Government ruled in favour of the Newfoundland Government. But if your Lordships will turn to page 1514, at about line 20, you will see that it there says : “ About fifteen years since a similar demand was made by the Governor of Newfoundland ; the parties interested in the trade on the coast of Labrador, applied to the Imperial authorities by petition and otherwise on the subject, since which no demand was made by the Governor of Newfoundland.”—15 years ago is 1841, the time of the correspondence whereby the Labrador merchants complained that Customs should not be paid. Then you read, in line 23, that “ It was considered the right then asserted to collect duties on the coast was abandoned.” I am suggesting, therefore, that the effort of 1841 to collect duties was very weak. I do not say that they did not get a few dollars, but at all events it was not much.

Then, if your Lordships will turn to page 1518, you there have the first indication of a systematic endeavour to collect Customs in 1863. Therefore, we have the Customs question arising in 1863. How does that really have any influence upon the point that we are considering, namely the interpretation of the document made, resulting from continuous and lengthy action by one party, acquiesced in by the other ? I am trying to give a definition in my own words of what I suggest is a paraphrase of the judgment.

In 1863 they began to collect the Customs, and I am not challenging their right to collect Customs. They own a barrier there unquestionably, separating Canada from the coast. They can be as discriminating as they like. They can say : “ We will not insist upon Customs going to Ungava, but we will insist, upon Customs going to Ashuanipi.” But as far as Canada is concerned, Canada has nothing to say. The barrier must be passed, and Newfoundland can require what it likes for letting it be passed. It is a barrier, and we must submit to whatever the position is.

Viscount FINLAY : What pages were you referring to ?

Mr. GEOFFRION: Pages 1514 and 1518. This, I suggest, gives your Lordships what is material on the Customs question, with my admission that they have the right to collect Customs. They have their post at Rigolet, and to that extent it is an assertion by them, possibly that their jurisdiction went to Rigolet, but nothing more. There was no interest for Canada going and saying : “ Move your post further out.” It would not have changed the situation at all. Therefore, I suggest broadly that on analysis, and when it is sifted, the Newfoundland chapter on possession, in so far as it has a bearing on the question, as to throwing light by common and constant and

p. 714

lengthy action, upon the meaning of the legislation, is remarkable by its insignificance. There is no doubt that starving Indians were aided in the recent times, and perhaps earlier ; but I do not know who would not do that.

Now, my Lords, this brings me to what I suggest is an extremely important chapter.

Lord WARRINGTON : May I interrupt you for one moment, just to go back to page 1519. You will see there that there is a notice issued by the Colonial Secretary, or at any rate by the Government of Newfoundland that “ revenue will be collected on that part of the Labrador Coast lying within the Government of Newfoundland and the proceeds applied so far as may be necessary to the expense of protecting the fisheries on that Coast and of the maintenance there of a court of Limited Civil and criminal Jurisdiction.” That seems to be protested against, but only by merchants, including, I think, the authorities of Hudson's Bay. It is not a protest by Canada.

Lord Warrington.

Mr. GEOFFRION : I do not see exactly how they would be hurt very much. Your Lordship must appreciate the position. Canada's claim was, and still is to-day, on Indian hunting grounds ; and, of course, the news of Customs duties would not travel very much over there. Your Lordship must not forget that this is still a wilderness and still an Indian hunting ground inland. The position has changed very slightly there. The hunting grounds elsewhere have disappeared, and the Indians are hemmed into the reserves. The Montagnais are one of the few tribes that still remain at large, because this territory has not been invaded by the white people. Your Lordships must re-remember that an act of that kind would have to be very emphatic to have reached Canada ; and particularly, also, the protest was wrong. Canada could not object, in our view, to duty being collected. How could Canada have said that Newfoundland could not put up its Customs barrier on this boundary, when the boundary was being crossed ? It might have been done by an agreement for payment of duty in bond, but that is another matter.

Mr. Geoffrion.

My Lords, I suggest therefore that the possession chapter if considered in the light of the two considerations, first, that we do not deny that there is an absolute control of a strip of coast, secondly, that what is required is a sort of action

5 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Geoffrion.

acquiesced in, emphatic and serious enough to show an understanding on the subject, and long enough to be used as interpreting the documents, and if you remember how wild and remote that part was from Canada there is nothing I suggest, there that in any way advances the Newfoundland claim to the land,

Now I intend to come, with your Lordships' permission, to a very important chapter. the French regime chapter of Canadian possession, and then my last chapter will be the Canadian continuance of it. The French regime part is important in my humble view from two points of view, first from the point of view that it is a circumstance existing at the time of the Proclamation, it was previous to it, and second from the

5 Nov., 1926.

—
Mr. Geoffrion.

p. 715

point of view that it is a circumstance bearing on the Indian question which in itself I suggest bears on the coast question, When I say "the coast" question I mean the meaning of the word "coast" as regards the matter of the extent of the Indian reservation because your Lordships will appreciate this, being the Indians' hunting ground ex hypothesi, the relations with the Indians will be the evidence of the French jurisdiction, possession and control.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I do not quite see why it is important yet, it was all French at that time except the Hudson's Bay Territory.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Not from the point of view of possession strictly, but from the point of view of the question whether these were Indians under the protection of the King, and connected with him, and so on. The possession previous to the Canadian regime cannot be said to be strictly important on that branch, it is important on the other branch, because I say it throws some light indirectly on the other question because undoubtedly when you see how deep and how ancient were the ties between these Indians and the French-Quebec Government it is difficult to assume that it was all broken asunder in 1763, and there is evidence that it was not. The second branch is the least important, the first one is the more important of the two, but I want to treat both together.

In this respect I have to challenge very seriously the suggestion on the historical field of my learned friend Sir John Simon. If your Lordships will turn back to page 2704 in Volume VI, the bulk of my references will be from that volume. I can sum it up in a few words, it is part of the relation of Champlain who published a book of his voyages and so on. You will notice there that there was concluded at Tadousac, or a place quite near to Tadousac an alliance as early as 1603 between the Indians of that district anyway and their enemies who were the Iroquois. The scene is picturesquely related : There was the smoking of the pipe and so on, I will not delay your Lordships' time on all these details, the essence of it. is that in 1603, five years before the finding of Quebec, Champlain made an alliance with the Algonquins represented evidently by the Montagnais against, the Iroquois, and it rather suggests that it was the turning point in the conflict that ended on the Plains of Abraham in 1763. It may seem to your Lordships far fled, but I want to show the importance of that alliance as starting the political relations. What we have therefore is in 1603 the alliance. Your Lordships know where Tadousac is, Tadousac is on the eastern side of the Saguenay River right where was the Head Office of the King's Posts, therefore the chief rendezvous of these Montagnais Indians and whatever Naskapis could come down from a distance for the very simple reason say like the St. John's and the rivers above were the best navigating channel to go through the woods. When Champlain penetrated there before he found Quebec he found Indians on that coast, listened to their story, and possibly mistakenly made an alliance which was the foundation of the history of New France afterwards.

The Lord Chancellor.

Mr. Geoffrion.

5 B

p. 716

Before I go on and show the importance of it may I ask your Lordships to turn to page 2712. Your Lordships will bear in mind these are the Montagnais, they cannot be any other, with some Naskapis.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Does my friend say that page 2704 records the making of an alliance, because I do not see the line at the page.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Lines 18 and 19 : “ Faire paix avec leurs ennemis (qui sont les Iroquois), ou leur enuoyer des forces pour les vaincre.” Later on after the “ Ho, ho, ho,” that is approval, that means, Oui, oui, “ Luy, continuant toufiours saditte harangue.” That is the Indians answering.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I should have thought it was a party.

Mr. GEOFFRION : It is lines 18, 19 and 20.

Sir JOHN SIMON : It is a festivity.

Mr. GEOFFRION: It is a festivity, they all did their things in festivities.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : They had taken some natives to France, and one of them made a harangue to the natives, they listened in great silence and finally said : “ Ho, ho, ho,” which means, “ Yes.”

Mr. GEOFFRION : The point is it was stated that he would get peace from their enemies, who were the Iroquois, or would help them to defeat them. Your Lordships will see what happened afterwards. They thanked him. Line 19 is that the alternative to peace is war, and at line 20, war, because I suppose the Indians in answering were quite convinced there was no peace. I can quite see the Ambassador for France speaking of peace or war at line 18, and then I can quite see the Indians speaking only of war because they had had experience of peace. One can understand how Treaties were made, they did not write them.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : It is translated “ Festival ” up above.

Mr. GEOFFRION : “ Faire paix avec leurs ennemis (qui sont les Iroquois), on leur enuoyer des forces pour les vaincre.” Then, of course, that is the starting point ; there is no doubt a Treaty between Champlain and these Indians could not be a formal document of this sort, but it was followed up very seriously by battles which ended in endless wars. All I want to say is there we have the fact of Champlain telling them we will either get peace from your enemies, the Iroquois, or we will help you to defeat them, and they are asserting we are glad you are going to help us defeat them. I take it that that is as high a treaty as you could make with these people then. Page 2712 is from another point of view. Page 2712 may seem perhaps rather beside the question, but I think it is very material. We are as far back as 1664. Of course, there has been a long series of intercourses and things of that sort to which I will refer in a moment. What is important is these people are always Indians, you have got there Tekwerimat head of the Algonquins of Quebec, these are the Montagnais you will see later on.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : What is that letter which looks like 8 ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : It is a “ W.”

Viscount FINLAY : Where is that ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : Line 18.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : It keeps on occurring.

Mr. GEOFFRION : If you look at line 13 you will see the answer to the doubt your Lordship expressed : “ des sauvages nos alliés, lesquels ignorent nos lois et les piénes ordonnées.” There is no doubt about the alliance. Then the difficulty was this, I will try and sum it up again, all these Indians were there for a very serious question, a certain Indian had committed rape on a French woman and they wanted to punish him. The Indians, who are not as bad lawyers as all that, said : That is not correct, under our laws it is not a crime, and you should not punish a man who did something which he did not know was a crime. The French accepted the view and let the man off with a mere civil indemnity in consideration of these leaders agreeing on behalf of their followers in the future to approve the criminal laws. It was an acceptance of the criminal laws of France as regards these Indians. “ Et Jean-Baptiste Pipouikih, capitaine Abnakiouis, afin de répondre pour le dit Robert Hache et voir dire que, pour réparation du dit viol, le dit Robert Hache auriot méritç d'être pendu et étranglé.” The Indians knew that murder was a criminal offence, but not this.

5 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Not for a first offence apparently, if you look at line 31.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes. It is an acceptance by the Indians, the question is whether these Indians are connected with the French regime. I will then come to the point whether they pass to the English regime afterwards. You have here Frenchmen asserting the right to impose their criminal law on the Indians, and you have the Indians agreeing to have them imposed in the future.

5 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Viscount HALDANE : It is all French territory.

Mr. GEOFFRION : I am trying to justify that they were Indians under the King of France and connected with the King of France.

5 B 2

p. 718

Viscount HALDANE : Naturally they were.

Mr. GEOFFRION : If that is granted, well and good, but what I am dealing with is those who were under the protection of the King of France, would become automatically by the Treaty of Paris, at all events they became expressly by the capitulation of Montreal under the protection of the King of England and if they were wards of the King of England in 1763 they are among the very persons designated for whose benefit the reserve is made.

Lord SUMNER : There seem to me to be two points on this, whether the Indians in the region in question were entitled to the benefits of the Articles of Capitulation which were extended to the Indians, that is one point ; the other point is whether the recitation on page 156 of the Proclamation : “ that the several nations or tribes of Indians with whom we are connected, and who live under our protection ” constructively goes back to people who had lived under the protection of the Most Christian King, that is to say, by operation of international law, the Most Christian King having been defeated and conceded these territories, those who had been under his protection are now under the words of the Proclamation of 1763.

Lord Sumner.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Practically I suggest there could be no others. My suggestion is that this is a pure and simple case ; of course, I must undoubtedly establish the link suggested, there is material. I can certainly argue—I think I can argue, that by the Treaty of Cession, automatically the Indians who had been Indians under the French King, whether they actively did or did not participate in the War against England, the moment the War was ended, peace was made. If they were Indians who were wards of the French Government in the sense in which all these Indians had become, then by having their natural livelihood conditions changed, these Indians became wards of the English King, I suggest automatically, particularly when I show your Lordships later on that these Indians, provided that they became Catholics, were automatically French subjects. Of course, I cannot make all my points in one document ; when they became Roman Catholics they became automatically French subjects. They were protected by legislation and they were legislated against also. They were therefore connected with the King of France under his protection ; they were the nearest Indians to the Quebec settlement, the Capital, the first ones who would have been thought of, the first ones General Murray would meet, the others were much further away. All these Indians in this territory were French citizens, having been with France because, as I pointed out, the Iroquois, who my learned friend suggests were Indians, could not be dealt with by this Proclamation. They had been taken care of long ago, they did not live in New France, but in New York. That is the whole argument ; I cannot approach the point without taking the documents one by one. These things are not said in one document alone, but my point is, if I can generalise it, that from 1603, continuously to 1759 till the close of the war which was ended by the Treaty in 1763, all these Indians were subjects of the King of France by law and by practice, being legislated both against and for, and being declared French citizens. Further, apart from the political relation, which is very intimate, as your Lordships will see, there was the religious relation. It had been part of the instructions to Champlain by his King to turn them Catholics, because if they became Catholics they would be considered to be allies or followers and devoted supporters of the French cause, in fact, French citizens, and that was given to those who were Catholics, and the missionaries activities were so fruitful, that we find even to-day in Esquimaux Bay, they will not go to trade there unless a French priest comes up from Quebec

Mr. Geoffrion.

p. 719

Lord WARRINGTON : Mr. Geoffrion, if we can make anything of this at all, if it is any use at all, we want to know who these Indians are. Now you see they are enumerated in that document on page 2712.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes.

Lord WARRINGTON : They do not come from Labrador at all.

Mr. GEOFFRION : The Chef de Tadoussac was necessarily the head of the Montagnais.

Sir JOHN SIMON : What if he was.

Lord WARRINGTON : They are described as the Chief of the Algonquins of Quebec, the Chief of the Tadoussac, the Chief of the “ sauvages Nepissiriens.”

Mr. Geoffrion.

Sir JOHN SIMON : That is Lake Nipissing.

Lord WARRINGTON : Lake Nipissing, Chief of the Iroquois, and then Chief of the Abnakiouis ; they are the Indians assembled there.

Sir JOHN SIMON : That is Lake Nipissing.

Lord WARRINGTON : The chief of Iroquois, those are the Indians assembled there.

Mr. GEOFFRION : I am going to try to suggest to your Lordship that the chief of the Algonquins, and the chief of the Abnaquiois, are instances of two sub-divisions of these people. I would ask your Lordships to bear in mind there is no ethnological difference in the heights of land behind Quebec. Then starting from that, these Indians came down for trading at the shore and are met there, chiefly at Tadousac ; they could not trade where they hunted, and they could not hunt where they traded ; they go back to hunt in the hinterland, and they trade at Tadousac, though later on they traded further down ; they traded at Tadousac and the “ Compagnie ” had their chief post there. Tadousac was the chief meeting point of these people. Then the Algonquins of Quebec in those days must have been the Algonquins behind Quebec ; they could not have been North of the Lake Superior line ; so therefore we have them identified in two ways, and we have them identified further. May I ask your Lordships to turn to page 2719. It deals with the replacing of a leader, and this leader, your Lordships will notice at line 37, is Noel Tekouerimat, who is, at page 2712, the head of the Algonquins of Quebec, the ones we spoke of a minute ago. He is replaced. and who is there for the election ? Line 27, on page 2720 : “ La se trouverent les Francois, les Algonquins, les Montagnais, les Gaspesiens. les Abnaquiois,” and so on “ les Nipissiriniens & les Hurons.” He is the supreme leader of all these tribes, including the Montagnais, and when he is elected, line 42, page 2720, all these Captains salute this newly elected man, who had taken the name of his predecessor. He being dressed in French apparel with a stick in his hand, and so on goes to salute the Governor de Courcelle and acknowledge him as his superior, and seek protection of the King of whom he is a subject. Then, my Lords, on page 2707 is the Ordonnance, paragraph 17, “ Ordonnera Sa Majeste que les descendans les Francois.”

Viscount FINLAY : That is going back six pages.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes, my Lord, I gave that last reference because it connected with the other one, dealing with the same chief. “ Ordonnera Sa Majeste que les descendans des Francois qui s'habitueront au dit pays, ensemble les sauvages qui seront amenes a la connoissance de la foi et en feront profession, seront censes et reputes naturels francois, et comme tels pourront venir habiter en France,” etc., etc., etc. Now, my Lords, you begin with the alliance, as I call it. You next come to the acceptance of the Criminal law. You next come to the election of the chief who goes and makes his homage to the Governor and admits that he and his wards are subjects ; and you have the declaration of the Ring of France that these people are French subjects if they are Catholics, to all intents and purposes. This is only a development of the first branch of my argument, namely, that you have established an extremely intimate political connection between the Government of France, through Quebec, and these Indians. I say these are the Indians who are sometimes described as Montagnais, and sometimes as sauvages de Quebec ; in the early days they could not be called Montagnais, that could not be their name, because that was given by the French, and sometimes as Algonquins de Quebec, the three names obviously indicating these, they cannot indicate any other ; I do not know how they would indicate others ; the question is if these are indicated. If we consider that these were hunting all up the Hamilton Inlet, but coming down to trade to Tadousac mainly, and later on more to the East, it seems that the identification is established completely. Then I could read you page after page where legislative action is taken : 2709, 2716, 2722, 2724, line 20, are some of the illustrations, but only some of legislative action in respect of Indians.

p. 721

for or against them, taken by the Government. I quite admit that this legislation is general and does not refer specially to these particular Indians. Then, my Lords, this is the political connection. Now can I ask your Lordships to take what is some information from the Encyclopaedia Britannica as regards the recognised historical view of this situation. It is an article in volume 14 of the Encyclopaedia Britannica at page 476, the lower part of the second column begins, “ Algonkian and Iroquian.[sic]

Sir JOHN SIMON : Would my learned friend tell me what is the subject of the Article ; where shall I find it ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : “ Indians, North American.” There is a very lengthy article, I shall not try to read it all, it is a very lengthy and very detailed.

Lord WARRINGTON : Which Edition is this ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : 1910 my Lord.

Viscount FINLAY : Is that a French Edition ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : No, my Lord, it is the Encyclopaedia

Britannica, the 11th Edition, published in New York, apparently.

Viscount FINLAY : Then it is the American Edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes my Lord.

Viscount HALDANE : It might almost be called an American book now.

Mr. GEOFFRION : What I am going to give from there I could give from other books. It is school history with us, only it is shortly stated in a source which cannot be the subject of bias. It is very short, and I thought it might be useful to give the general situation.

Viscount FINLAY : Is it printed in the Appendix.

Mr. GEOFFRION : No, my Lord, I wish it were. “ Southward, along the Atlantic Coast, the period of actual settlement by the whites in large numbers was preceded by numerous conflicts with the Algonquin Indians in which all too often the whites (adventurous, fishermen, etc.) were principally at fault, the natives being sometimes carried off as slaves to Spain and elsewhere in Europe.” That is earlier “ When Champlain, very shortly after the founding of Quebec, decided to help his Algonquin neighbours against their Iroquoian enemies, an alliance was entered upon which had much to do with the final defeat of France in North America ;”—this is the alliance—“ the Battle fought and won by Champlain near Ticonderoga in 1609 made the Iroquois the lasting antagonists of the French, and since the former held a large portion of what is now the State of New York, the latter were effectually prevented from annihilating or destroying the English Colonies to the South. The Iroquois alliance with the English in New York was preceded by one with the Dutch. Another result of the feud between the Iroquois and the French was the destruction of the confederacy of the Hurons ”; your Lordships will see that the Hurons, whose hunting ground was one of the big Lakes, had been annihilated, therefore, there was no hunting ground for them anywhere —“ themselves a people of Iroquoian stock, established in the region between Lakes Ontario, Erie and Huron, over a large portion of what is now the Province of Ontario, although the antagonism between Hurons and Iroquois had existed even before the coming of Cartier and the inevitable conflict had already begun. As an outcome of Champlain's visit to the country of the Hurons, in 1615, the Jesuit Missionaries have established themselves among these Indians and for 35 years laboured with a devotion and sacrifice almost unparalleled in the history of the Continent. The struggle elided in the campaign of 1648-1649, in which the Iroquois destroyed the Huron settlements and practically exterminated the people, the French priests in many cases having suffered martyrdom ” and so on. “ Such of the Hurons as succeeded in escaping ” made settlements, and Quebec is about the only one left. Now there is the picture : the Iroquois are in New York State, something which has never been part of New France ; the Iroquois was always the enemy of France, except in peace time, of course, since that fight. It started after that alliance when Champlain, to redeem his promise went to fight the Iroquois at Ticonderoga, which is in New York State, where he found The Iroquois in their home. They are not residents of any territory affected by this Proclamation ; they are not people who were to be dealt with, and they are not people that the Proclamation was dealing with. They had been allies of the English for a very long time, and their rights were long ago settled, and there was nothing to be done about them or about their territory ; they were not in Canada. The Iroquois were out of the question. There were the Hurons, who had the Province of Ontario, between Lake Huron and Lake Erie, who had been exterminated, and they were all gathered as general Murray's Report shows, into a little bit of a village near Quebec, and turned into ordinary farmers, following the French civilisation view. They are still there. There were the Algonquins, beyond that from Lake Superior to the Atlantic ; and there were the groups which are South of the St. Lawrence in New Brunswick and therefore not important.

How can it be suggested they were Montagnais, part of the Algonquins and part of the Iroquois, through out were firm allies, and who would be excluded from the protective clauses. Who were included, only the Western Iroquois, or the Eastern Iroquois. Why, the Eastern Iroquois, are the ones they knew best ; the Hurons have ceased to exist as having a hunting ground. The Iroquois were English allies always, and they were not within the territory dealt with in the Proclamation. I respectfully suggest that, by elimination, of necessity this short history shows your Lordships first how strong was the connection, and how great was the connection, established in those early days, between that Iroquois group, including the Montagnais, and the Canadian Government, and that unmistakably these particular tribes were certainly included in it, and probably the principal one, and only other one, which could have been included was the Western Iroquois, and why, the Western Iroquois who were far away from the Eastern ; therefore I respectfully suggest, on that branch of the case, that the political connection has been established, and that so far as the first branch of my argument is concerned, we have unmistakably these Indians connected with the King of France, living under his protection, and that it is only Indians coming from the French regime, which could be dealt with by the Proclamation : and do not think we could construe the capitulation as limiting the protection engagement to only those who actually fought. I might say to your Lordships that we have no clear evidence one way or the other, whether the Montagnais fought the English during the French wars or not ; I do not think there is any evidence of that ; what we have is, that a few years afterwards, when Penstock revolted, the Montagnais refused to revolt and remained loyal. That is before 1763, and is pointed out by the Memorialists to the English Government in Quebec ; but we do not know whether they fought with the French ; it is extremely likely they may have, because the French would have called on anyone they could get ; and if any of these Indians fought with the French, they must include these Montagnais. It is only an inference, we have no evidence ; I do not know that I can suggest they were under the protection of the King of France, and protected by him, but I suggest the capitulation does not make it a condition that they should have fought against the English ; they have included the most important class they wanted to protect, but it is not saying you can do what you like with those who did not fight at all, but are nevertheless under our protection. Your Lordships must not forget that the conditions of the Indians had been materially altered by the advent of the white man. They had been hunters, and had become accustomed to the needs of civilisation, so we had modified their ways of living, so that they needed that protection, and they were French subjects. What reason is there why they should not have passed to the control of the English, and is that control to ill-treat them, to persecute them, and administer them like every other Government is supposed to administer their authority ? Can it be denied that these Indians became subjects of the British Crown, and if they became subjects of the British Crown, can it be denied that the British Crown owed its duty to these Indians as well as any other Indians: and why distinguish between these Indians because the Coast of Labrador was put under the care and inspection of the Governor of Newfoundland ? The duty which was owed to them must certainly have been in the mind of the Government or of the capitulating parties. That is the political aspect. I need not say that this political connection lasted for some 150 years, from 1603 to 1759, and it was a very intimate one. Added to that is the religious aspect. I now propose to deal briefly with the religious aspect.

Mr. Geoffrion.

5 C

p. 724

The LORD CHANCELLOR : If this is going to be a long topic, this will be a convenient point at which to adjourn.

MORNING SESSION.

Mr. GEOFFRION : May it please your Lordships, the point on which I would like to say a few words now is this. Your Lordships had a statement in opening that there were only a few Indians in those parts, and my learned friend, Mr. Macmillan, gave you the Murray Report, which suggests that coming to the St. Lawrence there are only 300 families ; 300 families might seem to your Lordships to be an insignificant number, and I do not know whether your Lordships might be impressed with the idea that that is in Indian terms an insignificant number. I want to point out to your Lordships by a few figures, if it is thought useful, that they were in population fully up to the standard of all Indian tribes. Your Lordships will appreciate that the test of density of population was very different in those days in that country from what we understand to-day. The Indian was a hunter, nothing but that, and a careless hunter, and, naturally, he wanted a tremendous area to live on, an area that depended on the quantity of fur animals living in the given territory, the matter of forests, and so on. General Murray says in his report that something like 300 families came to the King's Post and other posts on the St. Lawrence. The average generally taken for Indian families would be five per family ; that would be about 1,500. I wish to point out in the first place that there were really more Indians than that. The war obviously had directed Indians in other directions or in no direction at all, probably keeping away ; and in addition to that, I want to point out that if you had 1,500 they would have been fully up to the average of the other tribes.

On the first point, the Hudson Bay Census, at Volume V, page 2287, gives the population at various posts at something like 4,000 for all Labrador.

8 Nov., 1926.

—
Mr. Geoffrion.

Lord WARRINGTON : Where is it on page 2287 ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : I can give your Lordships something more easy than this reference. This reference, I am instructed, is taking the various posts in Labrador at about 4,000, but I can save your Lordships trouble by turning to Low's Census in 1895.

Viscount FINLAY : Have you gone away from this ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : My learned Junior will give me the precise reference in a minute ; I will suspend it and if I can conveniently give your Lordships the line I will do so presently. I would ask your Lordships, therefore, to eliminate that reference now, because I cannot

p. 729

put it in a convenient form. I would ask your Lordships to look at page 2608, line 8.

Lord WARRINGTON : What is the date of this ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : This is 1895, but it is common ground and historical fact undoubtedly that the Indians do not progress; the conditions are not such that they can do so. There were 3,500 Indians in the Labrador Peninsula.

Lord WARRINGTON : This is in the whole of the Peninsula, is it ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes, my Lord. That includes, therefore, Hudson Bay territory also, but your Lordships remember that the Indians there, leaving out the Eskimos, are purely and simply Naskopis and Montagnais.

Viscount FINLAY : Who were the whites ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : That was in 1895. They were Hudson Bay traders and there were fishermen along the fringe of the coast. These men are right on the coast ; they do not play any part in the argument I am making. Bell, in 1895, gives 3,000, at page 2653.

Viscount FINLAY : You were on page 2608.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes, my Lord, page 2608, line 8.

Viscount FINLAY : You have done with that, have you ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes, my Lord. I am now at page 2653, 1895 ; that is Bell. The Indians are shown in the last line on the page. They number 3,016.

Lord WARRINGTON : The white population is very much larger than that. It is 13,000 out of 18,000.

Mr. GEOFFRION : I will confess that the censuses are not made very accurately ; perhaps the truth is to be found in the next reference, from the great Labrador authority, Cabot, who says it is from 3,000 to 4,000 ; that is at page 2622, line 1[sic].

Lord Warrington.

Viscount FINLAY : The date of that is 1922.

Lord Sumner.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes, my Lord. The only dates for which we can now get figures of these Indians are recent, but I think it is common ground, and it is a historical fact, that Indians do not increase and have not been increasing since the white man came. This is only one branch.

5 D 2

p. 730

Mr. Geoffrion.

Lord WARRINGTON : He says : “ Of these, the Montagnais, who are all tributary to Gulf or Saguenay trading stations, make up more than half.”

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes, my Lord. Then there are the Naskopis to be added.

Lord SUMNER : Just finish the sentence : “ It is difficult to arrive at a census of such a wandering people, for in one year and another some of them appear successively upon coasts remotely apart.” That appears to show that their habits are such that they could not be said to be particularly attached to any one district, because sometimes they visit one coast and sometimes another.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Certainly, My Lord ; that is part of our case : that the watershed plays no part in the hunting ground. These men go to trading posts on either coast, indifferently ; their hunting ground is in the middle, athwart all the plateau ; they can go as easily to one coast as to the other, they go to where the trading posts are. Of course in this period the Hudson's Bay Company has established and developed important trading posts at the head of Esquimaux Bay and Hamilton Inlet and therefore, naturally, at that period and since quite a while, quite a number of these Indians went to the trading posts at Esquimaux Bay, possessed by the Hudson's Bay Company. But we do not say that they are attached to the trading posts on the St. Lawrence, on the contrary, we say that these men had as a hunting ground, all the plateau, from which they could approach either coast easily.

Now, my Lords, coming to the second branch of this argument, we have obtained from the British Museum a book entitled “ The Eleventh Census of the United States ; 1890.” What is useful in it is that it contains the result of the census taken in 1764 by Colonel Bouquet.

Sir JOHN SIMON : A very famous man.

8 Nov., 1926.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes. I want to read from the first page of the introduction ; it is not paged, but it would be page 3.

Viscount FINLAY : Is that document in the books ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : No. my Lord.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Lord SUMNER : Is that census all in one volume ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : My Lord, the part I am going to refer to is all in this volume.

Lord SUMNER : But I want to know how to get the volume, in case I should desire to do so.

p. 731

Mr. GEOFFRION : It is the Eleventh Census of the United States, 1890.

Lord SUMNER : It is all included in one volume, is it ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes, my Lord. I will give the title of the book : “ Report on Indians taxed and Indians not taxed in the United States, except Alaska, on the Eleventh Census, 1890.”

Lord WARRINGTON : But that is in the United States.

Mr. GEOFFRION : That is the heading of the book ; but when I come to the list here, I can deal with something that goes back to 1764.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Let us hear it.

Mr. GEOFFRION : The Algonquins number 300 warriors, which would amount, on the average of five to a family, to 1,500 people. The Nipissings were 400 warriors ; that is also on the same page. The Abenakis were 350 warriors. Then the Shawnees on the St. Lawrence ; they are in New Brunswick and South Quebec ; they do not play any part here, because the St. Lawrence was an effective barrier between the two sorts of Indians. Then the Micmacs were 700 ; they were also south of the St. Lawrence.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Are those all Algonquins ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : No, my Lord, the Algonquins are about 300.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Is that all they were ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : Those are the western Algonquins : they are the same as the Montagnais.

Viscount FINLAY : I find some difficulty about this. This has not been printed, as I understand ; it is not in the papers before us.

Mr GEOFFRION : There is nothing very much in it, either way ; it is an endeavour to avoid the possible impression that the Montagnais, whose numbers are given in the record, would be a comparatively insignificant race. I am trying to suggest to your Lordships that if one bears in mind the mode of living of these Indians, it is the normal population of a tribe. It is extraordinary how thinly populated North America was when the white man came ; people do not appreciate it until they go into the figures. That is really all : it is a very minor point ; it is only in case it might be suggested that these people were so few that they need not be bothered about.

Sir JOHN SIMON : If my friend has finished with it, might I just look at the United States Census, to which he was referring—the Report of Colonel Bouquet ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Colonel Bouquet was in command of Fort Pitt. He was a very famous military officer in the Indian war.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Then as to the Iroquois, one must not forget the facts about them. The Iroquois were a confederacy of six nations. The point I will put to your Lordships in a minute is that the six confederate nations of the Iroquois, who alone defeated all the other nations and destroyed completely the Hurons, contained 1,550 warriors. That is all I wish to say on that point ; as I say, it is an incidental matter.

Viscount FINLAY : It is an illustration of the extremely sparse population.

8 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Mr. GEOFFRION : The danger of the Indians in North America was not their numbers, it was the shelter that the forests gave them, when they could pounce unawares on anybody. Any organised band of white men could deal with them easily if they were got ready, but as they could not spend all their time under arms, a hundred Indians could make tremendous havoc. The population was extremely sparse, and I would not like your Lordships to be impressed by the numbers here as meaning something relatively insignificant, and in relation to the Indian problem these Indians who were the closest, the most near-by, the most civilized, were certainly as important in point of numbers as the others.

Now, my Lords, I will be extremely brief on the religious branch. On this point we have already given your Lordship a reference to Volume VI, at page 2707, where citizenship of France is conditional on being Roman Catholic. I make a point that it links these activities to political activities. At the bottom of page 2705 of Volume VI you will see that Champlain, the first Governor, is instructed as part of his duties as Governor to convert to Christianity these Indians. This is only to suggest to your Lordships that the foundation of religious activities was laid early and was part of the political effort.

8 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Viscount FINLAY : Do you call attention to anything on this page ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : At the bottom of page 2705, line 32 : “ Et par le moyen de ce, et de toutes autres voies licites, les appeler, faire instruire, provoquer et émouvoir à la connaissance et service de Dieu et à la foi et religion catholique, apostolique et romaine.” Then follows what I have already quoted at page 2707, whereby the Indians who were

p. 733

Catholics were French subjects, and this links the religious effort with the political effort.

Now, my Lords, I will not give your Lordships the enormous mass of evidence gathered here showing the activities of the missionaries, but I will try to indicate the result by three short references. In 1774 we find at page 2772, line 40 : “ Our Shalloway is this instant return'd from Sandwich Bay ”—

Viscount FINLAY : What is “ our Shalloway ” ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : It must have been an officer's boat, I think.

Viscount FINLAY : A despatch boat.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Presumably. I confess I have not looked that up. “ Our Shalloway is this instant return'd from Sandwich Bay where she left our Furriers in possession of the Salmon Rivers ; they saw no sign of any Uropean having dwelt there ; it is a place much frequented by the Nescaupick Indians, a People who subsist by hunting, they are good Furriers, speak broken French, are Roman Catholics, and have traded with the Canadians many years. One family have been here this Summer and sold us about fifty pounds worth of Fur.”

This is George Cartwright's report to Lord Dartmouth in 1774. Therefore in 1774 we have the Nascopis, the most northern ones, speaking broken French and having traded long with the Canadians and being Roman Catholics.

Lord WARRINGTON : He writes from Charles Harbour ; where is that ? is that on the coast of Labrador ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : It is on the Atlantic coast of Labrador, south of Eskimo Islet.

Lord WARRINGTON : Cape Charles : I suppose it is there, is it ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes, my Lord.

Lord WARRINGTON : Just south-west of Belle Isle.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes.

Lord SUMNER : It is about 1½ in. south of Rigolet on the map.

8 Nov., 1926.

Lord Warrington.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Sir John Simon.

Lord WARRINGTON : That is another one, then.

Mr. GEOFFRION : The one I know would be south of Rigolet on the Atlantic coast ; it is another bay south of Eskimo Bay.

Lord WARRINGTON : The only one I can see is much further south than that ; it is just north of latitude 52 : Cape Charles and St. Charles River. I do not suppose it much matters ; at any rate, it is on the coast.

p. 734

Mr. Geoffrion.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Nothing turns on it, my Lord. I confess I am not prepared to answer your Lordship on that difficulty, because I did not consider it material.

Sir JOHN SIMON : There are other documents in the Record which show that this gentlemen, Mr. Cartwright, when he speaks of Charles River, is referring to the more southerly one of the two, I can check it, I know it is so. There is a good deal about furring and about salmon fishing.

Mr. GEOFFRION : I confess I have not looked up that branch because I do not think it is material to what I am now putting.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : It is explained in this very letter at page 2771.

Mr. GEOFFRION : The next reference I would ask your Lordships to take is at page 2797. Incidentally, I might answer now a query put by the Lord Chancellor, by reading something at the very top of this page : “ The Mountaineers, whose hunting-grounds are in the vicinity of the Bay, are a branch of the Cree Nation.” Cree and Algonquin are for some reason or other loosely used as being the same thing.

Lord WARRINGTON : It says : “ They are very much reduced in number.”

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes, my Lord ; these men shifted. I might point out to your Lordship, and as you will see, there is some evidence of it, that there was some reluctance on the part of these Mountaineers to go to Eskimo Bay until they could be provided with a priest, and the Hudson's Bay Company, on the pressure of Sir Donald Smith, had to arrange to have a priest come over the Atlantic to Eskimo Bay, because they were accustomed to go down to the St. Lawrence, where the Bishop of Quebec sent a priest. It is only indicative of the firmness of the link established.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Now, if your Lordships look at the bottom of page 2797, your Lordships will see on extract from Governor Simpson to William Nourse in 1845 : “ If the indians persist in a desire to visit Mingan ”—Mingan is on the St. Lawrence, where the Bishop of Quebec sent a missionary— : “ in order to meet a Roman Catholic Priest, you may state that, if they defer it for another year, we will endeavour to send a Priest to their own lands, without putting them to the trouble or inconvenience of so long a journey. This can be done hereafter without inconvenience when the vessel winters in the St. Lawrence ; but, if the Priests were to go this season by the second trip of the ‘ Marten ’ his stay would necessarily be so short, that he could only see a few of the Indians immediately round Rigolet.” Therefore your Lordships have here the Hudson's Bay Company considering as essential to the prosperity of their post at Rigolet that arrangements be made to bring a priest round there, because otherwise as the priest went to the St. Lawrence and only there, the Indians would not go to Rigolet.

Then, my Lords, we have, at the bottom of page 2820, the same language again. That is in 1862. They are dealing with the same problem, and I will not read this to your Lordships. I could give your Lordships from pages 2966 to 2084 on the missionary activities, but it seems to me that the point is sufficiently met for this case, without my further trespassing on your Lordships' time, by stating the starting point and the end. The first was the instruction to Champlain. Then we have unquestionably the activities to which references are being made everywhere ; we find these Indians are all Naskopis and speaking broken French, but French nevertheless, in 1774, at Sandwich Bay, in 1842 at Eskimo Bay, and so on. We prove, therefore, the identity of the group that went to Eskimo Bay and to the St. Lawrence, and we prove thereby the depth of the connection between them and the King of France ; and if I am right in my proposition that the King of England is successor to the King of France, it proves that they came under the English King.

Now the last branch, on which I shall be brief, is the trading branch : trading, commercial and political. On the trading branch there are three groups ; I will take them each very briefly ; I am only subdividing in order to be systematic. I am going now to refer your Lordships to Volume VII, at page 3337, line 10. I want to read this paragraph first in connection with the Fornel Grant, of which your Lordships have heard and will hear a little more in a minute.

Lord WARRINGTON : This is an application for a concession.

Mr. GEOFFRION : It is a report by a Mr. Cugnet, who apparently is lessee of the King's posts and who there objects to an application by a Mr. Fornel for a grant at Eskimo Bay, around Hamilton Inlet. He says at line 10 of page 3337 : “ Le veritable But du projet du Sr. Fornel avoit Etè de former d'ans la profondeur des Terres au dessus de la Baie St. Louis ”—that is Eskimo Bay.

Lord WARRINGTON : Otherwise Hamilton Inlet.

8 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes, my Lord—“ vn Etablissement de Traitte pour y attirer les Sauvages qui commercent d'ans les Postes fur la Coste du Nord su flueve St. Laurent, at Encore plus ceux qui vent d'ans les Postes du Domaine ”—your Lordships will see in a minute that there were trading posts on the St. Lawrence, North Shore, some belonging to private individuals and some within the King's domain. There were also inland posts far inland belonging to the King's domain : “ Et par le S'approprier a l'Exclusion des fermiers ”—the spelling is not good.

5 E

p. 736

Lord WARRINGTON : Is it “ fermiers ” ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : It must be “ fermiers,” my Lord ; I cannot see any other possible meaning.

Sir JOHN SIMON : You will see at the bottom of the page it is translated “ lessee.”

Mr. GEOFFRION : The translator then agreed with my translation : “ et des Concessionnaires des Postes de la Coste du Nord la Traitte avec Ies Sauvages Rependus dans cette partie du Canada.” That is of importance—that their were posts of the King's domain for trading inland, there were posts on the St. Lawrence, and application is made in 1749, late in the day but nevertheless early for this case, to establish a post around Hamilton Inlet, and the objection is made by the lessee of the King's post : “ You are creating a competitor for our post.” indicating again how indivisible that area is. Now if your Lordships turn to the last line on the same page, he is referring to the posts of the domain and he gives a list at the top of the following page : “ et En a En Effet actuellement d'Etablis sur les Lacs des Maskapis, atchouanipi, manikouagan, Mistaseins, et Chobnouchouiane.” I will not take up you Lordships' time beyond saving that Atchouanipi is in the Atlantic watershed in the disputed territory, and Mistaseins is in the Hudson's Bay watershed.

It is enough for my point at present. I am trying to give only what I think I need. I say the King's Domain, or the King's trading monopoly, if we prefer to call it by that name, had one post in the very heart of the disputed domain at Lake Ashuanipi, not very far, relatively speaking, from the Indians of the Eskimo Bay intended post, and had another post at Mistassini, the big lake which we know to be in the Hudson's Bay watershed.

The Fornel grant is to be found in Volume VII, page 3330.

This grant was made, and I think it is of importance. The granting words are at the top of page 3331 : “ Nous avons concédé et concédons par ces présentes à la dite Dame veuve Fornel la dite Baye des Esquimaux dite Baye St. Louis pour le temps et espace de 12 années à compter du présent jour, à prendre depuis et compris le Cap St. Gilles situé au nord de la dite Baye en remontant au Sud jusques à la Rivière des Sables icelle comprise, ensemble la Rivière Kessessakiou située au font de la dite Baye et qui se décharge jusques à la hauteur des Terres, avec les isles et islots qui se trouvent tant en dedans de la dite Baye St. Louis qu'an devant de l'étendue de terrain cy dessus concédé ; pour en jouir par la elite veuve Fornel pendant le dit temps et y faire un ou plusieurs etablissemens de pesche à loup marin ainsi que la chasse ” etc. We therefore have a grant very definitely of the Hamilton River up to its source, and of the Bay for fishing and hunting in 1749. Now this grant was carried into effect, and possession was taken. Your Lordships will find the evidence of that at page 3351, line 10 et seq. I presume the establishment was destroyed or abandoned during the war that followed shortly after, because we do not hear very much of it afterwards.

On this branch I should like to ask your Lordships to look at the Map No. 21 of the Canadian Atlas, of which the map in front of me is a detached copy.

Viscount HALDANE : Is that the whole of Labrador ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : No. This is purely to include the posts. I have given your Lordships so far the Fornel post, and some of the King's posts ; but apart from that there were a large number of Canadian concessions all on the St. Lawrence. Your Lordships will see first each side of Lake Melville and Hamilton Inlet you have the Bay des Esquimaux concession in 1749. That is the Hamilton River watershed. Then your Lordships will see a little bit to the left the Domaine du Boy, or the King's Posts. I am not concerned with the limits of the posts. The limits of the posts play a very small part. The Indians hunted where they liked. Nobody tried to restrain them. Certain definite restricted areas were built on where people could receive and exchange the furs : these were the posts; but the large area around meant nothing except that in the large territory around those posts nobody could compete with the grantee of the territory. So that all these limits do not play much part. The important thing is the physical position of the trading post, where the trading post was to which the Indians were to come.

I have pointed out to your Lordships where some of the King's Posts were. Then the third point for which I need this map is this. If your Lordships will take the north shore of the St. Lawrence from the eastern limit of the King's Posts, and follow the shore, your Lordships will see a large number of smaller grants. They are trading grants as well as fishing grants, and there were posts there. So that thereby these Indians had three groups of places to which they could come. They could come to the King's Posts either inland, or at the shore at Tadoussac, they could come to Fornel at Lake Melville, or they could come down, as fancy suited them, to any of the posts on the lower St. Lawrence. Nobody followed the Indians in the woods to decide where they went. What I have pointed out to you were really competitors. but they were the commercial activities of the French down to 1763.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I want to know what I am to infer from all this.

Mr. GEOFFRION : I ask your Lordship to infer purely and simply that that is an instance of what were necessarily the Indian relations with the French Government, at the time of the conquest. I have now finished with that branch of the case.

5 E 2

p. 738

Mr. Geoffrion.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : The reference you have given shows there was a concession to Widow Fornel of territory which surrounded the whole of the Hamilton area.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes, my Lord.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : That was granted, of course, by the French because it was their country at that time. It ran up to the height of land as far as I can see.

Sir JOHN SIMON : The terms of the concession make use of the expression " height of land " in terms. Your Lordship will find that on page 3331.

Mr. GEOFFRION : I read that passage in fact.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : The date of this was 1749, just before the change ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes, my Lord. Then this concession lapsed during the war, because there is no successor to it. It died. The war killed it, and nothing came of it afterwards. Whether the Fornel family were destroyed in the war, or went back to France we do not know.

That closes the French regime, but now I have a little to say on the last chapter of my argument—the Canadian regime. With regard to the Canadian regime, may I put it in this way.

I start with a presumption that all these numerous connections cannot have been suddenly broken. The Indians cannot suddenly have changed all their habits, the posts cannot suddenly have all disappeared, and the missionaries cannot all have quitted. I want to add something to that presumption. As regards the missionary work I will say only these few words. The dates I gave your Lordships a minute ago go down to 1862, so that the missionary influence continued till 1862. As regards the commercial part, we ask your Lordships to remember what has been read to your Lordships already about Palliser's troubles with the traders in the St. Lawrence part of his government. Palliser found the French Canadians, the Quebecers, or whatever he calls them, installed all along the St. Lawrence part of the Labrador coast. They were stubborn and fought and defended themselves to the extend that they at first carried the day, and carried too much of it in 1774 by obtaining that the coasts should be given back to Quebec. They lost ground in 1809

Mr. Geoffrion.

when the coast was taken away from them, but they succeeded finally in getting what was theirs in 1825 when they had the coast reconveyed to Quebec up to Ance Sablon. There is nothing more eloquent to demonstrate that the Canadian possession of the posts down to Blanc Sablon continued down to the conquest, and was never interrupted, because after 1825 there was no reason to interrupt it.

Sir John Simon.

The Esquimaux Bay or Hamilton possession is a little more interesting. Your Lordships will find it referred to in Volume III,

p. 739

Mr. Geoffrion.

page 1222. There is a passage there I would like your Lordships to note because I suggest it is of some importance.

Viscount FINLAY : You refer to the letter of the 24th July ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes. It is apparently, as far as I can gather from this record, the first time any Newfoundlander visited inside Esquimaux Bay. This is a report.

Viscount FINLAY : Where is Ivertoke Inlet ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : Esquimaux Bay, Hamilton Inlet, Lake Melville.

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Lord Finlay will perhaps remember it is said that the Eskimo word for “ walrus ” is “ ivertoke.” That is said to be the reason. I do not know any Eskimo myself.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Mr. GEOFFRION : The Moravians are the only ones who do. We are embarrassed by the constant change of name in respect of Hamilton Inlet. We have four names, but that is not our fault. It was something bequeathed to us.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Now my friend wants to call it Lake Melville.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Esquimaux Bay and Lake Melville is something different. Lake Melville my learned friend wants to call Groswater Bay. The passage I want to read begins at line 17 of page 1222.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Perhaps my friend would not mind reading from a little higher up, beginning with the words “ From the 13th to the 23rd.”

Mr. GEOFFRION : Certainly, I will read from that point. “ From the 13th to the 23rd I have been employed in ascertaining the extent and source of this inlet. I run up in the Brig 140 miles from N.N.W. to W. & S. distance across from 3 to 20 miles in widest part, thence I proceeded in a shallop (which a Canadian Merchant kindly offer to accompany us) with Canoes to the source, where we arrived at a Grant Waterfall or rapids, one backing the other 90 feet high. I have had communication with the Red Indians, at first they hid themselves from us, after a little coaxing and as far as we were able gave them to understand we came to assist them, they became in a short time familiar, next day I prevailed on them to come on board ; 7 Canoes of them visited us. I regaled them with plenty of beef, pudding and grog, three accompanied us up the river, 50 miles from the Brig. The Canadians have extensive establishments in the salmon fisheries, but their principal gain is the fur trade with the Red Indians. The fishing (cod) establishments up the river for 40 miles are numerous, principally americans for the season.”

p. 740

Lord SUMNER : Might I ask you this on that. If as late as 1821 there were seasonal cod fisheries up the river for 40 miles enjoyed by Americans, I suppose those would be the class of person whom the Governor by his Commission was to keep out of the Esquimaux coast if he could ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : We must first know where he starts his river. Then secondly my answer is this. No doubt he would try to keep them from getting on the coast, but once on the coast they could go as far as they liked.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Lord SUMNER : Your view is that if they eluded his vigilance and landed, and got past his strip, as you say they could go as far as they liked and fish for cod wherever they could find it ?

Lord Sumner.

Mr. GEOFFRION : The evidence is that you cannot fish cod fish inside Lake Melville.

Lord SUMNER : Whatever fish there was. I am quite sure that the Americans did not go there for pleasure. They found something to fish. Whatever it was, your view is that the Governor of Newfoundland could not stop them.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Mr. GEOFFRION : My view is that when the King in 1763 gave his Proclamation he was not thinking of the possibility of Americans finding one fiord bringing them into a river and getting into there.

Lord SUMNER : It is quite impossible for us to ascertain what passed through the royal mind in 1763. Your proposition to-day, if I follow you, is that the duties of the Governor of Newfoundland under this Commission to prevent Americans enjoying British possessions upon the Labrador Peninsular, would not enable him to follow up these gentry and turn them out ?

Lord Sumner.

8 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Mr. GEOFFRION : I think we must first determine where the jurisdiction stops, and it would be for the King, on report, to take the proper measures if he reserves the territory behind. I suggest that the possibility of some Americans eluding the vigilance of the Governor and going beyond the boundary will throw very little light on what the King intended as between the Indians and the fishery.

Lord SUMNER : I understand your point to be, for what it is worth, that whoever was to bring those Americans up that river to book, it was not the Governor of Newfoundland ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : I would have to know first where they were.

Lord SUMNER : Wherever this place is.

p. 741

Mr. GEOFFRION : That is the difficulty. I cannot say whether these particular Americans whom he saw fishing cod would be brought under the jurisdiction of the Governor of Newfoundland, or the King directly, because since they were fishing cod if they were beyond what was intended to be the coast I must be logical and say that, of course, the Governor could not go there unless he got special powers. The only point I am making is that the Canadians were established there extensively in the fur and fishery when the Newfoundlanders came. We find the Fornel there in 1749, and we find the Canadians there in 1821, and the Newfoundlanders certainly had not been there in the meantime.

Coming to Volume VII, beginning at page 3356 and going right down to page 3420, we have what I will call an almost complete chain of title. I will not say it is absolutely complete. There are a few gaps, but that is not surprising. It is, however, an almost complete chain of title from 1785 down to 1835 in respect of posts in Hamilton Inlet, and Esquimaux Bay, dealt with by Canadians in Quebec. I will simply refer to page 3356, and then leave it to your Lordships. On page 3356 we have a licence by the Quebec Government in 1784 as a starting point, to Pierre Marcoux and Louis Marchand, to trade and traffic with the Indians in Esquimaux Bay. We have them in possession in 1821, and we have a succession of titles down to 1835. I must confess that we have a gap from 1749 to 1784. There is no evidence either way. Apparently till 1749 this had been a wilderness. We have one grant to Fornel in 1749. Then we have a licence in 1784, and then a few years afterwards we begin a succession of titles which brings us down to 1835. To be perfectly accurate, I think the titles begin in 1821 and go down to 1835. I think that is really the series of titles your Lordships will find.

Viscount FINLAY : Where is the first of these titles ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : The licence is a sort of title, my Lord. That is at page 3356.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I would point out to you that there is nothing in that, because it was all Quebec.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Certainly. I am simply giving your Lordship the chain.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : What is the next link ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : At page 3401. That brings you down to the period when there could be no doubt—that is in 1815.

Viscount FINLAY : That is 30 years after the first title.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes. I have been asked to give dates when the Newfoundland regime was in force, and therefore I am told, and properly so, that 1774 down to 1809 is irrelevant because it was ours.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I wish my friend would make plain what page 3401 has to do with the matter. It appears to be the sale of some ship and gear. What is that a title to ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : I am sorry, I have given the wrong page. The page I want to refer to is 3398. That is a notarial deed in Quebec between Quebecers.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Why should not a Quebecer have an establishment ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : It is only an indication of possession. It is an indication that the transfer of rights in Newfoundland would not be made exclusively by these people in Quebec, staying there, the Newfoundland Government being completely ignored. This is only an element in the matter. All I intended to say was that this is an indication of possession. I have documentary evidence here of Canadians being in possession in that period.

8 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Sir John Simon.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Lord Sumner.

Sir John Simon.

Lord WARRINGTON : They might have had the grant while it was all Canada, because this is only a lease to somebody else.

Mr. GEOFFRION : The way this grant got there is extremely obscure. We find no trace of any grant.

Lord WARRINGTON : This is not a grant by Canadian authority.

8 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Mr. GEOFFRION : No. It is a transaction between Canadians. I am dealing with possession by Canadians. I am not dealing with grants by the Canadian Government.

Lord WARRINGTON : They may have obtained possession at the time when it was all Canada.

The Lord
Chancellor.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Lord SUMNER : This document is executed at Quebec. The chattels may have been in Quebec, the chose in action that seems to have been dealt with may have been outside Hamilton Inlet, and I have not at present found anything whatever to show that this is not consistent with a transaction entirely in Quebec in every sense of the word.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I think my learned friend will abandon this point if I point out to him this. If you look at page 3399 the title is based on a will made before a notary in Quebec in 1807—at a time when Newfoundland had nothing to do with it.

p. 743

Viscount Finlay. Mr. GEOFFRION : My point is exclusively that this was a Canadian possession. My learned friend has been suggesting arguments, which I have to meet, such as this. That the squatters of Newfoundland who went fur trading in the interior were possessing for Newfoundland. My friend has given affidavits.

Mr. Geoffrion. The LORD CHANCELLOR : Why should there not be a Canadian possession in Newfoundland ? There might have been a Dutch possession.

Mr. GEOFFRION : If your Lordship pleases. I am merely answering a suggestion by my learned friend that a squatter on the Newfoundland shore who goes inland to trade with the Indians is possessing for Newfoundland. My argument which I have suggested on possession is one which may not help, but it is on an equal footing with 75 per cent, of my learned friend's arguments on possession. That is all. I do not put it higher than that. When my learned friend suggests that a squatter on the Labrador coast that goes inland to trap is therefore showing that this was Newfoundland, I give my answer and say that if that is the case the Canadian who settles there would show to the same extent that this is Canada. That is my argument.

Viscount FINLAY : I understand your position to be that your opponent's argument is bad, but that is no particular reason for your deducing another argument equally bad.

Mr. GEOFFRION : I put it forward in ease I have not succeeded in convincing your Lordships. If I knew all that was passing through your Lordship's mind my argument would be much shorter. In case of my not being able to convince your Lordship on this matter, I say if my friend's argument seems, in your Lordship's view, to be good, I have the same argument on the other side. That is all I want to say about that.

8 Nov., 1926.
— Then I need not give your Lordships the fact that the King's Posts continued to be leased by the Government of Quebec. Your Lordships have had that. I think that is challenged. You have evidence in regard to that in Volume VI, page 2761. This is simply to show the posts which were an actual monopoly were being leased by the Government down to 1861. As these King's posts extended into the disputed territory—there were posts as far as Lake Ashuanipi—it is evidence of Governmental possession within that territory. That is all the argument is.

Mr. Geoffrion.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Which of these posts is in that disputed territory ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : The Ashuanipi one. I gave your Lordship the list of them.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Is that mentioned in this document ?

5 F

p. 744

Lord Sumner.

Mr. GEOFFRION : No, my Lord. It is simply the King's Posts, that is all.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I see they are named here. They are Tadoussac, Islets de Jeremie, Chicoutimy and Sept Isles.

Mr. GEOFFRION : All the King's Posts were leased, my Lord. Then the last branch of this case that I want to take up is that the Government of Canada has been consistently helping all these Indians with government activity. The records of payments are gathered together in Volume VI, pages 2835 to 2965. They are all shown in detail. Those are the payments for the support of these Indians. Then you have the table of payments, very lengthy tables, following this document, and it begins at page 2837.

Viscount HALDANE : What is the date of this ?

Mr. GEOFFRION : They begin in 1851.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Lord SUMNER : Note A is of some value ; it states : “ Since the year 1851 the Province of Canada and the Dominion of Canada through the office of the Superintendent-General of Indian Affairs and the Department of Indian Affairs have continued to furnish relief annually, to the Montagnais Indians at Lake St. John, on the Saguenay River and on the north shore of the Lower St. Lawrence. The next paragraph is : “ These Indians, for the most part, make their living by fur hunting in the interior of the Labrador Peninsula, leaving for their annual hunt as early as August and September and returning with their furs in the following spring. All the able bodied Indians go on these trips taking their families with them, only the sick and infirm being left behind. (Dr. McDuff makes mention of this on several occasions.) Since the year 1893 this relief has been extended to the aborigines at the trading posts in the northern and eastern portions of the peninsula where the Esquimaux and the Montagnais and Naskopi Indians foregather. It was the custom of the

Mr. Geoffrion. Department for years to send annually to Father Armand 55 pairs of blankets for distribution to destitute Indians on the north shore of the Lower St. Lawrence. In 1897 this number was increased to 75 pairs.”

Mr. GEOFFRION : But the point I want to make is this, the Indians trading in the St. Lawrence were Indians from everywhere in the hinterland. On my learned friend's theory they were subjects of Newfoundland whenever they were on one side of the watershed, and we were simply on that theory relieving their subjects.

Viscount Haldane. Viscount HALDANE : What is your theory about all this ? At that time Canada had not any grant of the hinterland of Labrador and you say Newfoundland had not got it. Well then, is your theory that the Crown making use of whatever Government was convenient asked Canada to take in hand the relief of these Indians ?

p. 745

Mr. Geoffrion.

Mr. GEOFFRION : I put it this way ; it is a big question whether at this time the hinterland was Imperial or Canadian because your Lordships remember the doubt whether the Act of 1774 gave us this territory, or whether it was given to us in 1880 by the Order in Council. The view we contend for is it was given us in 1774.

The Lord Chancellor.

Viscount HALDANE : You were excluded from it by the Act of 1825 by a line.

Mr. GEOFFRION : In 1825. The question of the meaning of the limits has been dealt with by my learned friend.

Viscount HALDANE : I am not suggesting that line gave it to Newfoundland, I am only suggesting it limited you. It seems to have a large tract undisposed of which was in the Crown and the Crown asked any convenient Government to take in hand the relief of the Indians within that region. What is your theory ?

Mr. Geoffrion.

Mr. GEOFFRION : My theory fundamentally was that it was at the beginning, this possession question is irrelevant. I am simply trying to meet the objection of the other side. Our case is independent of whether this hinterland was then in Quebec, or in the Crown. All we need to say is it was not in Newfoundland.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I do not see how the fact that the Government of the Province of Canada as it then was sent some blankets to some Indians in disputed territory who were in distress has any bearing at all on the title.

8 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Then I am quite satisfied with that.

Sir JOHN SIMON : That began in 1893, the year after Canada discovered that this place was valuable.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : 70 years after the document we have to construe.

Mr. GEOFFRION : I am quite satisfied with that because it disposes of some arguments of my learned friend which are more than 70 years after the documents.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : More than 70 years, it is 130 years.

Mr. GEOFFRION : My learned friend gave us evidence of 1810. The next thing I want to deal with is in respect of the rather

5 F 2

p. 746

important question, as I think, of the Montagnais dealing with the new. Government immediately after the Conquest. General Murray, on page 3234, at Volume 7, in 1761, writes to William Pitt. He is dealing with the murder of two Tadousac Indians at line 14 by John Collins master of a New York schooner. They are two Tadousaz Indians, I take it Tadousac Indians are the Indians of the hinterland there who came to Tadousac to trade because Indians did not live at Tadousac.

Lord WARRINGTON : That was before the Treaty.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes.

Lord WARRINGTON : This is in 1761.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Yes, it is.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Apparently near the mouth of the River Saguenay.

Viscount Haldane.

Mr. GEOFFRION : That is not the point I am dealing with. If your Lordships would let me put my argument, then it can be dealt with or discarded. What I mean is they were Tadousac Indians who had been murdered and we find at line 20 : “ By the intercession of the Hurons of Lorrette this affair has been accommodated to the satisfaction of the Savages consistant with the safety of the Prisoner and the dignity and justice of the British Government. In the course of this treaty the Savages desired I would acquaint all the King's subjects that they having submitted (61) to his Majesty's Government expected his protection and be exempted for the future from the insults of the crews of the ships trading in the river. I have in consequence begd of Genl Amherst to publish this request in the manner he shall think proper to his Majesty's Colonies, and if it was hinted to the vessels from Europe disorders may be prevented which when they happen alienate the affections of the Indians and confirm them in the bad opinion of the English nation the French have assiduously endeavoured to instill into them.”

Viscount HALDANE : Mr. Geoffrion, let us see what bearing this has. The English had won their victory over the French at this time, but there had been no disposition of the territory taken, the documents of 1763 had not come into operation, so everything was in the state of the greatest confusion. General Murray took whatever course he thought was wisest, he dealt with the case whether he had technical jurisdiction or not ; he was a military Governor.

Mr. GEOFFRION : Exactly.

Viscount HALDANE : It was his business to do the best he could.

Mr. Geoffrion.

Mr. GEOFFRION : My point is this, it is that we have there these Indians, these very Indians, the Tadousac Indians coming and saying : We want to be placed under the protection of the Conqueror and General Murray gives a Proclamation confirming that, and he reports to William Pitt. I say, there is, therefore, additional evidence, if any is needed, of the fact that these Indians who had been under the protection of the King of France, even if they had not passed by International law, under the Treaty and the Capitulation, under the protection of the King of England, were taken under his protection then. We have on page 2761 the same thing, I will not read it to your Lordships, and we have, finally, evidence how it was understood when the Pontiac Rebellion broke out, a rebellion of Indians generally, the Montagnais understanding from what had happened they had been taken in as citizens or subjects of the British Empire remained loyal. That appears at page 3243. That is all I wish to say on the question except one point, which I forgot to make in my opening remarks the other day, which I will make very briefly, and then I will retire. I may seem stubborn, but I am dealing with the conversation between Lord Egremont and the Governor of the Hudson's Bay Company just before the Proclamation was issued. My suggestion is that the more likely view of that conversation is not that the Governor then and there abandoned the Grimmington Island line and accepted the height of land as a limit, because that is my friend's case, when previously, even in 1759, and ever since 1713, they had been writing and formally insisting on the Grimmington–Mistoseny line, and particularly later, in 1774, as regards the Grimmington grant Mr. Agnew was asking up to Cape Chidley, and it was curtailed wherever the Hudson's Bay line may happen to be. My suggestion is the more likely view of that conversation is when the Governor knew, as undoubtedly was the fact, the coast for fishing purposes was under the control of the Governor of Newfoundland, as they had no coast fishing interests, or even coast fishing rights, they said : We do not care, go as far as you like. There is further this, in that respect, it is incredible, I suggest, in view of the fact that in every other grant made around that time, where the rights of the Hudson's Bay Company are always expressly mentioned and guarded, and in view of the uncertainty of the depth line of the Hudson's Bay Company, leaving aside the Cape Chidley–Grimmington question, it is incredible that this grant to the Governor of Newfoundland should not have contained similar words as we find in the Agnew grant, and as we find everywhere saying that the grant, if there was to be hinterland, would go to the limits of the Hudson's Bay Company, or rather they would have said : We grant to the Governor of Newfoundland the whole of the Labrador Peninsula except what belongs to the Hudson's Bay Company, or Quebec, which is really what my learned friend claims.

On the question of Woody Island, as I understand it, we suggest our view being that we have the Anse Sablon line inclusive.

This, my Lords, concludes my argument.

p. 748

The LORD CHANCELLOR : We understand that.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It was lest nothing was said about it at all, it might be said to have gone by default.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : You dealt with it.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I am afraid I did not. Mr. Barrington-Ward dealt with it, but I did not personally deal with it. I did not want it to go by default.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I do not understand my friend to have conceded it. That point is left entirely open.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Quite so, but you might very properly have said, as nothing has been said about it at all, that we accepted your argument.

MORNING SESSION.

Sir JOHN SIMON : There are very few things which have not been dealt with.

Now, my Lords, I am acutely conscious of the fact that the matters which are material in this important Inquiry have been canvassed before your Lordships and have been considered by the Board in great detail, but at the same time there is a good deal which I should wish to present with some brevity on the case, in view of the elaborate arguments that have been presented on behalf of the Dominion.

8 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Sir John, I daresay you have got your plans made, and I do not want to disturb them, but I would be very grateful if, at some time or other, you would go through these maps, especially the maps prior to 1763, and go through them if you will, in order of date, so that I may know just what may have been before the authors of these documents when they were framed.

Sir JOHN SIMON : It is one compartment I had down ; your Lordship will not ask me to deal with it immediately, because I have got some other things to deal with.

The LORD CHANCELLOR: Certainly.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I was going to suggest to the Board, with great respect, perhaps in the first instance, now you have heard elaborate arguments from both sides, what is well to be done is to see how far there is common ground which is material for the purposes of assisting the just conclusion ; and without in any way making an exhaustive list, it appears to me that there are four matters, at any rate, which can now fairly be claimed to be common ground as between the two sides, or at any rate, to be so far indisputable, that I may fairly treat them as undisputed. There are four rather important considerations which I think are now no longer matters of controversy—there may be others. The first one is this : it is not now any matter of controversy at all that the events of 1763 annexed to the Government of Newfoundland territory on Labrador. It is very tempting, of course, to make play with the idea that the primary object was, as it undoubtedly was, to supervise and control fishing operations on Labrador. That does not make any difference to what fishing operations now common ground. My learned friend, Mr. Macmillan, of course, has admitted, as you would have expected, most frankly that what we are dealing with when we are speaking of Newfoundland's rights on the Labrador Peninsula is territorial rights, and indeed, my Lords, this is a very striking fact which I have checked, and which I am going to develop if I may : the word " territories " which you will find used again and again in various documents defining and describing Newfoundland's rights on Labrador, so far as we have been able to trace it and check it, is a word which is only introduced and used after Newfoundland has this Labrador addition. We cannot find in any document, any formal document, grant, Commission or Order in Council—or what you please—it is a mere coincidence, but we do not find the word " territories " at all in the formal documents that were being used down to 1763. When you come to the enlargement of the Newfoundland territorial area you will find this word " territories " used again and again, and indeed when you come to the Quebec Act of 1774 and it became a question of transferring back, from Newfoundland to Quebec, territory which had previously been Newfoundland's, your Lordships will be struck with the circumstance that not only is the language used in the Act " territories " but the word " coast," the possibly rather ambiguous word " coast," does not appear in the Act at all. That is the first matter which is a matter of common ground and which I venture to think is worth noting.

p. 749

Sir John Simon.

Viscount HALDANE : Which Act are you referring to ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : The Quebec Act of 1774, which transfers to Quebec everything in the green area whether it is properly to be regarded as Newfoundland or not. If your Lordships would be kind enough to look at this particular point now, I should be grateful. It is in the red volume at page 158. As far as I have checked it, I think I am right, you will not find in the Quebec Act of 1774 the word " coasts." In fact we may very well conceive that when the Legislature is dealing with this process of transfer—

Lord WARRINGTON : The words on page 159 are “ Territories, Islands and countries.”

Viscount HALDANE : There is no more there than in 1763.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Not a scrap. Please do not understand me to say so, I am merely observing on the first point I am making (which I venture to suggest is well worth nothing) we are not only dealing

p. 750

here with a territorial transfer, but at a time when I can well understand there may possibly have been some opportunity for doubt, the actual language is extremely specific.

Viscount HALDANE : “ Territories ” is a very general word.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I am not saying more. Would your Lordships allow me to ask attention to the actual passages ; you will find, my Lord, the word is on page 159 at line 14 : “ And also all such Territories, Islands, and Countries, which have, since the Tenth of February One thousand seven hundred and sixty–three, been made Part of the Government of Newfoundland.” Now, my Lords, with that in mind, I still keep to my first point, my first observation about “ territories.” Would your Lordships allow me to take, I think, two references in another volume, in order to show how this word “ territories ” first comes to be used. If your Lordships will please turn to the second volume at page 393—I am afraid this is a passage which is becoming very well worn, I am sorry, but one cannot help it—there you get paragraphs 7 and 8 of the instructions issued to Governor Graves consequent upon the re–arrangement. I am putting the matter together to the best of my power. If your Lordships would look at line 29, you may take it, because I have had this carefully checked, that this expression which you find there : “ Other Islands and Territories under your Government,” and in the same way in the following paragraph at line 39 : “ Islands or territories under your Government,” that that expression is an expression which was expressly introduced into the Instructions of the Governor of Newfoundland, and was an entirely new expression not to be found in any previous document. The suggestion, which has been made rather faintly by my learned friends on the other side, that the stress I have put on the use of the word “ territories ” is overdone because it might perhaps refer to something other than Labrador, is quite unfounded. I have had the documents compared as before 1763 and after 1763, and your Lordships may take it, with quite complete confidence, I think, that the use of this word “ territories ” again and again is introduced specifically in reference to the Labrador area. I am going in a moment to show your Lordships the very striking change which is made in the Commission of Governor Graves on the same point. My learned friend Mr. Barrington-Ward has taken some special pains about this, and it is very striking. I am going to hand your Lordships, if I may, a copy of the Commission to the Governor of Newfoundland as it was before 1763, in order that your Lordships may observe what is the nature of the alterations made in that Commission when in 1763 he also gets duties at Labrador, and if your Lordships will kindly take this copy, you will see very conveniently the red ink in the margin shows the changes. (Document handed in.) They did it, as I imagine draughtsmen will do it nowadays.

p. 751

Viscount HALDANE : There is a reference to the Coast of Labrador just a few lines down on page 393.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, there are a number of references.

Viscount HALDANE : “ And carrying on a Commerce with the Indians residing in or resorting to the said Islands, or inhabiting the Coast ,of Labradore.”

Sir JOHN SIMON : Quite. I hope your Lordship will not think for a moment I am suggesting the word “ coast ” is not used. The point is that the word “ territories ” is a new word, and must be read as specifically referring to Labrador.

Lord WARRINGTON : I think you are right ; he is directed to visit “ All the coasts and Harbours of the said Islands and territories under your Government.”

Sir JOHN SIMON : That is it.

Lord WARRINGTON : The coast of Labrador is one of these coasts, that is to say, “ The coasts of the territories under your Government.”

Sir JOHN SIMON : That is right. In exactly the same way we can see, if we look through the draft of the framers of the Commission, how the word “ territories ” is inserted. If I might ask your Lordships' indulgence and ask for that to be examined, it has been checked and has been put on a single piece of paper.

Viscount FINLAY : The instructions after are at page 391.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes. I was passing for a moment from the instructions, which, as your Lordship knows, may be regarded as an internal and domestic set of documents, to the Commission, which as your Lordship knows is a contemporary document and is the authority.

Viscount FINLAY : Surely for the purpose of comparison one must take instructions with instructions. Page 391 is the instructions after.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Your Lordship is quite right.

Viscount FINLAY : Where are the instructions before ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : I have had them examined and I have also got them here ; I was rather observing, to save your Lordships' time, that you may take it, as I have carefully checked it, that the word “ territories ” does not occur in the instructions before.

Sir John Simon.

The Lord
Chancellor.

Sir John Simon.

Lord Sumner.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : You have reconstructed the words of the draughtsman.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I have exactly. I have taken the documents as they were before 1763 and have compared them with the documents after 1763, and with the help of my friend Mr. Barrington-Ward I have had put in red ink in the margin what the changes were. When you look at them you see quite clearly, the man who was dealing with the document, which is now in the Lord Chancellor's hands, was plainly addressing himself to an extended territorial jurisdiction, and indeed I think, my Lord, in the margin in red ink you will find the word " territories " popping up. It used to be " The said Island," and it is now changed into " The said Island and territories." I do not wish to labour the point or occupy further time about it, but I think I am quite right in what I am indicating about it.

Viscount FINLAY : Would you give me the page on which the special instructions are ?

8 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : 391 are fresh instructions, your Lordships have them before you.

Viscount HALDANE : These relate to the " Island of Newfoundland and all the coast of Labrador."

Viscount FINLAY : As compared with the earlier instructions, what page are they on ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : They are not printed, and therefore I am afraid for the moment I must ask your Lordships to take my word for it, but there is no difficulty in going further.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : On page 5 of this copy the words put in are " And the coasts and territories of Labrador and islands adjacent thereto," and a little later on " said islands," and somebody has put in " and territories."

Sir JOHN SIMON : That is right ; it shows plainly that " territories " is a new word. I have now ventured to put before the Lord Chancellor what Lord Finlay was asking for, namely, the earlier instructions which have in the same way been compared with the later instructions and exactly the same observation applies.

Lord SUMNER : He does not use the words " coasts," which may be the property of the islands as well as of the continent, but he uses the word “ territories.”

Sir JOHN SIMON : Lord Sumner, I think, is putting it a little bit higher than I am entitled to claim. He uses the word “ territories,”

p. 753

and as I have pointed out the use of that word can be associated with and exclusively with, the new area, but, of course, there are passages where he also uses the phrase “ coasts of Labrador.”

Lord SUMNER : Quite, the new area is to be preserved as the coast of Labrador.

The Lord
Chancellor.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Your Lordship has put it quite right. I do not suggest the word “ coasts ” does not also occur. My argument on this point is simply, we are dealing here with territorial annexation, but it is, I think, a striking fact that the way in which it was done was to take the Instructions as they previously existed and the Commission under the great Seal as it previously existed and then to proceed to put in, as the Lord Chancellor says, reconstructing the words of the draftsman, additional phrases and clauses and references which show quite plainly that “ territories ” really may be said to mean a portion of Labrador.

8 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Lord Sumner.

Sir John Simon.

There is another rather interesting and striking circumstance, which is this : if your Lordships take the Instructions, if my Lord Chancellor looks at the last page of them, you will find that even such a phrase as “ Rivers ” is a new insertion. Would your Lordships take Volume II, page 404, at the bottom of the page—it is the same document that Lord Finlay was asking about just now. These Instructions, as your Lordships know, are very long, they deal with an immense variety of matters, there are probably 80 or 90 paragraphs ; but would your Lordships please look at page 404, paragraph 74, at line 42 ? The Governor of Newfoundland after 1763, under his extended Instructions, is told to do this : “ and, if there be any Fishing in any other River or Harbour in Newfoundland, or the other Islands and Coasts under your Government, not in this Scheme mentioned, you are to add a Column or Columns for the same, and insert therein the best Account you can get.” Now here is a striking fact : if you will look at my comparison of the Instructions, you will find that the phrase “ River ” is put in for the first time when Labrador came in ; it had never been in the Instructions before ; so that so far is it from being true that this extension of the jurisdiction of the Governor of Newfoundland to Labrador is a mere matter of maritime police, he is, for the first time as it happens, when these Instructions are thus enlarged, given an explicit direction to have regard to fishing, not merely on the coast, but in the rivers. I do not know whether my Lord Chancellor has the exact passage before him.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Yes, it is put in afterwards ; where he comes to Newfoundland, he has put in the words “ or the other islands or coasts under your Government.”

Sir JOHN SIMON : I think I am right in saying that “ river ” is itself a new word. I do not think it is open to doubt if you make a

p. 754

Careful comparison between the pre-1763 and post-1763 Instructions and Commissions that what the authorities at home conceived they were dealing with was a territorial extension, which was far from being a mere dealing with the sands of the sea shore, but which embraced rivers and embraced an area which is called indifferently “ Territories ” and “ Coasts.”

Lord SUMNER : What is the exact point about this word “ River ” ? I suppose the object is to extend the word “ Coast,” if it is preceded by territories, but does the mention of “ Rivers ” in Labrador, and not in Newfoundland, mean there were no rivers, or fishable rivers, in Newfoundland ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : Your Lordship has not quite got my point ; it is not a big one, but I think it helps my case that the language of the Instructions to the Governor of Newfoundland before 1763, in this paragraph 74, contented itself with a general direction about “ if there is any fishing in any harbour.”

Lord SUMNER : No doubt it included any fishing if there was any.

8 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON: I have no doubt the moment when “ river ” became specifically mentioned, is the moment when the Labrador mainland is added.

Lord SUMNER : It seems to show that this gentleman is very careful.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I hope your Lordship will not think I am making more of it than that. That is my first point of common ground ; I say it is no matter of dispute now, that we are dealing here with a material territorial annexation, though, of course, how deep, remains to be decided. The second point I wish to make, which again is common ground I think, is this, and it is one which has been strangely over-looked in a great deal of the argument I have heard from my learned friends: Whatever be the depth to which this territorial jurisdiction extends on Labrador, the nature of the jurisdiction, the quality of it, is exactly the same as the quality of the jurisdiction in the island of Newfoundland itself. I have heard a great deal of argument during the last week or two that has seemed to suggest, that you had the Governor of Newfoundland established in his island in complete and undoubted sway, and that then there is added to him some incidental duty which is of a qualified kind. Nothing of the sort. The documents, if they are compared, show quite conclusively, and it cannot be disputed, that in point of quality, once you have ascertained how deep you go, the duties are exactly the same in the two cases. Let me give your Lordship one very striking illustration of that. Again and again, you will remember, stress has been laid on the fact, and it is the fact, that the Governor of Newfoundland, in

Haldane.

Sir John Simon.

relation to the coast of Labrador, was told that he was to conduct himself so as to have due regard to the Imperial Statute 10 and 11 William III ; you will remember it comes in the Instructions, and it is all over the place. The Imperial Statute 10 and 11 William III, was passed for the Island of Newfoundland and applied to the Island of Newfoundland, and what is more it never applied to anything else except the Island of Newfoundland. Therefore, if any stress is going to be laid on the circumstance that the Governor of Newfoundland, in dealing with this Labrador area, was to have primary regard to the particular and rather curious fishing regime which goes on there, it is to be remembered that that is exactly the thing which he was directed to do in reference to the Island of Newfoundland, and the truth of the matter, of course, is this : it is all very well for my learned friends to emphasize the undoubted truth that until quite recently there were not more than a handful of white people on the Labrador Coast, save quite close to the salt sea waves, but the thing is equally true about the Island of Newfoundland, and if anyone was to look (I rather think it is in the book somewhere,) at the census of Newfoundland, you will find that the Island of Newfoundland was an exactly similar place, it was a place where you had not any white people except in the rarest case within more than a mile or two from the waves until quite recently, and indeed the interior of it was to a very large extent unknown, just as the interior of Labrador was unknown.

8 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Lord WARRINGTON: It was the policy of the Imperial Government to prevent the settling of Newfoundland.

Sir JOHN SIMON : It was, my Lord. All I say is, my second point, which is really common ground now we have discussed the case, is : you may dispute as much as you like, and it is a serious and difficult question, how deep back you go, but let us realise we are not only dealing with a territorial jurisdiction, but we are dealing with a territorial jurisdiction of a quality which is exactly the same as the quality in Newfoundland itself.

Viscount HALDANE : You say the jurisdiction is not distinct, but at line 14 on page 154 the purpose is given, “ And to the end that the open and free fishery of our subjects.”

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, your Lordship is perfectly right ; I am going to deal with that rather carefully in a moment ; though even there, my Lord Haldane, I would beg leave to say exactly the same thing might have been said at that date with regard to the Island of Newfoundland itself. The policy of the Imperial Government in 1763 was to secure in reference to the Island of Newfoundland itself the very same thing; and therefore it is fallacious to draw this suggested contrast between a completely organised and effective Government, which passed over the whole of this immense area of the Island, and compare that or contrast that and set that against a more limited and casual exercise of authority on the coast of Labrador. The two things are the same.

p. 756

Viscount HALDANE : Still you have a permanent residence for the Governor in Newfoundland at St. John's.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I am not at all sure that the Governor did not live on a ship ; he came back every winter. You will find, my Lord, as a matter of fact, that in April 1763 Captain Thomas Graves, Governor of Newfoundland, was in London. He came back along with everybody else in the Autumn of the year, and he went out as Commodore of the fishing squadron in the month of April. I know the day, that he started back, within a day or so, in 1763.

Viscount FINLAY : He went on a ship, but when he arrived he did not remain at anchor, rolling up and down on the waves.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I do not know how uncomfortable it may have been, but I do not think he had a luxurious Government house there.

Viscount FINLAY : I do not say that.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Your Lordships have a little confirmation of this point of mine, though really, as I say, the point is common ground, and it is this : you remember that Governor Palliser, the Governor who succeeded Graves, found himself in a difficulty, because he had got instructions which told him that in administering the Labrador area he was to act on the lines of the Imperial Statute 10 and 11 William III, and the good man therefore, when he found people who were saying they were entitled to hold land on the Labrador coast, was minded to turn them out, because he said : “ Oh no, the Statute of 10 and 11, William III. does not allow things like that.” He got himself into this difficulty, that the people who were on the Labrador coast took some good advice, and it was pointed out quite accurately, with some acuteness, that 10 and 11 William III did not apply to Labrador, but only applied to the Island of Newfoundland, and your Lordships I daresay remember in these Volumes, that Governor Palliser reports his difficulties to the authorities at home, and says, “ Here I was, acting on my instructions to deal with these people on the Labrador Coast, as I should certainly have done with them if I met them on the Island of Newfoundland, and now I am threatened with an action.” I daresay your Lordships will remember from the documents that it was proposed at home to have a new Act of Parliament which would extend 10 and 11 William III in express terms, so that it applied, not only to Newfoundland, but to Labrador. That was never in fact done. All that point goes to show that as soon as you said to Governor Palliser : “ Now go and do on Labrador what you have been doing in the Island of Newfoundland,” he did his best to do it, but there was this technical difficulty, that 10 and 11

William III did not really apply to the new area. However, that my Lords, is my second point, which I just want to mark down before we come to controversial matters.

The third point which I suggest is also worth noting as a matter of common ground is this, and here I am afraid for the moment Lord Haldane may not be disposed to agree with me, but I am sure he will if I have rightly appreciated how the argument must go ; it ought to be common ground, and on reflection I think it will be common ground : that ever since 1774 in my green area there never has been, and there never could have been, any undistributed middle, if I may presume to use a phrase of formal logic in quite a different sense ; that is to say, in 1774 the Statute threw into Quebec the whole of my green, including any portion, whether it be broad or narrow, which had previously been Newfoundland, and from that moment, Newfoundland was ousted for a certain period of time from the mainland altogether, and any area which Newfoundland might formerly have had, whether it be narrow or broad, was included in the extended Province of Quebec. Now what has happened since ? Nothing whatever has , happened since which could possibly cause the springing up in this green area of a tertium quid, a no-man's-land, an undistributed middle, or whatever you call it, because all that has happened since is——

Viscount HALDANE : I do not call it a No-man's-land.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I quite know ; your Lordship has warned me of that already : there has never been an undistributed area since. From that moment it has either all belonged to Quebec, or all belonged to Newfoundland, or partly belonged to the one and partly belonged to the other.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I think Mr. Macmillan took that view.

Sir JOHN SIMON : He did, my Lord ; I am only anxious to nail it down, if I may, because, of course, the moment that that is conceded, and what is more important, if I may say so, the moment it is appreciated that must be the logical conclusion, all questions about the Order in Council of 1880 go clean out of the case.

Viscount HALDANE : I am not satisfied yet, but I will hear you about it.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : It all depends on whether, when the boundary is brought up to the Southern boundary of Hudson's Bay, it travels along that boundary to the sea.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, that is quite true.

Viscount HALDANE : Of course, it is clear that, when Quebec was extended in 1825, there was a line drawn which showed what belonged to Quebec.

p. 758

Sir JOHN SIMON : I appreciated your Lordships would want to have this matter put before you, and we have taken the liberty of preparing for your Lordships inspection, if you will be so good as to look at it, what is my original hand chart with this difference : that we have put upon it, I think in rather a generous way, a band of brown which will indicate what we understand to be the view presented by Mr. Macmillan. His view is that all that Newfoundland got—he concedes it got territory, but all it got was something which was of a certain width,—I am not for a moment discussing a mile or not—which runs round the coast and the inlet with the exception and the curious exception I think, of the largest inlet of them all, and therefore his view would be, that what I have now got marked on this in brown is all that Newfoundland acquired on Labrador in 1763.

Viscount FINLAY : By the brown you mean the fringe to the zone ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord. If I may give your Lordships one or two copies, you will see exactly what I mean. I am only concerned to show, what I think must follow, that since at one period in 1774, Newfoundland was expelled from Labrador, and since after that all that has happened is that Quebec has given up as much as Newfoundland has regained, there is not and there never has been, any space between Quebec territory and Newfoundland territory, which could possibly belong to neither the one nor the other.

8 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Viscount HALDANE : In 1825 they gave to Newfoundland all the part not belonging to Quebec ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : Might I put it for a moment in my own way, with your Lordship's kind help. If you would not mind looking at my map, I could explain my meaning on the map very plainly. This is all subject to one observation, which the Lord Chancellor made to me just now, which I thoroughly appreciate. But assume, my Lords, for a moment, if you would, that the uncoloured portion of the chart now before your Lordships, is Hudson's Bay territory—I quite appreciate that that is a separate question, but assume it for the purpose in hand

Viscount FINLAY : You mean to the West ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord, the uncoloured portion at the West ; your Lordship is quite right. Then your Lordships remember you get the old Province of Quebec, as defined in 1763, limited by the River St. John running up to its source on the West, and then by a line which unites the head waters of the River St. John, whatever they may be, with Lake St. John, and so forth—my lozenge. Now, my

p. 759

Lords, I may be right or I may be wrong when I suggest that Newfoundland at the same time got the green—indeed, it would be at that moment the green and the pink.

Viscount HALDANE : Are you talking of 1825 ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : No, I am talking of 1763 ; I want to take the things in order. I say I may be right or I may be wrong, my 1763 Newfoundland may be too big (your Lordships will decide), but suppose for the moment it was so small that it is nothing more than the selvedge which I have coloured here in a brown edging—supposing that is all Newfoundland got, then the position in 1763 was this, that Quebec for the moment was nothing more than this slate-coloured lozenge (of course, it is not all shown on this map, it goes down to Quebec and Montreal), and Newfoundland on this view would be nothing more than this little brown trimming or fringe. Then comes 1774. Now 1774, whatever else it does, does this : it expels Newfoundland from Labrador altogether, and it adds to Quebec, not only what Newfoundland had, but everything else which is cut off by running that immense boundary round, you recollect, down to Ohio, the Mississippi, and coming to the boundary of the Hudson's Bay territory ; and it therefore leaves you with this enormous tract all called Quebec. That, therefore, is all Quebec, in 1774 onwards until the next change. Therefore, even if Mr. Macmillan is right when he says that the Newfoundland area was limited to this fringe, the result of 1774 was that the green, the pink, the slate colour and the yellow were all New Quebec. Now what has happened since ? Nothing has happened since except this, that Quebec has lost to Newfoundland what Newfoundland previously had. She has not given anything up to any third party, and consequently if you will now give me back what I formerly had, whether it be merely this narrow fringe which is painted brown, or whether it is the larger area which I claim, it follows necessarily that what I have got, leaves a remnant which is all Quebec. Consequently, there cannot have been between 1774 and the present day any intermediate area which could be the subject matter of an Order in Council in 1880 or otherwise ;

8 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Viscount

the Order in Council in 1880, as Lord Haldane knows very well, was an Order in Council which applied to all the unappropriated land all over British North America. For example it brought into Canada places in the extreme North like Baffin's Land, in enormously high latitudes—it brought in, for all I know, and I think my Lord would say it did bring in, some areas unappropriated or unorganised areas of land. It was not addressed specifically to Labrador at all.

Sir John Simon.

Viscount HALDANE : It was the territory to which the Crown was entitled.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I quite agree. This is where the Lord Chancellor brings in the perfectly just qualification, if I may presume

Viscount
Haldane.

p. 760

Sir John Simon.

to say so : it may be that it had an operation on something which was previously Hudson Bay ; very likely ; but my point is that if I am discussing as to the appropriation to-day of an area which was not Hudson's Bay, but was in Labrador, it may be Newfoundland to-day, or it may be Quebec to-day, but it is mere want of logic to suggest it could possibly be any third thing to-day, because whatever Quebec has lost to Newfoundland, Newfoundland has got, and whatever Newfoundland has not got from Quebec, Quebec has got.

Viscount
Haldane.

Viscount HALDANE : But can you assume that—take this 1825 Act—Quebec has got a Western boundary, Quebec has nothing in the green ?

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : That is right, I think, my Lord.

Viscount HALDANE : Very well. Where do you find that the green has been disposed of by the Crown, except in the original documents of 1763, and what I call the temporary subsequent Statute ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : I am afraid I have not quite conveyed my point to your Lordships. It is my fault entirely. The point is simply this : Was there anything in this area which could be operated on by the Order in Council of 1880 ? That is the question.

Viscount HALDANE : If the Statute was out of the way, so far as it affects it, Quebec had not got it, Newfoundland had not got it, and the Crown had got it.

8 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

The Lord
Chancellor.

Sir JOHN SIMON : It is my fault entirely ; your Lordships will forgive me for repeating a little. Your Lordship says, Quebec had not got it, or Newfoundland had not got it ; surely, my Lord, one or the other of them had got it for this reason ; that 1774 threw the green into Quebec, nothing has ever taken it out of Quebec.

Sir John Simon.

Viscount HALDANE : That Statute has gone as regards that, but the boundary of Quebec has been subsequently fixed, in 1825, in a way which precludes Quebec it seems to me coming outside that boundary.

Sir JOHN SIMON : With great respect—it is my fault entirely—I have failed to put what I wish to say. We are just taking the critical dates ; 1763, 1774, 1809 and 1825. In 1763 I quite agree Quebec's boundaries were so limited that, of course, there was a very considerable extent of country outside them, and it is a matter of dispute whether so much of my map as is painted green and pink, being outside Quebec, was at that date inside Newfoundland ; that is the controversy. Be that as it may, quacumque via, when I come to the next matter, 1774, the boundaries of Quebec are so extended, that you get Quebec now running right up to the water's edge, the whole way round there, and therefore in 1774, 1775, and 1776 and so on, the green area beyond any question, is Quebec, and so is the pink area.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : You recognise that you are not dealing with Mr. Macmillan's point that in 1763, as set up by the Proclamation of 1763, the back part of your green area was in reserve for the Indians.

Viscount
Haldane.

Mr. Macmillan.

Sir JOHN SIMON : That, of course, I am going to deal with under the subject of, What is the Indian Country ? The point I am making is merely that I want to get this Order in Council of 1880 clean out of the case, because, with very great respect, I think it is plain it cannot have anything to do with it. The Lord Chancellor is pointing out the distinction—I quite understand there will be a very important discussion as to whether the Indian country, an expression which I think I can quite easily expand into a different area, includes anything in the green ; if it does, so much the worse for me. But my point merely is, my Lords, that so far as any Order in Council goes, which issued in 1880, any area in the British North American Continent, that was not inside a Province, was put into Canada. That cannot have had any operation in this area, because if I pass from 1774 onwards, the whole area was Quebec ; when I come to 1809, as Lord Haldane has just kindly pointed out, it is perfectly true there was a cutting off from Quebec of a something, and when I come to 1825, there is a returning from Quebec of so much of Quebec as formerly was Newfoundland, but it leaves Quebec with everything that was not formerly Newfoundland ;

consequently the Order in Council of 1880 does not touch the point, though, of course, what has been said by the Lord Chancellor, Lord Haldane, and other members of the Board about the question as to whether any portion of my green is to be regarded as the Indian country, is a very important question indeed.

Viscount HALDANE : It is only important for the purpose of showing why they wished to retain that territory unallotted. You must remember that here the Crown has the whole, and it was disposing of it progressively, and these Statutes were successive stages in the disposition. See what it says in 1825.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I do not know if it would be of any assistance if I were to offer a word now ; my learned friend invites me to do so, because he has put it on common ground. I think the position was this, on our side, as contrasted with Sir John Simon's, that in 1763, there were four persons or four bodies interested in the Labrador Peninsula : Hudson's Bay, Newfoundland, Quebec and the Indian Reservation. My learned friend eliminates the fourth one, and says there were three persons interested only. After 1774 our primary position is that there were three persons there, Hudson's Bay, Quebec and Indians.

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I am sure we cannot have any controversy on this ; I am not discussing the Indian Reservations at all.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : After 1774, Newfoundland was out.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : So in those years, there were only two ?

Viscount
Haldane.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, subject to that distinction ; your Lordships see what I mean.

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I am saving my learned friend's point entirely. If I may say so respectfully, I understand his point, but when it is put against me for the moment that, inside my green, there is something you ought to call Indian country, of course, I dispute it altogether. But that is a separate point. But assume it makes no difference. Once you come to 1774, that turns it into the Province of Quebec and it has never come out of that again, unless indeed it was part of Newfoundland, in which case it has been returned to Newfoundland ; that is all.

Viscount HALDANE : In those days the Crown had the prerogative, and it fixed the boundaries sometimes by Statute and at other times it was done by orders ; you all seem to assume that a complete disposition was intended at each stage, but I doubt that very much. It was not so with regard to parts of Canada, and I do not see why it should be so here. Now I turn to Section 9, on page 210, in the Act of 1825. Will you read that to us ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : I will read it with pleasure ; your Lordship means the cutting out of the pink oblong.

Viscount HALDANE : Yes. First of all, they are dealing with the Statutes.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, they recite them, and then this says : “ The Coast of Labrador from the River St. John to Hudson's Streights.”

Viscount HALDANE : Let us go a little slowly : “ Whereas under and by virtue of a certain Act.”

Sir JOHN SIMON : That is the Act of 1809.

Viscount HALDANE : “ The Coast of Labrador, from the River Saint John to Hudson's Streights, and the Island of Anticosti, and all the islands adjacent to the said coast, except the islands of Madelaine, are annexed to and form part of the Government of Newfoundland ; and it is expedient that certain parts of the said Coast of Labrador should be re-annexed to and form part of the Province of Lower Canada.”

p. 763

Where do you say that any title to anything that formed part of Labrador besides that is given ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : Will your Lordship kindly turn to page 158 ? I am going to ask your Lordships just to let me put up a large map which I think will assist us. If you turn to page 158, you will of course remember that in the Statute of 1774 there is a new boundary of the Province of Quebec defined. The word “ bounded ” is on page 158 at line 27.

Viscount HALDANE : “ So bounded.” That is in the recital.

Viscount
Haldane.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I do not think so, with great respect, my Lord. It is not recital.

Viscount HALDANE : “ Bounded on the South by a line from the Bay of Chaleurs,” and so on.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : If you follow the whole line round, you get round by the Mississippi to the boundary of Hudson's Bay.

8 Nov., 1926.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord.

Sir John Simon.

Viscount HALDANE : It is on page 159.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord. I think this map that I have here will make the matter entirely plain, and I think it is a useful map to have.

Viscount HALDANE : Yes. Now you will tell us about it, Sir John.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord. I have a map here, which I think may do just what we want. The map that is now being put up on the screen is, in its right-hand top corner, a reproduction of my little hand map ; it is just the same. All the rest of it is on the same scale, but it carries you further to the south and the west. If your Lordships will kindly look at all the colours that are on that map, the yellow, the slate, the pink and the green, and, if you were to imagine a brown selvedge to the green, the brown as well, everything that is coloured on that map became a portion of the Province of Quebec under the Statute of 1774—everything.

Viscount HALDANE : Just let us see. The expression in the Act of 1774 is “ northward to the southern boundary of the Hudson's Bay territory.” I want to know what that southern boundary is.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I think that the map will be found very convenient for the purpose.

p. 764

The LORD CHANCELLOR : This is the boundary—(indicating on the map).

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord. Now if I might read it, perhaps the Lord Chancellor would not mind seeing if I have got my colours right. It says this : “ bounded on the South by a Line from the Bay of Chaleurs, along the High Lands which divide the Rivers that empty themselves into the River Saint Lawrence from those which fall into the Sea, to a Point in Forty-five Degrees of Northern Latitude, on the Eastern Bank of the River Connecticut, keeping the same Latitude directly West, through the Lake Champlain, until, in the same Latitude, it meets the River Saint Lawrence ; from thence up the Eastern Bank of the said River to the Lake Ontario ; thence through the Lake Ontario, and the River commonly called Niagara ; and thence along by the Eastern and South-eastern Bank of Lake Erie, following the said Bank, until the same shall be intersected by the Northern Boundary, granted by the Charter of the Province of Pennsylvania, in case the same shall be so intersected ”—then around Pennsylvania, and then : “ thence along the Western Boundary of the said Province, until it strike the River Ohio ; and along the Bank of the said River ”—It is the Ohio—“ West-ward, to the Banks of the Mississippi, and Northward to the Southern Boundary of Territory granted to the Merchants Adventurers of England, trading to Hudson's Bay.” Now, my Lords, I quite agree that it is a matter of controversy where that is. But it is somewhere ; and my point is that that boundary, thus defined, throws into Quebec an enormous area which included the yellow, the pink and green, as well as the slate colour. Therefore, from 1774 the whole of that coloured area on my map is Quebec.

Now, my Lords, what has happened since ? Nothing has happened since in Labrador except this, that there has been handed back to Newfoundland whatever Newfoundland had in Labrador before 1774. That may be much or it may be little, but whatever it is, it leaves Quebec Labrador, with all the rest. Consequently, the Order in Council of 1880 cannot have found any subject matter upon which it could operate in the peninsula of Labrador.

Viscount
Haldane.

Sir John Simon.

Viscount
Haldane.

Viscount HALDANE : When was the territory granted to the merchant adventurers for trading to Hudson's Bay ? Was it 1670 ?

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord, it was 1670, by the Charter of Charles the Second.

Viscount HALDANE : The southern boundary, then, is the 1670 southern boundary, which was created then ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord.

Viscount HALDANE : And then : “ all such Territories, Islands, and Countries, which have, since the Tenth of February, One thousand seven hundred and sixty-three, been made Part of the Government of Newfoundland.”

p. 765

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord. That, as your Lordship will remember, is the date of the Treaty of Paris, and it only means such things as have been added to Newfoundland in 1763.

Viscount HALDANE : Yes, it says so.

Lord
Warrington.

Sir JOHN SIMON : So that it gives back to Newfoundland, the Island of Newfoundland and certain islands around, and it leaves the mainland.

Sir John Simon.

Viscount HALDANE : “ Territories, Islands, and Countries, which have, since the Tenth of February, One thousand seven hundred and sixty-three, been made Part of the Government of Newfoundland.” That is since 1763.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord, but it does not make the Island of Newfoundland any part of the Province of Quebec.

The Island of Newfoundland has always remained independent in that sense, and quite independent of Canada.

Now your Lordships have my point, and I think it is an obvious point, and I have perhaps spent too long over it ; but the point that I want to be clear about is that although no doubt the Order in Council of 1880 may have had effective operation, for all that I know, in other parts of British North America it could not have an effective operation in the part that is coloured on the map, subject to the point of which the Lord Chancellor was good enough to remind me, that I may not have got the boundaries of Hudson's Bay right. But if you will assume that I have got them right, wherever they are, then the rest follows.

8 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Lord WARRINGTON : In 1774 the authorities did not define that.

Sir JOHN SIMON : No, my Lord. Of course, I have a compartment of my argument in reply which is going to deal with that.

Lord WARRINGTON : What you mean is that there went into Quebec everything that was not Hudson's Bay territory as far as Hudson's Bay territory extended, and in addition to that, whatever it was, that had been attached to Newfoundland ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord ; and all that has happened since that is that Newfoundland has got back what it had before, together with the pink, remembering that the pink is in. And therefore, be it small or be it great, the result is merely that you have put at one time into a common pot two different quantities of liquid, and you have subsequently poured out of that pot one of the two component parts. You are therefore necessarily left with the other, and it is no good looking inside the pot to discover if some third liquid exists there, because, of course, it does not.

Therefore, although the argument about an Indian boundary is a most important argument, and one which I am not going to minimise or overlook, it does not involve any reference to the Order in Council of 1880, which has no effect on the position at all. There is also a second reason why it should not, which is this, that it would be quite incompetent for such an Order in Council to transfer territory from a Governor of a Colony such as Newfoundland, and no one suggests that that was its operation. Its operation was to respect all boundaries of existing Colonies, but to deal with unallotted or unappropriated areas. Consequently it may have had, and undoubtedly did have, the effect of enlarging the superficies of Canada ; and if one went up to the frozen North, for all that I know it added the North Pole, if that is in North America ; it certainly added Baffin's Land and other areas. But it did not and could not have any operation in Labrador, because the part of Labrador that I am talking about was already earmarked as either one or other of the two things.

Lord WARRINGTON : If it is Newfoundland, it is expressly excepted.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord, and if it is not Newfoundland, then it was already Quebec. Then I come to my fourth point of common ground. I am just noting these things first of all.

Viscount HALDANE : I have got two of your points.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I had intended to mention three, my Lord.

My first is that it is common ground that the addition made to the Government of Newfoundland is a territorial addition, an addition to its territory.

Viscount HALDANE : Yes, I have that.

Sir JOHN SIMON : My second point of common ground was this, that so far as quality is concerned——

Viscount HALDANE : The quality is the same.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord, it was the same, whether you are dealing with the Island of Newfoundland or with Labrador.

Viscount HALDANE : What is the third point ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : The third is that ever since 1774 there is not and cannot have been any portion of the area now under discussion which was neither Newfoundland nor Quebec. It has always been either one or the other, and therefore the real question in this arbitration is where you should say, on the proper construction of these documents, that the line between Newfoundland and Quebec is.

[1927lab]

Sir John Simon.

The fourth point is upon a quite different subject matter. I gratefully accept any concession from the Dominion of Canada. The fourth point is this, that in this case at any rate, it is not disputed that the Newfoundland area, whatever the width of the band may be, is an area which includes the sinuosities of the coast, which runs round the heads of the inlets. That is not disputed, and indeed I should think, having regard to the fact that fishery was uppermost in people's mind, it would be ridiculous to suggest the contrary. Curiously enough. Canada seeks, I think without any warrant, to make an exception to that general proposition ; it takes the largest of the inlets, an inlet which has been called an inlet, as your Lordships noticed this morning, from the very earliest times when it was explored, and it says : “ No ; this inlet goes in 140 miles, and we wish to set up a case that properly speaking it is not an inlet at all.” I find a certain amount of difficulty in knowing how far I ought to deal with that contention, because, of course, my case, which I in no way retract, is that the height of land is the relevant consideration. But I can very briefly summarise the considerations which I think go to show that this attempt to treat Hamilton Inlet in a different way from the other inlets on the coast is a hopeless attempt.

8 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Viscount FINLAY : What exactly do you mean by “ Hamilton Inlet ? ” Do you mean merely the inlet next to the sea ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : No, my Lord. If your Lordship takes the Admiralty chart, as I think the Lord Chancellor pointed out the other day, the whole thing has been constantly called “ Hamilton Inlet.”

Viscount FINLAY : You include the lake in the expression “ Hamilton Inlet.”

Sir JOHN SIMON : What is called the lake, certainly, my Lord. This attempt to say that the inlet stops somewhere—I do not know exactly where it stops, but at some point which my learned friend suggests—and that inside of that you have something which is not inlet, is contradicted by all the most important considerations in this case.

Viscount HALDANE : This is your fourth point ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord, this is my fourth point.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : This is your first disputed point ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord, I am taking the exceptions to the sinuosities.

p. 768

Viscount HALDANE : What was your fourth common ground ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : It was this, my Lord, that it is agreed by Canada that the area to which I am entitled is an area which follows round and includes all the sinuosities of the coast, and does not seek to jump from headland to headland, with the exception—and here is the controversial matter—of Hamilton Inlet,.

Viscount HALDANE : I see ; and therefore Hamilton Inlet is the first disputed point ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord. Now I am coming to the first disputed point. I was just observing that there is a great deal of material about this in the books, and indeed this is rather entertaining reading, because nothing is more entertaining to the unscientific mind than to read the way in which scientific men treat one another. There is some extremely controversial matter here. It appears that a gentleman, as to whose high qualifications in his own field I raise no question—he was a geologist—was able to assist the Government after this dispute arose by a most elaborate essay on the marine flora of the inlet ; and there is a document in the book where he deals in great detail with the botany of the subject. The only difficulty in his way is that he does not know any botany, and consequently it was necessary for us to produce the evidence of two of the greatest botanists in the world, who took his list and pointed out that he was wholly and absolutely in error, firstly in supposing that a number of plants were marine plants, and secondly in his description of the habitat of a great number of these interesting natural products. It is one of the few things which has given me a little relief. I reminded myself of the saying attributed to Lord Dundreary when the British Association met at Oxford, and distinguished men conducted a heated controversy. I think it was the occasion when Disraeli said he was on the side of the angels—I am told it was not the same occasion, but at any rate it, was one occasion; and Lord Dundreary appeared on the scene, and said that really we were infinitely obliged to these scientific gentlemen for quarrelling so amusingly before us. There is really a delightful passage in one of these documents, exhibiting to the judgment of posterity the botanical achievements and qualifications of some of the witnesses.

Lord SUMNER : The same sort of entertainment is afforded by the disputes of other learned gentlemen.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord ; except that the other disputes are commoner and not so enlightening.

Viscount HALDANE : I think the occasion which you were referring to was a Church Conference.

p. 769

Sir JOHN SIMON : I saw, from a warning from one of your Lordships, that I had mentioned the wrong occasion.

Now, perhaps, I may state some points categorically, because I have collected them on a piece of paper. The first point that I make about Hamilton Inlet is this : the question is not whether the waters of Lake Melville call it Lake Melville without prejudice—not whether the higher waters are particularly saline or brackish—one question is whether people can make tea out of them—but the question is whether the land adjoining those waters is coast or not. Secondly, I would suggest this : this question has to be approached from the point of view of the draughtsmen and other authorities of 1763, and not from that of experts or supposed experts in botany, geology, hydrography, zoology, and any other ologies, in 1926. Then, thirdly, approaching it in this light, even if one was to confine one's self to the primary object of regulating fisheries, it can hardly be suggested that the area is so limited as to embrace less than the margin of all waters where, by English law, a public right of fishery would exist. Here we are getting on to territory which is very familiar to some of your Lordships. As we know in some of the fishery cases which have been before this Board, matters have been most elaborately explained, especially in the second fishery case, in the Judgment of Lord Haldane. Of course, a public right to fish extends to all waters within the flow and re-flow of the tides ; it is not limited by asking a botanist or a zoologist whether a particular sea shrimp or flower grows there. It is a perfectly elementary proposition that the public right to fish, the thing which was the primary interest undoubtedly of those who were legislating in 1763, extends to all waters within the flow and re-flow of tides, whether such waters are rivers or not.

If your Lordships care for any references, although I do not trouble your Lordships to turn them up, they are to be found in Volume V, or, at any rate, most of them. Lord Haldane Judgment in the second fishery case in 1914 is printed in Volume V, at page 2165 ; and on the immediately preceding page, as Lord Warrington has been good enough to turn it up, there is a very well known authority, a gentleman of the name of Moore.

Viscount
Haldane.

8 Nov., 1926.
Sir John Simon.

Viscount HALDANE : I do not know whether it makes any difference, but I think it is right to say that the second fishery case was Quebec law.

Sir JOHN SIMON : That was the third case, my Lord.

Viscount HALDANE : You mean the second one, which was —

Sir JOHN SIMON : British Columbia, my Lord.

Viscount HALDANE : That was English law, all right, yes.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, and I deliberately chose the second case. I had the honour of appearing before your Lordship in one or two of these cases, and I chose that one.

p. 770

Viscount HALDANE : In the third case it was French law.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, it was, my Lord ; and it was decided that none the less the result would be the same. However, I was talking about the second case.

On the immediately preceding page, in Volume V, on page 2164, there is a very simple passage which I think comes from my learned friend Mr. Stuart Moore's well-known book on fisheries.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : This is rather familiar.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord. I was going to say that we might pass from Stuart Moore to Hale ; it is within a page or two. On page 2165 there is a convenient extract which comes from the Law Reports, 1914, Appeal Cases.

Viscount HALDANE : It could only be done by a grant prior to Magna Carta.

8 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : That is the only way, my Lord. Your Lordship and I have been through this, if I may say so, from the two sides here, more than once. The passage is at the bottom of page 2165, and your Lordships will appreciate that this is reprinted from the Appeal Cases. If I may, I will just take a sentence or two from my Lord's Judgment. He was, of course, Lord Chancellor, in giving the Judgment. At line 30 he says this : “ But in the case of tidal waters (whether on the foreshore or in estuaries or tidal rivers) the exclusive character of the title ”—that is to say, the private title—“ is qualified by another an paramount title which is prima facie in the public. Lord Hale i his De Jure Maris, in a passage cited with approval by Lord Blackburn in his judgment in

The Lord
Chancellor.

Sir John Simon.

Neill v. Duke of Devonshire, states the law as follows : ‘ the right of fishing in this sea ’ (i.e., the narrow seas adjoining the coasts) ‘ and the creeks and the arms thereof, is originally lodged in the Crown, as the right of depasturing is originally lodged in the owner of the waste whereof he is lord, or as the right of fishing belongs to him that is the owner of a private or inland river. . . . But though the King is the owner of this great waste, and as a consequence of his property hath the primary right of fishing in the sea ’ ”—that is the narrow seas adjoining the coast—“ ‘ and the creeks and the arms thereof, yet the common people of England have regularly a liberty of fishing in the sea or creeks or arms thereof, as a public common of piscary, and may not without injury to their right be restrained of it, unless in such places, creeks, or navigable rivers where either the King or some particular subject hath gained a propriety exclusive of that common liberty ’ ” ; and then it goes on to say : “ Their Lordships are in entire agreement with him on his main pro—position, namely, that the subjects of the Crown are entitled as of right not only to navigate but to fish in the high seas and tidal waters alike. The legal character of this right is not easy to define.”

p. 771

Then my Lords answer the first question which is put to them lower down on the page, where they say : “ These considerations enable their Lordships to answer the first question, which reads as follows : ‘ Is it competent to the Legislature of British Columbia to authorize the Government of the Province to grant by way of lease, license or otherwise the exclusive right to fish in any or what part or parts of the waters within the railway belt—(a) as to such waters as are tidal, and (b) as to such waters which, though not tidal, are navigable ? ’ The answer to this question must be in the negative. So far as the waters are tidal the right of fishing in them is a public right subject only to regulation by the Dominion Parliament.”

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Is not your point not whether there is a right of fishing, but whether there is a coast ? I suppose you do not talk of the “ coasts ” of Loch Lomond, but you talk of the “ coasts ” of Loch Fyne, which is a sea lake.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord, I think so ; but I am not aware that there is a public right of fishing in Loch Lomond, for the reason that it is not tidal.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Is not the point whether the word “ coast ” applies ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : I think that your Lordship has not quite got the proposition that I was making. What I was saying was that the question is whether or not the land adjoining these waters is coast. Then, this is my proposition : I say that in the light of the main object which was aimed at in 1763, which is the regulating of the public right of fishery, it is extremely difficult to suppose that those who were concerned could have been providing for the Government of an area which would not embrace the margin of all waters where there is by English law a public right of fishery.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Unless they are right in saying that “ fishery ” means “ cod fishery.”

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord ; I quite agree in that case it would be so. But assuming that I make good the point—and there are endless illustrations of it—that the fishery is not limited to cod, then it is difficult to suppose that, however limited, in 1763, is the construction to be put on the words used, the primary object of the thing was going to be bisected in this very odd way.

(Adjourned for a short time.)

[1927lab]

AFTERNOON SESSION.

8 Nov., 1926.
Sir John Simon.

Viscount HALDANE : A new map has been put before us.
What is it ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : It is not a new map, my Lord. It was handed in in the course of the argument of my learned friend Mr. Macmillan in order that your Lordships might see the Admiralty Chart of Hamilton Inlet ; and as I am going to address your Lordships for a short time on this aspect of the case, I thought that in the first instance it might be convenient if the chart was handed in to your Lordships.

Viscount HALDANE : Is this Hamilton Inlet the same as Davis Inlet ?

8 Nov., 1926.
Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : No, my Lord. I thought perhaps it might be of service if I indicated to your Lordships the way in which I had sketched out the compartments for my reply. I hope to bear in mind the observations of my learned friend Mr. Geoffrion and to avoid unnecessarily irrelevant matter, whether 90 per cent, or 70 per cent.

The compartments were these : I must deal with the Hamilton Inlet point, and I would deal with it first. I am going to deal with that point first, just to get it out of the way, because it really, in my view, does not call for minute consideration in view of the larger claim which I hope to establish.

Then the other compartments would be these ; I must ask your Lordships' attention to some considerations connected with the Hudson's Bay boundary, and I more particularly wish to attack, and I hope to dislodge, the proposition which has again and again been asserted on behalf of Canada, that the height of land in connection with Hudson's Bay was a new invention which came into the mind of somebody in the nineteenth century. I propose to show your Lordships, by taking it in chronological order, that that is quite inaccurate.

Then I wish to deal with what my learned friend Mr. Macmillan called the calendar of documents in 1763, and in that connection perhaps I may tell Lord Warrington more particularly that I hope to be able to establish, and I think I can conclusively establish, that the governing document is the Commission, and not the Proclamation. I might tell your Lordships at once that I am in a position now to show the Board that the Commission to Governor Graves, and the instructions to Governor Graves, came before the Privy Council, and were both approved by Order in Privy Council, and both operated from the same date. Therefore the Proclamation, which came afterwards so far as that is concerned, is mere announcement.

p. 773

Then there is the important question of the maps, which I have to deal with in a separate compartment for the convenience of your Lordships and everybody, and I will as far as possible avoid looking at atlases in the meantime, although I am afraid I shall be unable to avoid that altogether. Then comes the question of what is the meaning of the Indian country upon which so much has been said, my broad proposition being this, that it is nothing whatever to the point to establish that there were aborigines in the green territory. No doubt there were aborigines all over the continent of North America at one time. But the question is not that at all ; the question is whether there was not an area which was perfectly well understood at the time as being Indian country, which was associated with some very famous and important historical events between 1759 and 1763. Therefore I was well warranted, when I ventured to say that the view that this green territory is the Indian country, or any part of it, is quite unhistorical. Those are the main compartments which which I am afraid I must trouble the Board in reply.

First of all, with regard to the Hamilton Inlet, I had already made the submission that the question really is whether the land which is around this piece of water is within the description of “ coasts of Labrador ” or not. I had also made the submission that that, I apprehend, has got to be considered, not from the point of view of zoologists or botanists, but from the point of view which may fairly be assumed to be in the minds of those who were acting in 1763. I had then made my third point about it, reminding your Lordships that beyond any question the public right of fishing, the free and public right of fishery (which by the law of England, by the law of every place in which British law operates, is one of the public rights), is a right which is not in any way limited by the distinction between something which is river-like and something which is ocean-like ; but on the contrary, is a right that exists and is exercised within the flow and re-flow of the tides, as a matter of fact, whether such waters are rivers or not.

8 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Viscount HALDANE : That is by the Common Law of England ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord. I had reached the point where your Lordships might like to be reminded of some of the authorities in Volume V. Lord Haldane's Judgment on page 2561 in that volume brings the matter together most conveniently, of course.

Then on the immediately preceding page there is an extract from a work which no doubt cannot yet be quoted in a Court of Law, because the learned author is still living, and indeed is one of the Counsel appearing on behalf of Canada here ; but none the less it is a very valuable way of formulating it. At the bottom of page 2164 this learned author observes : “ There was formerly an erroneous impression that where a river was a public navigable river, although not tidal, the public had a prima facie right to fish. It was, in fact, contended that the navigability of the river imparted the public right, and that it was not necessary that the river would be also tidal. In one case, the claim of the public to fish was made as to the River Itehen, a none-tidal river made navigable by means of a canal system. The point has been definitely decided, and is summed up Grove, B., and Huddleston, B., thus : ‘ The distinction is clear upon the whole current of authorities in this country and in Ireland that, when a river is navigable and tidal, the public have a right to fish there as well as to navigate it ; but that when it is navigable but not tidal ’ ”—that is what my Lord pointed out in the fishery case—“ ‘ no such right exists.’ ” There cannot be any doubt, of course, that that is the English law.

Viscount HALDANE : I think Lord Hersehell said much the same thing find the first fishery case.

Sir JOHN SIMON : He did, my Lord and incidentally, the second fishery case, your Lordship quoted a passage from his judgment, if I remember rightly. The old authority of Hale is also quoted in this book. Your Lordships will not desire me to read it at length, but you will find the passages extracted, beginning at page 2156.

Viscount HALDANE : He was a little bit loose in that case because he lived in the narrow seas.

8 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord, that is right. Your Lordship remembers the case very well. There cannot be any doubt that that would be the view ; and consequently, if we were, in the construction of the ambit of the territorial additions made to Newfoundland, to confine ourselves—which I am by no means willing to do—to the primary purpose indicated, in view of the fact that it was the regulating and control of the exercise of the fishing rights, it seems to me to be extremely unlikely that the largest and most important body of water on the whole of the coast is a thing upon which you are to suppose, in 1763, that the authorities drew an invisible line, with the curious result, as one of your Lordships pointed out this morning, that although it would be the duty of the Governor of Newfoundland, if he could, to prevent an invader from passing that invisible, line, yet, if he once got over the invisible line and was engaged in his operations on the other side of it, he would be

Viscount
Haldane.

Sir John Simon.

permanently isolated, unable to get in or out, and nobody could control him or had any jurisdiction over him. The same thing is illustrated again and again in the English Statute books. Your Lordships will be interested to remember—and I am sure my learned friend, Mr. Macmillan, will remember—that “ the coasts of Scotland,” in the Scotch Herring Fishery Acts, is defined, as a matter of fact, by the Statute : “ shall mean and include all bays, estuaries, arms of the sea, and all tidal waters within a distance of three miles from the mainland,” and in the same way in the case of the Irish fisheries, you get a similar definition. But I do not rely on statutory definitions ; I am only observing that if indeed one had to confine one's self to the primary object to be served, I submit that it is impossible to suppose that if you presented this Admiralty chart to those who were framing the documents in 1763, they would have said, in reference to Hamilton Inlet : “ You must draw a line between here, and my jurisdiction begins at one point and goes no further.” Lord Finlay will see Hamilton Inlet marked on the Admiralty chart, and although I do not wish to stress it, I am entitled to repeat what one of your Lordships observed, that on the Admiralty chart Hamilton Inlet as a description is attached to the whole thing. It is not the funnel-shaped entrance at all.

p. 775

Lord WARRINGTON : The words “ Hamilton Inlet ” are actually over the eastern part of Lake Melville.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord.

Viscount HALDANE : There is one observation that I should like to make. You may be right in saying that the Order in Council of 1880 had nothing to operate upon ; but that is hardly the question which has to be considered. The question is : “ What did the word ‘ coasts ’ mean in 1763 ? ”

8 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I think your Lordship is quite right. I accept that issue entirely. I was conscious of the fact that I was probably forcing an open door in what I said, as long as I have it clear, as I think my learned friend Mr. Macmillan concedes, that really the Order in Council of 1880 does not alter what would otherwise be the truth. But I have still got to tackle the real point, which is the point which your Lordship mentioned, namely : what did “ the coast of Labrador ” mean in these documents ? I think that is the true issue.

Then I was next going to observe this on the subject of Hamilton Inlet : I suggest that it could hardly be supposed that the framers of the Proclamation or the framers of the documents of 1763 meant to exclude Newfoundland from any waters which were accessible from the open sea in sea-going ships of considerable tonnage and draught, which would be a resort of fishermen, merely because it might turn out that cod did not often go there.

The exact extent to which cod did go into the more interior waters of Hamilton Inlet is difficult precisely to define. It is true that they are not to be found there in the same quantities in which they are to be found on the banks of Newfoundland ; but it is interesting perhaps to note the very same passage which asserts that, asserts the same thing is true of Sandwich Bay. Would your Lordship turn to Volume V ? Immediately following some of these pretty pictures which are in this volume there is a report on the Labrador fisheries beginning on page 2564 by Dr. Grenfell, the well-known medical missionary in Labrador. There is an elaborate account written of it, and on page 2566 near the top of the page he discusses the subject of the extent of fisheries up estuaries and rivers. I do not suppose there is anybody who knows so much about it as Dr. Grenfell. He says : “ The fact that cod fish are not

p. 776

fished commercially in fresh water precludes their being fished far up long estuaries into which flow many large rivers, such as Hamilton Inlet and Sandwich Bay. The former has, besides the Hamilton, some twenty other rivers at least, while Eagle, White Bear, Dove Brook, Paradise, Muddy, and other rivers make Sandwich Bay at its head of no value for cod fishing. It is safe to say that few cod fish enter Melville Bay, a fact that is attested by the Eskimo cod fishery at Caravalla.” All that I am saying is that this attempt to put Hamilton Inlet into one category and the others into another from the point of view of cod fishing breaks down the moment you examine the material. The truth is that the cod prefers a very definite saline water. Whenever you come to an arm of the sea which is being fed by a series of important rivers, which is the receptacle for important rivers, you get a mixture of the fresh water from the hills with the salt water at sea level, and the cod prefers to go further out. That is true, but it is quite untrue to say that Hamilton Inlet stands in one category and other inlets stand in another. It is true of every inlet. I do not think very much could turn on that. In point of fact—and this I want to collect now in two or three passages—though cod fishery is no doubt the thing of the most importance and is in the forefront throughout, it is not true at any stage that the cod fishery is the only fishery. May I give your Lordships four references ; one in 1719 (which you see is before any question of Newfoundland's claim to the coast), one in 1773, one in 1777 and one in 1821. I could take others, but I will take those. Now, my Lord, will you take first the earliest date, 1719 ? This, I quite agree, is not a Labrador and could not be a Labrador instance ; it is an instance from the Island of Newfoundland, and in Volume IV at page 1961 you will see a petition signed George Skeffington addressed to King George. The year is 1719. “ The humble petition of George Skeffington inhabitant of Indian Bay in Newfoundland, Humbly Sheweth.”

The LORD CHANCELLOR : We have had this.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Your Lordship will forgive me for putting them together, because it is important for me to show, once and for all, that salmon fishery comes in. “ That your Petitioner hath for about twelve years past Improved the Salmon Fishery in two or three Rivers or Brooks to the northward of Cape Bonavista ; and hath at very great Expence and Labour near fforty miles up the Country cleared Lands of the wood, and the said Rivers or Brooks of rocks and stones and other obstructions ; built houses, Stages, ffatts, Works and other Conveniences for catching and Curing Salmon, which said Brooks or Rivers were never before Employed frequented or occupied by any person whatsoever, and far distant from any place where any ffishing[sic] Ship hath used to fish—Your Petitioner therefore most humbly prays that he may be encouraged and protected in carrying on the said Fishery according to the Intention of the Act made in the 10th & 11th of King William the Third for Incouring ”—that word means “ encouraging ”—“ the fishery of New—foundland.” That being his petition, if your Lordship just glances over the next two or three pages (I need not delay, because my learned friend Mr. Barrington–Ward read it) you will see on page 1963 that it is done. The point of it is this : not that that is Labrador, but that it is a claim put forward, acknowledged and made good under the ambit of the Statute 10 and 11 William III.

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, it is not inconsistent with that Act.

8 Nov., 1926.
Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I think my learned friend is right : “ To be not inconsistent with that Act.” It is no good reading 10 and 11 William III as though it gave exclusive protection to cod. The truth is that even before there was any question of Labrador, there were other fisheries which, side by side with cod, were being established in this part of the world. I take as my second instance in Volume III the case of Cartwright. This again your Lordship has had a reference to, and I will not delay. It is page 1059. There were two people called Cartwright, and this was George. This was a long petition. I can pick out what matters in it very briefly, and it is very important. It was a memorial of George Cartwright which showed : “ In the spring of the year 1770, when no British subject in Labrador would venture to reside farther northward than Chatteau Bay ”—your Lordship remembers where that is—“ and the islands immediately adjacent, your Lordships’ Memorialist, at great hazard and expence settled himself in the River Charles on the said Coast, in order to establish Seal and Salmon Fisheries ; to fish for Cod : to carry on the Furring Business ; to open a friendly and Commercial intercourse with the Esquimaux Indians with whom we were then upon very bad terms ; and to commence, if possible, a Shore Whale–fishery.” Having set that out, in the following pages he deals with the different kinds of fishery, and on page 1061 he says : “ The Salmon Fisheries of Labradore are extremely numerous.” I think your Lordship has already had that paragraph, and on page 1062 he deals with the furring business. Then on page 1063 he talks of the importance of the English getting sealing and salmon fishing crews, and so on. The consequence of it all is this : if you look at page 1066 you will see that these having come before the authorities at home—I remember the Lord Chancellor pointing out that this was a document addressed to the authorities at home—it is endorsed, do you observe, “ Newfoundland,” it was docketed or ticketed at the end. On page 1070 you get the way in which it is dealt with by the Lords of Trade to whom it had been referred. Page 1069 begins : “ Representation of Lords of Trade to the King upon Memorials presented by Cartwright,” and so on ; and the way in which it is dealt with is this. There is a very remarkable passage on page 1070, “ That having been attended by the several Memorialists in person, and entered fully into an examination of the nature and circumstances of the Fisheries for Seal and Salmon in the rivers and bays upon the Coast of Labrador ”—observe the rivers upon the coast of Labrador—“ as likewise of the Fishery for Cod by Ships fitted out from Great Britain, it does appear to us from the different Seasons proper for these Fisheries, and the different modes of carrying them on, that they may not only be conducted without interruption and detriment to each other, but that the only method of making these undertakings an object of Consideration to the Public, or of advantage to Individuals concerned in them, will be by thus carrying them on in connection with each other by Ships annually fitted out from Great Britain.” The idea was that these annual excursions from Great Britain would be excursions by people who were going to fish salmon as well as cod. “ And as it does further appear to be manifest that actual residence and continued possession are essentially necessary to the carrying on the Seal and Salmon Fisheries on the Coast of Labrador ”—we shall see in a moment whose business it was to deal with this actual residence on the Coast of Labrador—“ We beg Leave humbly to submit to your Majesty the following regulation as proper for securing the possessions of persons concerned in the said resident Fisheries of Seal and Salmon on the above coast, namely, That such of Your Majesty's Subjects of Great Britain and Ireland who have taken or shall hereafter take such actual possession in any of the Rivers and Bays ”—no sort of distinction between salinity or marine fauna—“ on the coast of Labrador to the North of the Streights of Bellisle, and who have erected, or shall hereafter erect Houses and Warehouses, and have made or shall hereafter make other Establishments necessary to the carrying on the Seal and Salmon Fisheries, shall be protected in such possession, provided such persons do for the future annually fit out from Great Britain one or more Ship or Ships to be employed in the Cod Fishery on the said Coast of Labradore, and provided also ”—I ask attention to these concluding words, on line 28, on page 1070 —“ and provided also that the greatest care be taken that the Proprietor or Proprietors of such fishing Posts do not claim or occupy a greater Extent of the Coast within the said Bays or Rivers.” There you have, as I think Lord Sumner observed the other day, a phrase that you are not to “ occupy a greater extent of the coast within the rivers.” What does that mean, unless it means that the person who drew up this document conceived the coast, in this connection, as being a slope that went down, through which various rivers might run—“ than shall in the Judgement of Your Majesty's Governor of Newfoundland –"it is in terms treated as a matter in the jurisdiction of Newfoundland–" or the Officer by him deputed, be thought absolutely necessary in proportion to the Number of Vessels." I know your Lordships have had that passage before, and I respectfully submit that it is a very striking passage occurring, as it does, in the year 1773 ; that is to say within a very short time, a very few years, in ten years, of the beginning of this very annexation. I have not myself observed any other passage which bore directly on this instance of Cartwright, and I am indebted to my learned friend Mr. Geoffrion for the remaining reference in Volume VI. I am indebted to my learned friend for his candour in reading it, because obviously, so far as it had any bearing upon the case, it was entirely opposed to the interests of Canada. At page 2772, of Volume VI, this same man, George Cartwright, in the following year, is reporting what he is doing. Your Lordship sees where we have got to. Cartwright mentions this claim, that he ought to be confirmed in the possession of territory in Labrador for the purposes of a salmon fishery. He is told by the Lords of Trade that his claim is good and that the Government of Newfoundland will grant it. Then on page 2770 of Volume VI you get in the following year his own report to the authorities, and he describes what he has been doing, and all about the salmon season on the Charles River, This man, George Cartwright, was the most important person in Sandwich Bay, an area which my learned friend does not suggest should be taken from me. I want to see what kind of things he is doing there. On page 2771 he gives an account of how he was getting on in his sealing and salmon posts and how he has fixed up a sealing and two salmon posts. Over the page, 2772, at the bottom of the page, George Cartwright is reporting : " Our Shalloway is this instant returned "–that is some sort of vessel–" from Sandwich Bay where she left our Furriers in possession of the Salmon Rivers." Reading that with the document of the previous year, which is, as we see, to be regarded as the granting of a title which is to be conferred on him through the Governor of Newfoundland, how is it open to serious dispute that salmon, and, for the matter of that, furring is quite as much an affair in this neighbourhood as cod? The third date I selected is 1777. The name of the man is again Irish, like Skeffington, it is Coghlan, and you will find in Volume III, at page 1269, a passage which again my learned friend, Mr. Barrington–Ward, called attention to. I will only deal with it, therefore, in this connection, very briefly. In the year 1777 Coghlan is saying : " Early in the Government of my very respected good friend, Sir Hugh Pallisser "–he was the Governor of Newfoundland–" and by His recommendation I was the first English Subject that settled in the Seal Fishery at Chateaux, so long back as the year '65, and finding it most eligible to pursue the Cod and Salmon Fisheries farther North on the said Coast, I fitted out an armed Sloop to guard against the Esquimaux Indians, and having Lord Rutherford on Board, then Lieutenant of the Niger, the late Sir Thomas Adams, Commander at Chateaux, the said Sloop proceeded on a Discovery from the former Port to Cape Charles, Alexis, St. Francis, and Porcupine Bays, on the North Coast of Labrador.” He is referring to Sir Hugh Palliser, and he says Sir Hugh Palliser is the man who has encouraged him to do this, and he is describing how he went to various places on the Coast of Labrador, which he names, Cape Charles, Alexis, St. Francis, Porcupine Bay on the Coast of Labrador, “and on her return encouraged by Sir Thomas Adams “–he was the deputy–“ I communicated my intentions to Sir Hugh Palliser of Settling a Residence at the former places, for the purpose of carrying on a Cod and Salmon Fisheries, in whose answer to me on the occasion he says ‘ pursue your undertakings on the Coast of Labrador which are highly recommendary to me, and no after Commer, shall dispossess you”’. That is, the Governor of Newfoundland was saying that. “ Still the Difficulty of getting Proper people at that time to reside at the said Places was a hard task, however in 1769, being join'd by a Captain Cartwright, of the Army, and a Lieut. Lucas of the Navy, who were acquainted on the Coast, we formed a Settlement at Cape Charles, and fitted out an Armed Schooner to go among the Northern Tribe of the Esquimaux Indians to trade, the said Schooner having been unluckily lost, and Lieut. Lucas in her, who was a Man of Honour, I thought it most advisable to dissolve my connections with Mr. Cartwright having been subject to a heavy loss, each Persons settlements being allotted on the Coast of Labrador ”–the two partners separated ; one partner got his settlement at one point, and the other partner got his settlement at the other point : –“he remained with Cape Charles and Sandwich Bay Rivers, confirmed by Lord Dartmouth, then at the head of the Board of Trade, and I kept possession of Alexis and the other Rivers to Porcupine Bay, a little at this side of Mr. Cartwright ” ; and he gives a description of what he is doing. It follows, therefore, quite plainly, I think, from the instance of Mr. Coghlan, that with regard to the Alexis and other rivers–and there are a series of them ; they run down to the sea just south of the exit of Hamilton Inlet–there is no question, I should apprehend, that as a matter of fact all parties treated this area as an area in which salmon fishery and seal fishery and the occupation of rivers, establishing yourself to that extent inland, was perfectly within the jurisdiction of the Governor of Newfoundland.

Sir John Simon.

I will give your Lordships one other instance, in 1821, and then I am content to pass from the point ; I could give more. In 1821, you find in Volume III, at page 1222, a passage which again my friend Mr. Geoffrion read this morning. I am not myself clear what was the purpose in support of any case of Canada for which it was read ; it appears to me to be a very strong instance the other way. This is Captain William Martin, who is a gentleman who was sent by a Governor Hamilton to explore Hamilton Inlet—this very area of water about which we are talking. If you will turn back to page 1215, you will see the origin of it. My learned friend Mr. Geoffrion did not refer to page 1215. This is in the year 1820. Now from 1809 onwards, Newfoundland was the authority over an area—I suggest over the green, but whether over the green or not, in 1820 this is what is happening. Governor Hamilton, the Governor of Newfoundland, is reporting to Lord Bathurst, who was Colonial Secretary : “ My Lord, it has also been represented to me that there is an extensive inlet on the coast of Labrador called Gross Water ”—now Gross Water is one of the names by which Lake Melville goes—“ which is said to abound with very fine fir Timber fit for Naval purposes, and it is my intention, if the force sent out will admit of it, to employ Captain Buchan whose experience and abilities are well adapted to such an expedition on this service next summer. I have lately heard that he is safely moored and covered over in the River Exploits.”

p. 781

Lord WARRINGTON : I was looking at Martin's report ; which is the one you are reading ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : I was reading at page 1215, as showing how it came about that there was an exploration of the Hamilton Inlet. The explanation is that at page 1215 Governor Hamilton was reporting to Lord Bathurst that there was this extensive inlet on the Coast of Labrador called Gross Water ; and Gross Water is an alias for Lake Melville. He is saying : “ I am going to send one of my naval officers to explore it.” The officer he did send was Captain William Martin, and now see what this gentleman, Captain William Martin, reports to his chief, Sir Charles Hamilton. He says at page 1222: “ I arrived in the entrance of this inlet the 12th instant, having but light and variable winds ” ; then he gives some navigating details, and then he says, at line 13 : “ From the 13th to the 23rd I have been employed in ascertaining the extent and source of this inlet.” That is this very thing which my friend wants to call a lake: “ I run up in the Brig 140 miles from N.N. W.” It runs about 140 miles inland.

Lord WARRINGTON : I think 140 miles goes to the entrance of Goose Bay.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes. There can be no doubt what this navigator was doing. Then he says : “ Thence I proceeded in a shallop (which a Canadian merchant kindly offer to accompany us) with Canoes to the source, where we arrived at a Grand Waterfall or rapids." Those were the Grand Falls of the River Hamilton, which I suppose were then for the first time visited by a white man. That, of course, is not merely the head of Hamilton Inlet ; it is going up the River. There is a great fall of water at a point your Lordship appreciates which I need not indicate on this model, but it is higher up. I do not think on my little hand chart it is actually indicated, but I can tell your Lordships approximately where it is. If I am not mistaken, it is about the word " Hamilton " in the description " Hamilton or Grand River."

Mr. MACMILLAN : At the letter "H" of "Hamilton."

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, between the "H" and the "M" ; I am not quite sure. It is somewhere near the first syllable of the word "Hamilton" in the inscription " Hamilton or Grand River." What this officer is doing, therefore, is this : the Governor of Newfoundland reports to Lord Bathurst that there is a great inlet and that he proposes in the next year to have it properly explored and surveyed. You then get his deputy, Captain Martin, going up and making this report and nobody can doubt that from the point of view of the navigator acting for the Government of Newfoundland he, at any rate, imagined that he was going upon an arm of the sea, and then he got up to, as my Lord says, Goose Bay perhaps.

Lord WARRINGTON : At any rate, your view may be that he was going up through territory, all of which had been annexed to Newfoundland.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Of course, that is my contention, but for the moment I am going purely on interior lines and endeavouring to dispose of this suggestion. It does not support the view that the jurisdiction of Newfoundland ends at the Narrows. That is what I am attacking ; I am saying that the whole story here is quite inconsistent with any such artificial construction.

Mr. MACMILLAN : May I just say that I do not agree with your view that the Grand Waterfall there means the Grand Falls on the river ? I do not think he could possibly have got up to there.

8 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I am told that my friend is quite right. There are some other falls called Musk Rat ; there are some intermediate falls ; I am no doubt wrong. Of course, there are degrees of grandeur ; if one has only seen a Musk Rat Fall it appears to be grand, but it does not appear so when you have seen Niagara. Then he says : “ I have had communication with the Red Indians,” and so on. My Lords, I am told it is 27 miles in from Goose Bay that you arrive at Musk Rat Falls.

Now, my Lords, all those passages go to this : With the action taken about Skeffington, which is only analogy, in the Island of Newfoundland in 1719, with the action taken about George Cartwright in Sandwich Bay in 1770 and 1773, with the action taken about Coghlan in 1777 on the River Alexis and the like, and with the conduct of Captain Martin in 1821, is it surprising that when Graves' instructions were revised there was the express insertion in them, as your Lordship noted this morning, that he was to pay particular attention to exploring the rivers ? And not only were those his instructions, but he did as he was instructed to do, as you will find in Volume II.

Lord WARRINGTON : I suppose it may be said on both, not only this one but on the one which you previously read, the reference at page 1070, that the rivers were on the coast. They are described there as being rivers on the coast ; and if the rivers were included in that territory, then they would be in that territory which had to be included.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I think so, my Lord. Could we not perhaps carry it a shade further by using the actual expression used ? My recollection is that the actual expression used is not so much that the rivers are on the coast but that the coast is within the rivers, which must surely mean that an area which is being drained by the river is to be regarded as part of the coast of Newfoundland. My Lord, I was referring to page 1070. I think Lord Warrington's eye had caught line 8 : " Rivers and Bays upon the coast."

p. 783

Lord WARRINGTON : Yes.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Then your Lordships observe at line 30 you get this expression : " Do not claim or occupy a greater extent of the coast within the said Bays or Rivers," and so on. All I am saying is that this severely maritime flavour which my friend's delicate perception detects in these documents must surely be qualified when we find that things go as far inland as that.

Then, my Lords, I was going to say that not only was the language of the instructions to the Governors of Newfoundland expressly altered so as to direct them to attend to the rivers, but they did it, as your Lordships will see if you look at Volume II, page 387. This is not the report, but this shows what under this head the Lords of Trade consider to be important. This is a document which must be looked at again from another point of view. You will see, beginning at line 12, the Lords of Trade are saying : " With respect to the Necessity of any additional Instructions upon which We are directed to give Our Opinion, We beg leave humbly to represent to your Majesty, that Your Subjects employed in the Fishery at Newfoundland, having of late engaged more extensively in the Fishery on the North eastern Part of Newfoundland, upon which Coast the French have also a Right, by the Treaty of Utrecht, to catch and dry Fish during the Season, under certain Restrictions ; The great and extensive Whale Fishery in the Streights of Bellisle, with the other Branches of the Salmon "—this idea that the salmon is an afterthought is quite contrary to the document—" and Seal Fishery, attending the Coast from the Mouth of those Streights to the River St. Lawrence, and the Fishery of the River St. Lawrence itself, of Gaspee, of Canceaux, the Madelain Islands, St. Johns & Cape Breton being now annexed to His Majesty's Dominions by the Definitive Treaty ; The general Fishery of Newfoundland, and the Gulf and the Coasts with it is become a Matter of infinite Extent "—I am not going to argue that that is there used in a geographical sense—" and of the utmost importance " ; it means that they have got all sorts of ramifications.

So, my Lords, I think I have made good the point on the documents that there is no reason at all for supposing that the framers of the documents of 1763 had any desire at all to exclude Newfoundland from any waters that were accessible from the open sea, and more especially is there no reason to think so when it appears that even if cod prefer a greater salinity, none the less some cod may sometimes be found, and there are other fisheries of great importance.

8 Nov., 1926.

Now, my Lords, all this is strongly confirmed by the contemporary maps, but I think it would consult the convenience of your Lordships if I do not trouble you at this moment actually to take the atlas in your hand, because as the Lord Chancellor said, I have to take the maps for another purpose. Perhaps your Lordships will be good enough to take this from me, and I will make it good when I do turn to the maps. If you do take the contemporary maps, the weight of the contemporary maps is altogether in favour of regarding the whole of this water area as far as Goose Bay, as forming part of an Inlet. I do not say that there is no instance to the contrary ; the practice of geographers of course varies, but I do not think there is any doubt at all, whether you take the Newfoundland Atlas or the Canadian Atlas, that the contemporary maps treat this disputable area of water as being Gross Water Bay; that is the ordinary expression ; I suppose that means Great Water Bay. You will find it so in Bellin; you will find it so in Rocque; you will find it so in quite a number of maps at the time.

Now, as against that, which seems a very strong prima facie case, with regard to the case which my learned friends for Canada seek to set up, I do not wish in any way to speak harshly of the material which is at their disposal and which of course has been displayed to the Board by Mr. Macmillan with a persuasiveness which gains a great deal from his moderation ; but the fact of the matter is this : that the whole of the Canadian expert evidence has been procured for the purpose of this case, and after it has been realised that the head waters of the Hamilton Inlet are surrounded by extremely valuable woods. Their map of Lake Melville, which my friend so artistically introduced to you as though it would be the natural standard reference for this area, is a map which has been expressly made for the purposes of arguing this case, unlike the Admiralty Chart, which was not expressly made for this purpose. Their surveys and their scientific material have been expressly collected for the purpose—I do not wish to attribute motives—I will say in the hope that it might support their case. Therefore if I were to have regard to the views of a Canadian expert, I not unnaturally should prefer the views of a Canadian expert who has this advantage, that he said what he had to say and wrote what he had to write before this controversy arose ; and who could there be better than Professor A. P. Low, who was responsible for the survey of this neighbourhood and whose map, you recollect, your Lordships have already seen ?

Now if your Lordships will take Volume V, you will find what this distinguished authority has to say about it, at page 2593. I am quoting a Canadian authority ; he is none the worse for that ; he is a very distinguished man and has the great advantage of having been there. I think Lord Finlay will be interested in this passage, because he asked for a description of the place. This is what Professor Low has got to say, at page 2592, line 35 : “The eastern coast of the Labrador Peninsula extends north–north–west, from the Strait of Belle Isle to Cape Chidley, a distance of about seven hundred miles, or from latitude 52 degrees to latitude 60 degrees 30 minutes, fronting the North Atlantic. The northern boundary from Cape Chidley to Cape Wolstenholme, at the entrance of Hudson Bay, in a straight line, is nearly five hundred miles long, and runs about west–north–west in direction, forming the southern shore of Hudson Strait including Ungava Bay. A line drawn from Cape Wolstenholme to the bottom of James Bay, runs nearly north–and–south for eight hundred miles, and corresponds closely to the eastern shore–line of the peninsula.” This distinguished authority seems to have thought that that might be so. “ The southern boundary is arbitrary but has been taken as a straight line extending in a direction nearly east from the south end of James Bay near latitude 51 deg., to the Gulf of St Lawrence near Seven Islands in latitude 50 deg. This line is nearly six hundred miles long and passes close to the south end of Lake Mistassini. From where the line reaches the Gulf coast, in the neighbourhood of Seven Islands, the shore–line forms the southern boundary to the Strait of Belle Isle with a length of somewhat over five hundred miles.” That is a description of the peninsula. “ The total area embraced within these boundaries is approximately 511,000 square miles, of which, previous to the present explorations, 289,000 square miles were practically unknown.”

Viscount HALDANE : What is the square mileage of Great Britain, do you remember ?

8 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I wrote it down for comparison. The area of Great Britain is 89,000 square miles. Your Lordship will remember I gave you one or two figures in order to get the proportion. The whole Labrador Peninsula being some 511,000 square miles, the green area which is the matter now in litigation is 100,000 or 102,000 square miles. It does not matter exactly what it is– call it 100,000 square miles. It is substantially one–fifth of the whole, and is, of course, a very large area.

I wanted your Lordship to see how Professor Low dealt with this Hamilton Inlet. He says, at line 14, page 2593: The Atlantic coast is exceedingly irregular, being deeply cut by many long narrow bays, or fiords, so that the coast–line exceeds many times the direct distance from Belle Isle to Cape Chidley. Hamilton Inlet is the largest and longest of these inlets, extending inland over one hundred and fifty miles from its mouth.” According to the Dominion of Canada, assisted by some expert evidence of the last few years, it is not an inlet at all, but is something of a perfectly different character. This gentleman says : “Hamilton Inlet is the largest and longest of these inlets, extending inland over one hundred and fifty miles from its mouth. Among others, Sandwich, Kaipokok, Saglek and Nachvak bays are from thirty to fifty miles deep. These narrow fiords are surrounded by rocky hills that rise abruptly from the water to heights ranging from 1,000 feet to 4,000 feet. The water of the inlets is generally deep and varies from ten to one hundred fathoms.” That is not peculiar to Hamilton Inlet at all. That is a perfectly common, and, indeed, an inevitable consequence of the physical history of this part of the world. You will get very deep cavities in these bays before you reach the shallower ground, and get out into the Atlantic. “ A fringe of small rocky islands extends almost continually along the coast, with a breadth of from five to twenty-five miles. Outside the islands, the inner banks extend seaward for an average distance of about fifteen miles, and on them the water is rarely over forty fathoms deep. From this it will be seen that the fiords, as a rule, have greater depths than the banks outside the island fringe.” I have always understood that you talk about the “bank” of Newfoundland because, as a matter of fact, it is part of the sea where the actual depth is not so great as in other places, but there is not the smallest indication in Professor Low's treatise that he thinks he is dealing with something quite different from all the other inlets.

In the same volume if your Lordships will turn to page 2486, your Lordships will see an extract from a book which is very often used in circumstances like this in the Admiralty Court and elsewhere, known as “ The Newfoundland Pilot.” Your Lordships know there are issued official volumes for different parts of the world. There is the “ North Sea Pilot,” the “ Newfoundland Pilot,” and so on. And, of course, they are kept and consulted by navigators, and they contain a description of the places you might meet. Observe the way in which this perfectly impartial document describes Hamilton Inlet.

Viscount HALDANE : Do you say it is official ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : Oh, yes ! It is a thing you will find in the locker of a schooner. Anyone who goes yachting on the south coast of this country usually provides himself with a “Pilot,” because it gives him some indication as to where he is likely to get an anchorage, as well as giving him a chart. It is a thing of regular usage. The extract at page 2486 says : “ Hamilton Inlet (Ivuctoke or Grosse Water Bay) is entered between Tub Island and Pompey Island, which bears 2° true, distant 15 miles. It extends west–south–westward 35 miles to the Narrows, the intervening space containing several islands. Within the Narrows which are 3½ cables wide, the inlet extends south–westward 90 miles, opening to the width of 18 miles in Lake Melville, and narrowing again at its head “–that is, the head of the inlet–“ into which Gillesport (Hamilton or Grand) river, a large stream, flows. Hamilton Inlet is the largest of the many long fiords which indent the north–east coast of Labrador.” I will not delay your Lordships by reading the rest of this passage, but there is a minute description of it, and so far as I have observed there is not the slightest ground for supposing that this particular sinuosity is different in character from any other sinuosity except that it is bigger and more valuable. I am not aware of any other distinction which is material in this case.

As against all that I next submit this. You have, it is true, a perfectly definite test as to how far the public right of fishery extends. The English law provides you with that. But it has nothing to do with how much tide there is, or how salt the water is. The question is whether or not there is a flow and re–flow of tide. There is, in fact, all things considered, a quite substantial rise and fall of tide in this particular disputed water, because it rises a matter of four feet. There is in fact quite a considerable degree of salinity. For example, it is a great deal more salt than the Baltic. If you are going to say a thing cannot be an arm of the sea because cod are not caught there, then the Baltic is not an arm of the sea. The truth is that if both the rise and fall of the tide and the degree of salt in the water, as shown in the documents we have put in in the case, were indeed tests, and if they proved that Lake Melville is not an arm of the sea, then the Baltic is pure fresh water. But as against that, if we are going to deal with the thing in a scientific way, there is material which is available in these volumes. I will only indicate it without seeking to read it, and if your Lordships will be good enough either to read the pages, or hereafter to consult the Shorthand Notes to get them, that is all that is necessary.

On geology perhaps the best material I can present to the Board is advanced by Professor Gregory, and that is in Volume V, page 2489. Professor Gregory, as your Lordships may know, is Professor of Geology at Glasgow University, and I do not think anybody will dispute that he is one of the principal living geologists. So far as geology goes, beginning at page 2489, he gives a most careful account of this area. Incidentally I think Lord Finlay might like to know that in the view of Professor Gregory you do get what I may call a unity in the area I am speaking of. He contrasts what I call my green area, the Atlantic slope, with the slope on the other side, and suggests that there are certain elements of unity in the area I am speaking of. But I do not press that. Then there is a summary which I ask leave to call attention to. That is in Volume V, page 2508. I think if I may read the summary, I will leave your Lordships, if you think right, to consult the details.

Lord WARRINGTON : Was this written by Professor Gregory for the purposes of this case.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord. Professor Gregory had put before him the material which had been filed or presented, which is partly due, I think, to the observations of a gentleman called Professor Kindle.

Lord WARRINGTON : I thought that must be so because I see on page 2505 there is a discussion on the meaning of the word "coast."

Sir JOHN SIMON : Oh, yes, my Lord. There is no question about it.

Lord WARRINGTON : We had not been referred to it.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I think one of your Lordships asked when one of my learned friends on the other side was arguing, what was the best summary on our side, and I think if I had to pick one and only one I should take Professor Gregory's summary.

Viscount FINLAY : I think it was I who asked for that.

p. 788

Sir JOHN SIMON : That naturally may be discounted as being the view of one distinguished man only.

Lord WARRINGTON : But still it gives an example in Canadian geography of where “ coast ” is used.

Sir JOHN SIMON : In British Columbia there is an actual compartment which is called “Coast,” and it is a very considerable area. But I am not concerned so much with analogy, as with the facts here. On page 2508 there is the conclusion of this gentleman who has been examining the thing from a geological point of view. He says : “ The Peninsula of Labrador consists of two main sections—an eastern belt facing the Atlantic, which is high and mountainous, and is deeply indented by many arms of the sea (fiords and fiards).” I do not know whether your Lordships happen to know the refinement which distinguishes a fiord from a fiard. I gather from reading these papers that if the chasm in the structure of the earth fills up with water to a limited extent it is a fiord, but that if in the process of nature, because the whole skin of the earth sinks, you get water welling up to a higher level —of course it keeps its own level, but the ground is sinking —the thing changes in its character and becomes what the geologists call a fiard. A fiard is a drowned fiord. That is the sort of distinction.

8 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Viscount FINLAY : If it is drowned it is not there.

Sir JOHN SIMON : It is not all drowned.. Perhaps one should say that a fiard has the appearance which is presented if the ground which surrounded a fiord has been further immersed. “ The western section is a plateau with a comparatively gentle undulating surface sloping downward to Hudson Bay and Ungava Bay. The high mountains and arms of the sea in the western section give it a distinct geographical entity. This belt has been called, as by some Canadian geographical authorities, the coastal region, and that term is in accordance with geographical and Canadian usage, as may be illustrated by the wide areas assigned to ‘Coast ’ in British Columbia.”

Mr. BARRINGTON-WARD : The word “western,” in line 19,. is a misprint.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, that is so. The word “ western ” should “ eastern,” of course. It should read : “ The high mountains and arms of the sea in the eastern section give it a distinct geographical entity.” Then the Summary goes on : “ The Hamilton Inlet has been generally accepted as a fiord, and as the longest fiord in Labrador. Its entrance is not a ria, but a fiard ; and the inner (Lake Melville) is the essential part of Hamilton Inlet, and to it the name inlet was first applied.” It is rather a striking fact that “ Inlet ” as a label is first attached to the Grosse Water Bay part. “ As a deep basin filled with seawater below a thin layer of freshwater, it is an arm of the sea. Its branch, the Double Mer, is accepted as a fiord, and Lake Melville has still better title to the name fiord. The Labrador inlets were neither cut by ice nor by ancient rivers. Their arrangement shows that they were due to the fracturing of the eastern coast of Labrador during the earth-movements which upheaved the Labrador coastal mountains and led to the foundering of the floor of the North Atlantic basin. The inlets are true fiords ; their arrangement is essentially different from that of river valleys, the normal arrangement of which is illustrated by the river valleys on the Labrador plateau. Labrador is strikingly similar in structure to Scandinavia, both peninsulas which in each consist of blocks of ancient rocks are found on both sides of the watershed. The watershed is the main boundary between the fiord-river mountainous region of Norway and the gentler slope of Sweden to the Baltic.” That will show your Lordships the kind of material available in much greater detail in the pages which precede.

p. 789

Immediately following that—and I direct a little attention to it—is the comment made by Mr. Tate Regan (who is the Keeper of Zoology at the British Museum), which is one of the documents on which Canada relies. With regard to Dr. Kindle's effort to prove by reference to botanical specimens and the like that the inner waters which I call Hamilton Inlet should be regarded as Lake and not as marine, I forbear to read the document, but if your Lordships will cast your eye through it you will observe that with much deliberation, and more in sorrow than in anger, Mr. Tate Regan points out that it is quite obvious Dr. Kindle knows nothing about it. And a rather amusing thing is if you read Dr. Kindle's account of the botany of this place, he vouches as the gentleman who has catalogued or helped to list his specimens a gentleman who as a matter of fact was a student. If you turn to page 2370 you will see in this extremely elaborate botanical excursus of the Canadian Professor, he says : “ The plants in this list were collected by R. H. Wetmore. Determinations were made by R. H. Wetmore under direction of Professor M. L. Fernald, of Harvard University.” I will show in a moment that Professor Fernald of Harvard University knows all about this, and has also had dealings with Mr. R. H. Wetmore, and puts the matter in its true aspect. Professor Fernald is Professor of Botany at Harvard, and what he says is to be found in Volume VIII, page 3936.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Are you going into this at length ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : No, my Lord, indeed I am not. When one comes to page 3936, Professor Fernald of Harvard University, who was Fisher Professor of Natural History (Botany) at that University, deals with all this elaborate table and catalogue of the plants of Hamilton Inlet, and says at page 3937: " Dr. Kindle's party contained a student, Mr. R. H. Wetmore, subsequently one of my students, who was instructed to collect specimens of all flowering plants seen." And then he proceeds to deal in detail with all sorts of specimens, and points out that there has been a misapprehension on the Canadian side. The real reason why some of these things he catalogues are not to be found blossoming or growing at, let us say, Goose Bay, is not because Goose Bay is not sufficiently saline, but it is because Goose Bay is not sufficiently boisterous. Those are things that grow on exposed places, and when you get into Goose Bay I believe they even grow cranberries there, and various fruits.

p. 790

So that I leave these gentlemen to fight their battles out in these interesting volumes more in detail. My submission is that there is nothing whatever in this attempt to try and secure that, Hamilton Inlet is to be dealt with under a sort of contracting-out clause. There is not the smallest ground known to me on examination of these documents, why it should be supposed that in 1763 those who were responsible wished to draw any such distinction. In so far as this distinction is suggested to arise from scientific conditions, while wishing to give all due weight to anything said on the other side, it would appear as though the weight of testimony, so far at any rate as it is uncoloured by the controversy having arisen, is entirely in favour of the whole inlet being called Hamilton Inlet. There is an appreciable ebb and flow ; there is great depth ; there are steep wall-like sides ; there are undoubted and admitted fiords alongside, such as Double Mer ; there is navigability, there being not the slightest difficulty in very considerable ships getting up there ; the basin is permanently salt. The surface is salt in spite of the very large contribution of fresh water which is of course always engaged in diluting it. The Hamilton River, as a river, debouches into Goose Bay or the head of the inlet, and there you do find the bar, the natural river bar at its mouth, for the bar of Hamilton River and the North West River is in Goose Bay, not 140 miles further down at all. Lake Melville receives not one river, but many rivers, and perhaps one may describe it as an ante-room of the sea. If you look at this Admiralty chart its true character, at any rate the view of those who issue impartial directions and who are experts, is plain enough, it is to be regarded as an inlet. I say that in order to get rid of the suggested case against me, but, of course, it is no part of my own case, because I am relying upon tests which are much more fundamental than that.

Now, my Lords, if I might have regard to the time, I think I could usefully use the time which I imagine remains to-day, if I were to point out to your Lordships why I say that the Proclamation of the 7th of October, 1763, is not the controlling document and that the document which in fact does control the matter is the Commission. We have been led to make a little further investigation on this subject because of the observations made by some of your Lordships in the course of the argument. One of your Lordships pointed out that if you take the Proclamation (printed, of course, as your Lordships know, in the first Volume at page 153) you see an indication that there has been the advice of the Privy Council. You find the passage, for example, at page 153.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : You get it again at page 154.

Sir JOHN SIMON : That is the particular one I am coming to. On page 153 you get it at line 12: “ We have thought fit with the advice of our Privy Council ” ; then, as the Lord Chancellor says, and it is more immediately important, you get it at page 154, line 17 : “ With the advice of our said Privy Council.” That suggested what I confess I myself had not in the first instance observed, namely, this question, whether the Commission to Graves which your Lordship remembers is to be found printed immediately before this document on page 149 could be regarded as being issued with the advice of the Privy Council, because if you examine the language of the Commission, the actual language of the document itself does not say so, and indeed no Commission under the Great Seal would say so. If your Lordship looks at the end of the Commission at page 152 you will, observe it is a Commission “ By writt of Privy Council,” which means as your Lordships know, or did at least in that period of our constitutional history, the Privy Seal is used as an authority for the purpose of requesting the impression of the Great Seal, then the Great Seal in its turn is used. Of course, we are now living in times where the use of the Privy Seal as a condition precedent to the imposition of the Great Seal is obsolete. I think the Statute is 1884, the Great Seal Act, which provided that there shall be no case in which the use of the Great Seal is to be conditional upon the use of the Privy Seal, but in these days, in the days of George the Third, the Privy Seal was constantly used as the way of securing or requisitioning, regularising, the use of the Great Seal.

Lord WARRINGTON : This comes from the Patent Roll?

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes.

Lord WARRINGTON : There is a note at the head.

Sir JOHN SIMON : What we have discovered is this, the Registry or Index of the Privy Council documents has been available (indeed it is in this building), enquiries have been made and we have discovered what we did not know before, that on a particular day and on the same day there was an Order-in-Council made in terms which authorised and approved both the Commission and the Instructions. The document, your Lordship, is a document of the 30th March, 1763. I told my Lords these documents will be actually available in print to-morrow morning. Perhaps I may just make my point now, because it does fill up a small gap which was remarkable. If I may just read from the Privy Council Register the record of the 30th March, 1763, it is in these terms : “ Newfoundland. Commission for Thomas Graves to be Governor. Approved.” And the next document with the same date is “ Instructions for Governor Graves. Approved.” I will just read the first document. “ Upon reading at the Board a representation of the Lords Commissioners for Trade and Plantations dated the 15th of this instant, setting forth, in obedience to His Majesty's Commands signified to him by the Earl of Egremont, one of His Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, they have prepared the draught of a Commission appointing Thomas Graves, Esqre., to be Governor and Commander in Chief of the Island of Newfoundland and all the coast of Labrador from the entrance of Hudson's Streights to the River St. John's which discharges itself into the sea nearly opposite the West end of the island of Anticosti, including that island, with any other small islands on the said Coast of Labrador, and also the islands of Madelaines in the Gulph of St. Lawrence, His Majesty this day"—that is to say the 30th March—" took the said Representation"—that is the representation of the Lords Commissioners for Trade and Plantations"—together with the said draught of a Commission into his royal consideration, and was pleased with the advice of His Privy Council to approve the said draught, and to order as it is hereby ordered that the Right Honourable the Earl of Egremont, one of His Majesty's Principal Secretary's of State do cause a warrant to be prepared for His Majesty's royal signature in order to pass the said draught of a commission under the Great Seal.' Then follows a similar one about the instructions. Your Lordships see this clears up two points, which, I quite agree, at the moment were a little doubtful. In the first place it brings the Commission and the Instructions together. The documents which are before your Lordships, the Commission, which is at page 149, of the first volume, and the Instructions, which are in the second volume at page 391, would appear to bear different date, but the explanation is, those are merely the drafts, and they being both ready in draft on one and the same day, namely, the 30th March, 1763, they are both brought before the King in Council and there are two Orders-in-Council, consecutive Orders-in-Council, made which record that they are approved by and with the advice of the Privy Council. That is one thing that it does ; it brings the two things together in point of date. I might observe on this, it is rather an interesting sidelight, that although the Order-in-Council was, as you see, or the Orders-in-Council were those made on the 30th March, 1763, they did not in fact issue the Commission and Instructions for nearly another month, and though I am not able to assert this from anything I have read, I venture respectfully to suggest as a probable explanation, that the salary of the Governor began as from the moment when the Commission was issued, and as he did not in fact leave this country until, I think, the 2nd May, it was not until the 25th April, if I remember the date rightly, that the document was passed under the Great Seal, which shows that the principles of national economy had not been entirely forgotten in the year 1763. That is one thing it does. Now the other thing, which is perhaps more important, is this : I venture to think that this additional Order-in-Council does establish, I trust it establishes quite clearly, and conclusively, that the Proclamation of the 7th October is not the operative document or the root of title, and perhaps I might use the next few minutes to point out to your Lordships what I am afraid at a little later date I must develop—I wish to point out as clearly as ever I can, what it is which the Proclamation of the 7th October, 1763, was primarily directed to do. It consists, as your Lordships have noticed, very largely of recitals ; but the object of the Proclamation of the 7th October, 1763, was to secure a publication to the Tribes of Indians in the Indian country, who had been the Allies of George the Second's Army till 1760, and had been dependent upon and associated with George the Third's Army, with the British—in order to issue to them in the most formal and effective shape the assurance that what Britain was now going to do, after the War had ended in the triumph of British arms, was not going to involve the appropriation for private purposes of the Indian country. The rest of the document is mere recital, and (as I will, I think, establish to your Lordships quite clearly when we come to deal with it more in detail) the reason why this document of the 7th October, 1763, was issued, was in order to give in the most effective and solemn way the assurance that the Indian country, which I will establish to your Lordships is a perfectly well understood conception, was not going to be purloined from those tribes of Indians who had been our allies, and who had fought on our side. And the reason for that (I shall have to go into this again rather more in detail, but I mention it now), is this : Your Lordships know, no doubt, the history very well, but I must still, I am sorry to say, and I hope in rather more polite terms, insist that the view to the contrary put up forensically for the Dominion of Canada is woefully inconsistent with the true historical view. The reason is this : in the year 1763, the persons who were responsible for our Colonial government were in a state of very acute anxiety, because after defeating the French, after Wolfe and others had defeated the French, they were in the gravest possible danger of finding there was going to be another and a much more terrible danger develop, namely, a tremendous and successful Indian War. It is very much as though, after having defeated the Boers, you were threatened with a Kaffir rebellion, and the history of the year 1763 really is that these statesmen and counsellors of George III, and I daresay the King himself, were in a position of most acute anxiety because the French, who had been defeated, were going about in the Indian country (places for example like Fort

p. 793

8 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Detroit, which was in the Great Lakes, or like Fort Pitt, which is now Pittsburg, all this area which was round the Great Lakes), and they were spreading the suggestion amongst the Indians there that these Indians who had been dependent upon Britain and associated with Britain were going to be betrayed. As your Lordships no doubt will remember, there was as a matter of fact a most fearfully dangerous development in the heart of America on that account. There was the Indian revolt and there was the Pontiac War about which Dr. Parkman has written two volumes which I read recently, which describes the whole story ; the reason why on the 7th of October, 1763, the authorities here were so anxious to issue this Proclamation, was not because by the Proclamation they were defining the character of the jurisdiction of the Governor, which did not matter a pin, but because they were faced with the most terrific danger of the smash-up of British sovereignty in the heart of North America, after the French had been beaten, by the Indian tribes. And when my friend Mr. Geoffrion in the course of his interesting sketch was saying that in his country it was all school history and everybody knew it, when he was representing to your Lordships the other day how the French had made friends with a certain number of Indians of Tadoussac and the like, he was perfectly right, but he was arguing my case. What happened was, the French, as it turns out very short-sightedly, made friends with a certain number of the tribes about there, with the result that they threw the great mass of the warlike Indian tribes into the arms of the British. And it was the central point of British policy from 1756, from the beginning of the Seven Years War right down to 1763, to give such assurances to these very powerful tribes of warlike Indians, capable of the most appalling enormities, in the heart of America, as would save the Empire which they had just won from the French.

That is the real reason, of course, why the Proclamation was issued ; and that is the reason why the Lords of Trade, in the document I shall have again to ask your attention to, describe the Indian country as they do. They describe the Indian country, you remember, as being that country which is bounded on the one hand by the Mississippi, and Hudson's Bay, and the boundary of the original Province of Quebec, and bounded on the other hand by His Majesty's ancient Colonies, which means the thirteen colonies which were on the Atlantic seaboard ; and inside that area there was enough combustible material to throw the whole of British North America into a terrible conflagration ; and the idea that these kindly people, be they many or be they few—I notice that one of the Governors of Newfoundland who is not quite so good at English spelling as he probably was in other respects, describes them as – pusillanimous ”–which he spells in an extraordinary way—the idea that these poor people were the people who were causing all the principal statesmen of our Mother Country here in Whitehall and Downing Street to issue this Proclamation, is, I say quite deliberately, one of the most astonishing misunderstandings of Canadian history of which one would have thought anyone could have been capable.

Viscount FINLAY : At what page is the Proclamation ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : The Proclamation, at which we shall have to look a little in detail later, is in the first Volume at page 153.

Lord WTARRINGTON : And I suppose, too, the match which might have set fire to all this explosive material, or one of the matches, was the possible encroachment by our settlers on Indian land.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes. It is a very interesting and curious thing that though the undoubted British policy here at home in the 60's of the 18th century was all in favour of discouraging the appropriation of land, say behind the Alleghanies and the like, the view that was taken by many Colonists in the old Colonies of Britain—the view indeed which was taken by George Washington himself—was the exact contrary ; and what was really happening was that while people here were looking at the thing from the Imperial point of view, and were saying : “ We must make a Proclamation which will secure that the people in the Indian country round the Great Lakes, at the back of the ancient Colonies, will believe that Britain is not going to despoil them of their lands,” there was at the same time a very active movement going on inside the ancient Colonies of Britain, in which the distinguished name of George Washington oddly enough appears, in which he is extremely indignant at this British policy, so that one almost begins to suspect that it was not only the tax on tea, but possibly some other thing too, that caused a feeling of resentment in the breasts of some very estimable people in the Ancient Colonies of Britain. All this has nothing in the world to do, with the greatest respect, with this green area ; and the idea that at that time of day, in 1760, Whitehall was in a state of the most tremendous excitement and alarm on account of the Nippiscans or Montagnais is really a thing which it is difficult to describe in reasonable and moderate terms. The whole story is a perfectly different story, and though I will not delay about it now, I, of course, will substitute chapter and verse for mere bold assertion ; still, I must make entirely good my point, and I venture to think I can make absolutely good that “ the said Indians,” in the Proclamation, the Indians who are dependent people and associated with British arms, are not the people in Labrador at all, but are people who are in the heart of the Continent. If your Lordships would remind yourselves for a moment, or would turn to look at the map which we last put up on the screen, your Lordships will appreciate, of course, that the yellow area there, and more particularly the yellow area round the Great Lakes, was the centre of the Indian country. It is so described on the maps of the time. That is the area where you had Indians who were round the Great Lakes and to the West thereof, and the real anxiety of Britain was how to calm the population living there, and to assure them that they were not going to lose their property ; and that was why in 1763 the Lords of Trade urged that Quebec should be limited to the comparatively small slate-coloured lozenge, whereas, apparently, George III, or the Secretary of State, was at one time rather disposed to think that you ought to include the whole section. And observe what the particular reason was why the Lords of Trade resisted the King's view, and finally carried their point. Their reason was this ; you will remember they said : “ If we were to do what you suggest, we should give some colour to the idea that Britain has acquired this Indian territory in virtue of its conquest of the French, whereas,” they said, “this Indian territory is territory which is ours, not in virtue of any cession from the French at all, but in virtue of the various Treaties and bargains and purchases which we have entered into with different Indian tribes.” Now comes the Dominion of Canada, and, through the mouths of my learned friends, Mr. Macmillan and Mr. Geoffrion, they want to persuade you that when the Lords of Trade were saying that, they were talking about the area which they themselves admit was ceded by the French, which was not the subject of any sort of Treaty with any Indian tribes, and which, therefore, by its very description, could not possibly be what the Lords of Trade were talking about. I want at some period to make that point good, by a certain number of definite references, because I quite realise that reference is one thing and assertion is another; but I listened with great attention, of course, to the way in which this case on the Indian territory has been presented on the other side, and it is obviously my duty to the Colony of Newfoundland to do anything I can to present a different and, as we think, a truer view. Let me just add this: running through the whole argument, even of my learned friend Mr. Macmillan, who very seldom allows any fallacy to lurk, there appears to be a fallacy. He argues as though he had to resist some proposition which suggests that there were, or were not, some natives in this green area. I agree I used an expression about “ two or three Esquimeaux,” and I did not observe his own wise practice of moderation in statement. No doubt that was putting it much too low. But that is not the point. The question here is not an ethnological question, it is a geographical question. The question is not whether if you had searched North America in 1763 you would not have found Montagnais or Algonquins, or whatever they are, specimens of that race, living a miserable life in some wigwam and starving every winter ; that is not the question, the question is not an ethnological question, the question is a geographical question : what is the area in respect of which it was felt so important, by the statesman of 1763, to offer an assurance in the most formal shape to those who conceived they had an interest in it ? And there cannot be the slightest doubt, when one examines the documents, that, if that is the question, there is a great deal of material to indicate that “ the Indian country” would include no doubt a great deal more to the West than is there marked, but it would indicate, in substance, the yellow, or at any rate the main part of the yellow, round the Great Lakes, that might or might not run up into what I call the corridor, but there is not, as far as I have been able to read it, the smallest grounds for saying the green area was affected at all. As a matter of fact, people at that time knew very little about it, and the people who were living there were not people who were likely to give any trouble. Therefore, it is no answer to my case to say that you propose to establish by references to the Census, some of which I notice were very hastily dropped by Mr. Geoffrion—we will have the Census back and look at it in a minute—it is no good to say : By reference to the Census I will show there were so many families in the green area. I do not care. What I want is the answer to the geographical question : What is it that the Lords of Trade are talking about ? and when I find what they are talking about I shall be able to appreciate whether or not this Proclamation damages my case in the least. There is one general consideration, which is this, and again there is a second fallacy which seems to me to lie behind a great deal of the argument for the Dominion ; they talked as though including some Indian Reserve inside the boundaries of a Province would automatically deprive the Indians of their right. If I may address Lord Haldane, with very great respect, it is a point, I think, which sometimes has a little pressed him, so perhaps I may repeat myself : the argument has often been put against me here as though including some area, which was an Indian Reserve, inside the geographical boundary of a Province would deprive the Indians of their rights. Well now, of course, my Lord has pointed out in another connection that really could not be so. The radical title, as my Lord has said in a very classical judgment, is, of course, in the Crown, and the Indians had something in the nature of a usufruct for the time being in their area. But their area might be inside a Province or it might not, and if you wanted to know whether the Indians were going to be protected in their rights, the thing that mattered was not whether their hunting grounds were within the geographical boundaries of a Province, but whether the authorities were at liberty to give their hunting grounds away to private settlers. And in view of the fact that the Government of Newfoundland as we know, on Labrador, was a Government which was not to do so, save under very stringent conditions, it follows necessarily that even if you are to assume, irrespective of the number of families of Indians there, that some were up there at the back of my coast, they do not suffer any sort of harm, because the area is geographically included in Newfoundland. It does not touch the point. The thing that matters to them is not whether there is some Provincial Governor who has authority over an area which includes their hunting grounds, but whether or not the authorities who are administering the neighbourhood are free to make grants of soil to people in terms which will dispossess them. You see, of course, an illustration of that in the history of the boundaries of Quebec. When Quebec was my slate coloured lozenge, the yellow area which was outside it was not within the jurisdiction of the Governor of Quebec ; and it was not, very largely, of course, because it was Indian hunting grounds. But when you enlarge the Province of Quebec to include these things, that did not mean that you deprived the Indians of every hunting ground, it merely meant that the provincial jurisdiction was exercised over a wider area, though inside that area there would be Indian hunting grounds or Indian Reserves existing there, as there are in Canada to this day. For those reasons, I submit it will be found, when you look at this thing rather more in detail, to show the relation between these documents of 1763 and the reservation of Indian territory, that the case for Newfoundland really is perfectly well founded in reason and in history.

Viscount FINLAY : Are there any documents which show the effect that this Proclamation, and the passage in it to which you particularly referred, had upon the Indian tribes ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord, there are some passages.

Mr. Macmillan

Viscount FINLAY : I mean, upon the Indian tribes from whom danger was apprehended.

p. 798

Sir JOHN SIMON : I have some passages which will bear on that ; I have some, but not many.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Have we now reached a point on which it is possible to form some idea as to how much longer this reference will last ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : My Lord, I propose to deal, when we resume, with the Hudson Bay boundary from the point of view of deciding whether the height of land was a late invention, or whether, on the other hand, it was not inherent in contentions and descriptions from quite an early period. That will not take very long, but I have a compartment which I am anxious to use, because your Lordships have heard again and again the suggestion that it only arose in 1814. Then I must deal with this Indian matter by chapter and verse, I daresay all the more briefly because I will confine myself to documents and will not make merely general assertions. I am anxious to elaborate a little bit the calendar of 1763, to show the exact relation of the documents, because I think I can now fill up all the gaps, and there are one or two new facts which I do not think have been observed or noted, and lastly, I have got to go through the maps down to 1763. Those are the matters I have to deal with, and I am afraid all that material may carry me through the whole of to-morrow ; but I am quite confident, my Lords, that my own part of the matter ought not to extend more than a very short time beyond that. It may be that I shall be able to concentrate and shorten those matters, so as to finish to-morrow. I should very much like to be able to give your Lordships a confident assurance that I should finish to-morrow, but it is difficult to be quite sure.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I do not know whether it will be any inducement, but I will undertake to finish on Friday if my learned friend finishes to-morrow afternoon.

MORNING SESSION.

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : My Lords, may I inform the Board that the two sides, Newfoundland and Canada, are binding up the Shorthand Note in case it may be thought hereafter convenient for any of your Lordships to have it for reference : and in each case the Juniors have made a short index of subject matters, which has been bound into the end of the Report, so that I think it is very easy to find, in case it is needed, where the different topics have been dealt with on either side. I think it will be convenient to have two volumes. The one I hold in my hand is the one which has already been prepared of the case for Newfoundland.

9 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Viscount FINLAY : That is one half ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord , and it ends (I am indebted to my learned Juniors for doing it, and it seems to be very conveniently done) by an index of subject matters, so that if anybody does wish to turn up any part of the argument it can be easily done. Your Lordships will say whether or no you think it worth while to be provided with the Shorthand Note in that form.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Speaking for myself, I am so conversant with the matter now that I think I know the page of every important document.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I thought it extremely likely your Lordships would take that view, and I am not pressing it on you.

Viscount FINLAY : I think the index may be very useful.

Sir JOHN SIMON: It will be available for any of your Lordships if you wish it: I am not doing more than saying it is available.

Viscount FINLAY : I have a document here headed "Submissions."

Sir JOHN SIMON: That, your Lordships will remember, was the way in which I was allowed to present to the Board, at the end of my argument (now I am afraid some time ago), ten propositions which I suggested would be sound.

Viscount FINLAY : I thought perhaps this document was something new.

p. 803

Sir JOHN SIMON : No, my Lord. Now, my Lords, if I may just take the compartment which I propose to deal with next, and will deal with as briefly as I may, the compartment is the Hudson's Bay compartment of the case, which I wish to deal with, not for the purpose of going over old ground, with which, as the Lord Chancellor has said, your Lordships are now all painfully familiar, but for the purpose of addressing myself quite specifically to a suggestion, or rather two suggestions, which have been made by the Dominion of Canada in argument on the other side. There are two things which my learned friends have advanced on this part of the case which I wish to challenge, and which I think I can overthrow. The first is the suggestion that a height of land as the limit of the Hudson's Bay area is a new-fangled nineteenth century invention ; if I may quote the language of my learned friend, Mr. Geoffrion, in the Shorthand Note at page 676 at line 20, that "in 1763 it had not been dreamed of," or, if I may again quote him at page 669 at line 35, where he says, " There was no suggestion of height of land being the limits of Hudson's Bay until quite recently."

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Until 1815.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord, 1815 or 1814 ; or, in a third passage, where he says : " The Hudson's Bay Company thought of a new line," meaning the height of land, " in 1814 " ; and, indeed, I think suggests that they borrowed it from President Monroe. I am going, I hope, to satisfy the Board, and it is material that I should, that that view completely overlooks, and indeed shuts one's eyes to, material which I propose to take in order ; and I think I can satisfy the Board, in fact, that though, of course, the Charter of the Hudson's Bay Company, as we all know, did not in express terms take you back to the landward boundary which I suggest, still I think I can satisfy the Board that contemporaneous maps, maps at the material time, and documents at the material time, both most strongly indicate that that was the view. The second point which has also emerged in the course of the argument for the Dominion of Canada on this, is this : My learned friend, Mr. Macmillan, examined some material, which at a late stage had come to the notice of the parties,

9 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

which had to do with the way in which this question of the extent of the Hudson's Bay territories was dealt with in the first half of the nineteenth century, and down to that House of Commons Committee in 1857. Your Lordships will remember that my learned friend examined the various legal opinions which were given at that time, and suggested that the result was quite inconclusive. I agree, of course, that that is much less important than the first point I have just mentioned, because it arises later, it arises after the event ; but I propose to show your Lordships, and I hope to satisfy your Lordships, that, as a matter of fact, the view that the Hudson's Bay territory extended to the height of land was a view which not only prevailed, as I have already said, in the eighteenth century, but that, when the matter came to be considered by legal authority on the one side and on the other, the British Government itself came to the definite conclusion, and announced it to the Hudson's Bay Company, that they accepted that as the true view of the matter ; and that is the reason why in 1857, when the House of Commons Committee investigated the proceedings of the Hudson's Bay Company, you will not find in the volume, though it is a most elaborate enquiry, a lot of discussion about the extent of the territory, because as a matter of fact it had already been accepted, and in terms asserted, by the British Government, to be the area which we claim. Now those are the two points that I wish to make about Hudson's Bay.

p. 804

Viscount FINLAY : Was that by agreement ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : I will call attention to a document, issuing from the Colonial Office to the Hudson's Bay Company, in which they say so in terms. That is the reason it did not become controversial afterwards. To take the first of these two matters first (and, of course, it is the more important) how does it really stand ? Is it correct to suggest that “ the height of land,” “ the sources of the rivers,” and limits of that sort are a nineteenth century new-fangled notion which has been inserted into this argument at a stage so late as to be quite unimportant ? It is quite contrary to the facts and documents which are available to the Board. It is to be observed in the first instance (I will summarise my points) that, of course, the language of the Charter of 1670 itself (your Lordships remember it is in Volume II, page 367, but I do not ask your Lordships again to look at it unless you wish to) the Carolian Charter, indicates, or at any rates suggests, an area which is limited by some such consideration, because it grants in terms “ lands and territories upon the countries, coasts and confines of the seas, bays, lakes, rivers, etc. flowing into Hudson's Bay,” so that you start with this, that the actual text of the Charter—of course, I am not saying that this does not still call for exegesis—

Lord
Warrington.

Viscount Finlay.

Sir John Simon.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : The actual words are on page 368.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I only remind your Lordships because I know very well, as the Lord Chancellor said, these things are becoming very much trampled and well worn ; but it is to be noted, in this connection, that the very language of the document itself, its express terms, speaks of “ lands and territories upon the countries coasts and confines of the seas, bays, lakes and rivers,” that is on page 368, line 14, “ Together with all the lands and territories upon the countries, coasts and confines of the seas, bays, lakes, rivers, creeks, and sounds aforesaid.” Now if you will carry your eye back, you will see that the “ seas, bays, lakes, rivers, creeks and sounds aforesaid ” are to be found a few lines higher up as being, “ All those seas, straits, bays, rivers, lakes, creeks and sounds, in whatsoever latitude they shall be, that lie within the entrance of the straits, commonly called Hudson's Straits.”

p. 805

Lord WARRINGTON : It seems to me very important to bear in mind that what they got was the lands and nothing else, the lands within the entrance to the Hudson's Straits.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, that is it, my Lord.

Viscount FINLAY : There are two grants, are there not, there ? There is the grant of the sole trade and commerce of all those seas and straits within the entrance, and then there is a grant of land.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Your Lordship is quite right, the monopoly of the Hudson's Bay Company was, as Lord Finlay points out, really a double monopoly : it was a monopoly which was territorial in a semisovereign sense, so much so that, by the terms of their Charter, they were at liberty to set up a police force, and perhaps an armed force and, of course, to administer justice (they were much more than a Province or a Colony, they were an imperium in imperio, like the British South Africa Company was at one time) ; in the second place, over the corresponding area, there was a monopoly of trade ; those were the two things. I do not want to spend time on those, unless it is the wish of your Lordships, but I do point out, in the first instance, that there is nothing very surprising in supposing that people who had to draw a map or expand the language and meaning of this Charter should have supposed that it went to the height of land. The case of the Hudson's Bay Company is an easier case for height of land, than my case ; no doubt it is.

Viscount FINLAY : It is different altogether.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Whether different altogether your Lordships in due course will determine ; I am saying, at any rate the language is more elaborate, and therefore it is easier to reach the conclusion.

Viscount HALDANE : There is no evidence to show there was the height of land which they thought there was.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I may perhaps be wrong, in these scientific matters one is easily misled, but I should have thought that dealing with a country which was known not to be as flat as a table, but to be a country of a very considerably mountainous character, très accidentéas the French might say, I thought it followed inevitably there was a height of land.

Viscount HALDANE : It does not tell you there is a height of land in the document.

Sir JOHN SIMON : It does not.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : The words are, “ on the rivers which lie within.” That carries you up.

[1927lab]

- Sir JOHN SIMON : One is clear that water would run down hill even in Labrador. Therefore, if you give people the land upon the rivers—

- Viscount Finlay.
- Sir JOHN SIMON : Sometimes the rivers are frozen in that district.
- Sir JOHN SIMON : I agree, and sometimes for the greater part of the year, but even then water will not run up hill.
- Viscount HALDANE : The source of a river and the land in which it lies may be of various kinds. It may be mountains, it may be high up and it may be a height of land, or it may be just sufficiently not flat to enable the river to flow.
- Sir JOHN SIMON : Your Lordships will understand me throughout to be using the expression “height of land” not in order to suggest any pinnacle or peak, but in order to use a phrase, common I believe in the New World, for describing what we ourselves would describe as a watershed. I think watershed is a much better word.
- 9 Nov., 1926.
—
Viscount Finlay.
- Viscount HALDANE : If they had said watershed, it would have been understood.
- Lord SUMNER : It means the same thing.
- Sir JOHN SIMON : It means the same thing ; I only use this expression, which is a new expression to me, because I gathered in the New World it is used instead of watershed.
- Viscount FINLAY : I had never heard it before.
- Sir JOHN SIMON : Nor I, my Lord, but in English and in French it is to be found in the maps. Let me use “ watershed, ” because that is what I mean ; I only used it because I desired, as much as might be, to adapt our linguistic peculiarities to those of the New World.
- Lord WARRINGTON : In some instances, although there is a watershed, there is hardly any height of land. I am thinking particularly of the watershed between the Thames and the Avon in the neighbourhood of Bristol.
- Sir JOHN SIMON : Your Lordship is, of course, quite right ; in other words, the slope of a roof of a shed may be very steep-pitched, or it may be a very shallow slope.

Viscount FINLAY : It is difficult to argue from one case to another. The grant in the case with which we are concerned is of “ the coast. ” In the Hudson Bay case the grant is “ together with all the land and territories upon the countries, coasts and confines of the seas, lakes ” and so on “ aforesaid, not already possessed by any Christian Power.” That is very different language indeed from the language that we have to deal with, applicable to Newfoundland and to Labrador.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord. And may I make this observation to my Lord Finlay, who has been good enough to make that comment ? I am sure that my Lord appreciates quite clearly that I am addressing myself, in a compartment, to a question as to the nature and extent of the Hudson's Bay territory ; and it is really impossible for me to argue the case except in such a compartment.

As regards the question of whether or not you ought to use such language as “ territory on the coast of Labrador,” your Lordships will recall that yesterday afternoon I was calling attention to a number of passages in which the word “ territory ” is used ; but I agree with Lord Finlay, if I may be allowed to say so, quite definitely (and indeed I conceded the point a few minutes ago), that the language of the Hudson's Bay Charter leads one more easily and readily to the watershed than the language of the documents which your Lordships have to construe.

For the moment, however, I am not doing that. I am not reading this passage in order to prove what my “ coast ” means. I am reading this for the purpose of saying that the Hudson's Bay territory did in fact run up to the watershed ; and that it is not true that the Hudson's Bay Company invented that notion in the nineteenth century, but it has in fact always been the true view, and, indeed, it is asserted contemporaneously in both maps and documents.

That is my point, your Lordships see, because, of course, as Lord Finlay remembers, although it is a long time ago now, when I opened this case I built up my case by treating the peninsula of Labrador as a defined area, the boundaries of which, or the outline of which, was more or less known. So that we are not dealing with some terra incognita in urging that you had already got appropriated to the Hudson's Bay Company one slope, that you had already got appropriated to Quebec another slope, and that therefore there was an inference to be drawn in construing difficult words as regards a third slope. But, of course, what I am now saying is addressed to the area which is called the Hudson's Bay area. Your Lordships appreciate the point, which is not directly bearing on the question of what is the grant upon which I have to rely. I conceive that it is not necessarily in my favour, as my Lord has pointed out ; but I was observing that the first thing to notice is that the actual language of the grant in the Hudson's Bay Charter would naturally indicate that at any rate territory upon rivers or upon the coast of rivers was included. I hope that your Lordships will recall how yesterday afternoon a very similar expression, which is on page 1070, was noted by your Lordships, and more particularly by Lord Warrington in reference to the Labrador Newfoundland itself. Your Lordships will remember this phrase which we had twice over about territory on the coasts of Labrador ; but that, of course, will come later on.

Lord

Sir John Simon.

p. 808

Lord WARRINGTON : And you may add to that that the territory which was given to Hudson's Bay by the Charter is uninterrupted territory. It is not merely narrow strips by the side of the rivers, but it is uninterrupted territory, because it was to be called Rupert's Land. The whole area was so called.

Sir JOHN SIMON : It was, my Lord.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : They got an express grant of minerals.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord, they got an express grant of minerals, and I am going to call attention to a very interesting contrast between the two things. I understand Lord Warrington to be observing that whether I am correctly tracing out the landward boundary or not, at any rate it is clear that you get a continuous sheet of territory.

8 Nov., 1926.

Lord WARRINGTON : Whatever the boundaries are, it is a continuous sheet of territory inside them.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord. That is the first point that I want to make upon this.

Now, my Lords, when does " height of land," or rather " watershed," expressly appear ? Is it true that it appears only in the year 1814, or the like ? I have ventured to challenge what my learned friend, Mr. Geoffrion said, but if I may be allowed to say so, he had just excuse, because in that passage which was read from the ManitobaOntario argument, interlocutory comments, the then Lord Chancellor, Lord Selborne, did suggest that it was a nineteenth century idea. But that only shows that the matter was not at that moment being presented upon very full information as to the old

Viscount Finlay.

Sir John Simon.

history, because it is quite contrary to the facts.
Now will your Lordships kindly observe the map which, with the permission of the authorities, we have put up on the board there. There is the original British Museum map of John Mitchell of the year 1755. It is better than the one which Lord Sumner has before him, because, of course, it has not got the later marks upon it. Your Lordships have only to inspect that map—and if I may say so I think it really merits inspection upon this point—in order to see that there is actually there indicated in 1755 a line which is marked “ height of land.”

Lord Sumner.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : “ Land's height” is what it says on the map here.

p. 809

Sir JOHN SIMON: “Land's height.”

Viscount HALDANE : It does not show you much of Labrador.

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : No, my Lord. I am, of course, dealing with Hudson's Bay, as your Lordship appreciates.

Viscount FINLAY : On this map of Mitchell's, do you regard the expression, “ line of height,” which you say appears there, as denoting the watershed ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord. The expression is “ land's height,” the genitive. The inscription is this : “ Bounds of Hudson's Bay Territory,” I think. Then immediately afterwards you get “ Land's height.” It is not a question of private opinion ; but anyone who inspects the map and observes the way in which the rivers are depicted, can see at once that the line, which is a wavy line, and which is marked as “ Bounds of Hudson's Bay,” is, in fact, a line which is designed by the cartographer to indicate where you get a watershed.

Lord SUMNER : It actually does go round the heads of two streams. You have the words “ Bounds of Hudson's Bay ” and the words “ Land's height.”

9 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I am much obliged to your Lordship.

Lord SUMNER : That is in King George's map.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord.

Viscount HALDANE : Does that come into Labrador ?

Lord Warrington.

Sir JOHN SIMON : It is the same in both. Now, as your Lordships are so kind, will you, before you leave that map, allow me to add this : if your Lordships inspect the map, you will see that that wavy line, which beyond all question is a watershed line, has got attached to it in Mitchell's map the statement : “ Bounds of Hudson's Bay under the Treaty of Utrecht,” a Treaty of 1713. While the map is before your Lordships, I was just proposing to read the Treaty of Utrecht, and see what it said. It is on page 329 of Volume I, and it says this : “ The Most Christian King shall restore to the Kingdom and Queen of Great Britain to be possessed in full right forever ”—now, my Lords, what ?—“the Bay and Streights of Hudson, together with all lands, seas, seacoasts, rivers and places situate in the said Bay and Streights, and which belong thereunto.” So that here you have as plainly as possible, the contemporary exposition of what Hudson's Bay territory is and upon John Mitchell's map of 1755—which is probably the most authoritative map available at this critical

p. 810

Sir John Simon.

period—you have this wavy line, which beyond all question is a watershed. Of course it is a watershed. No one can inspect this map for five minutes without seeing that ; and it is in terms stated upon the map to be the boundary under the Treaty of Utrecht. How, after that, it can really be seriously said by anybody who has studied the documents in this case that the watershed or height of land in this case is a new-fangled invention which nobody ever dreamed of in connection with Hudson's Bay until 1814, passes my comprehension. The fact is that both the maps and the documents are full of this suggestion, and whether it is right or wrong—because it is perfectly open for a tribunal in 1926 to say that it is wrong ; nobody has ever decided judicially that it is right—to say that it was not a common understanding at the time, is to say something which is quite contrary to the recorded facts.

Lord WARRINGTON : The Treaty of Utrecht used almost the words of the Charter.

Sir JOHN SIMON : It did, my Lord, deliberately.

Lord WARRINGTON : “ All lands, seas, seacoasts, rivers and places situate in the said Bay and Streights, and which belong thereunto.”

Sir JOHN SIMON : It did that deliberately, my Lord.

Lord WARRINGTON : Then it says “ no tracts of land or of sea being excepted.”

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord. A very amusing diversion has been attempted by my learned friend Mr. Macmillan with regard to this point. I watched his performance with the greatest admiration, as I need hardly say. He has been anxious to lay all the stress on the effort of the Hudson's Bay Company after the Treaty of Utrecht to get rather more than the watershed or the height of land gives them. But if your Lordships will recall what it was my duty to address to the Board about a fortnight ago, I spent a good deal of time, and I trust that I did not unduly weary the Board, in pointing out the explanation which is written quite plainly upon the documents. The explanation is that when the Treaty of Utrecht came, the British position was so strong, and the French position was so weak—the Marlborough Victories had driven the French to their knees—that for some years before the Treaty of Utrecht, you actually find the Hudson's Bay Company doing what in the circumstances was very natural, namely, trying to prompt the British Government to make an extended claim on their behalf to a boundary, which indeed in the documents is not described as the boundary to which the Hudson's Bay Company is entitled, but it is described as the boundary which they would like to have. No doubt it is perfectly true that they then proceeded to say to the British Government : “Now you have got the French thoroughly squeezed, and when the time comes for the Commissioners to draw our line, what we should like on the Atlantic side would be to have a line which would go up to Cape Grimington, somewhere here." I have not disputed for a moment that that was going beyond the proper interpretation of the Hudson's Bay Charter.

Lord WARRINGTON: Because it is outside Hudson's Streights.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Because it is outside Hudson's Streights, yes, my Lord ; and the only possible excuse would be this : we must not, of course, attribute to the Hudson's Bay Company or to the statesmen of the early years of the eighteenth century, so accurate a knowledge of geography in the neighbourhood of Cape Chidley as we have to-day; and when you look at the maps which existed at the end of the seventeenth century and the beginning of the eighteenth century, it is fair to say that the maps did not indicate with the same precision exactly the boundary. Indeed, they showed this knob or elbow on the northern border, in various and rather inaccurate outlines.

9 Nov., 1926.

I venture to think, therefore, that I have absolutely made good my point that so far as regards this map of John Mitchell—which is admittedly a map of the first authority in this age—it is perfectly obvious that the Hudson's Bay Company was regarded as having a boundary which was governed by the watershed.

Now I am afraid that I must put the Board to the trouble of looking at the Newfoundland Atlas, for the purpose of examining the other maps. But, my Lord Chancellor, if it is convenient, I will try to save your patience and trouble by also at the same time making one or two other observations upon the maps in question.

Sir John Simon.

Will your Lordships now be good enough to see how these matters are treated by the cartographers before 1763, in the Newfoundland Atlas. The members of the Court will appreciate that I may be making one or two comments which are not upon the Hudson's Bay point : but I am doing so in order to save your Lordships the trouble of turning to these maps again. I think that the earliest maps in the atlas are of very small importance, but still, I think perhaps we had better look at them.

If you take the first one of all, Map No. 1, I will then go through each of them until I have come to the Treaty. Map No. 1 is Sanson's, and it is dated 1656. Will your Lordships kindly notice that, early as this map is—long before the expulsion of the French from Canada—in 1656, a whole century before the victory of General Wolfe on the Heights of Abraham—even here you have indicated as between the Terre de Labrador on the one hand, which is edged green, and le Canada ou Nouvelle France, which is edged yellow—even here you have a rudimentary watershed or height of land indicated. The notion that this is some new-fangled and far-fetched geographical boundary is really quite contrary to the evidence of all the early maps.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Does that Bay Sauvage correspond to anything ?

p. 812

Sir JOHN SIMON : I do not see that at the moment, my Lord.

Mr. BARRINGTON-WARD : I think it is where the yellow meets the green.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I can tell the Lord Chancellor about that. It is as I thought. “ Bay Sauvage ” is an expression which is used in some of the early accounts for what we call Esquimaux Bay.

Lord WARRINGTON : Hamilton Inlet.

Sir JOHN SIMON : “ Savage ” probably meant “ Esquimaux,” and so they called it Bay Sauvage. I am not saying that it is right, but the point is that if you look at every early map, you will observe in fact that the notion of geographical boundaries being found by reference to watersheds is written not only between Labrador and Canada, but it is written all over it. Will your Lordships kindly observe, for example, the cartographer's notion of how Florida is divided from New France. You can see there all these rivers which are running down to the Bay of Mexico, and it is quite obvious that they are depicted as rising in an extremely mountainous region which is the watershed throwing the water into the Bay of Mexico instead of allowing it to flow northward or eastward. Exactly the same thing appears to be true of Virginia, and there is plenty of independent evidence that that was the view about the coastal colony of Virginia.

So that I start with this, that even when I begin with so early a map as that of Sanson, I get a sort of recognition that this is a proper boundary to take. Now, I am repeating myself, but may I remind your Lordships, before we turn away from this map, of an observation which seemed to me to be worth making once, and which therefore I hope I may be excused for making in reply, in regard to the legend of the map. Will your Lordships observe the inscription, the legend, which is rather striking. This is Sanson's map : “ Le Canada ou Nouvelle France ”— then he is dividing the thing into two, as regards the sources —“Ce qui est le plus avancé vers le

Sir John Simon.

Septentrion ”—that is the northern part of the map—“ est tiré de diverses Relations des Anglois, &c.”—that is his material for Labrador—“ Vers le Midy des Costes ”—that is the southern part of the map. Will your Lordships kindly notice the use of the French words “ les Costes ”—“ les Costes de Virginie, Nouvelle Suede, Nouveau Pays Bas, et Nouvelle Angleterre, Sont tirées de celles des Anglois, Hollandois, &c.” They are drawn from accounts given by Englishmen and Dutchmen. He does not mean a boundary between the salt water and the sea shore ; he means “ les Costes ” in the sense in which “ the coasts ” is constantly used in this period both in English and in French.

Viscount FINLAY : It is the old English.

Sr JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord, it is the old use of it, both in

p. 813

English and in French ; and, as I pointed out to your Lordships before, when you actually read the treatises of the geographers, you see it. I put before your Lordships a copy from the British Museum of Bellin's remarks on his map, where he actually divides America into six compartments, one of which he describes as “Les Costes Orientales,” between certain termini ; and when you inspect the map, it is quite plain that by that description he is indicating a series of colonies which go back to the height of land. So I think, in every one of these early maps, it is a curious fact that you will find some incidental support for one or other of the propositions, either that the height of land or the watershed is a boundary which you would look for, or that the word “ coasts ” indicates a substantial tract of territory.

Viscount FINLAY : Of course, it cannot be confined to a case where it goes back to the height of the land. The word “ coasts ” is used so constantly as denoting a certain portion of land.

9 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I am not at all disputing that, my Lord ; but, of course, in the present case, there is a strong inference to be drawn that the words “ all the coasts of Labrador ” have got a definite content, if you can find it, because the area in question is one which is to be located and delimited in fact, and is not to be settled by speculation.

Viscount HALDANE : Where do you get a delimitation in fact which you say is contemplated ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : I get that in the submission which I make that “ all the coasts of Labrador” will be found to mean an area like my green area, which is limited by the watershed.

Viscount HALDANE : Ah, yes, but that is argument. There is nothing in the documents which speaks of delimitation.

Sir JOHN SIMON : No, my Lord. If there was, I imagine that your Lordships would not have been given all this trouble.

Viscount HALDANE : Yes, I know ; we have to interpret the word “ coasts,” as used in 1763.

The Lord
Chancellor

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes ; and that is what I am endeavouring to help your Lordships to do ; and therefore, to see the early maps, as the Lord Chancellor suggested yesterday probably may give us a little help or light.

Then I think probably you would wish to take the next map, would you not, my Lord Chancellor ?

The LORD CHANCELLOR: Yes.

Sir John Simon.

p. 814

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord. Taking the next one, we have now reached a map of 1689, and, of course, a very imperfect or inaccurate map it is. It is a very interesting map to study, although I do wish that the printing upon it was not so small, because it contains all sorts of notes on the face of it which are worth reading.

Lord SUMNER : The original is larger.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord, and they are all available if your Lordships care to look at them. Again, may I invite attention to the fact—it is all that I say, and all that I am invited to say on this point, I think—that if you look at this map it is quite plain that, whether it be accurately or inaccurately drawn, the dividing line between the green, which is called “ Estotilande, on The New Bretagne et Tierra de Labborador,” and the yellow, which is marked “ Saguenay,” and so on, there is no doubt about it that that dividing line is—I will be modest and say—at least entirely consistent with the notion that you find the dividing line by tracing the watershed which throws the water into the St. Lawrence. You see all these rivers running down, and I do not think it can be doubted by any reasonable person that that is what the geographer is doing.

9 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : This is rather a better map for you than the last one, because instead of carrying the line to Bay Sauvage, which I daresay is Hamilton Inlet, it brings it further down.

Sir JOHN SIMON : It does, my Lord.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : And more in accordance with the facts of to-day.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord. Of course, I am not relying on these early maps as if they gave a picture of what in fact existed. I am relying on them merely for the purpose of seeing what is the method of division which is adopted. If a map is entirely imaginary, and yet the division adopted is a watershed, it would apparently have some value for me.

May I also point out in the same way that at any rate for the most part—there are one or two cases which are a little difficult to reconcile with this ; but for the most part—the same thing seems to be true of the Atlantic seaboard. Therefore, again I have the fact that in the year 1689 (when, of course, I quite recognise, was my Lord Haldane I think is rather suggesting, that people had the vaguest ideas about boundaries) the fact remains that, just as in the case of the Hudson's Bay map which is up there on the stand, people who were dealing with areas of this sort, having no other boundaries which were available, constantly drew boundaries by reference to the watershed. Lord Sumner observed that the map in its full size was available, and I do not know whether your Lordships would wish to see it for the purpose of this further point. Would your Lordships observe that the word “ coast ” again occurs on this map, as it happens. It occurs in a place near the bottom of the map on the left hand side.

Warrington

p. 815

Sir John Simon.

Viscount FINLAY : Is that where it begins: “ Les Anglais ” ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord. May I just read it. It says : “ Les Anglais possèdent sur la Côte de l'Amérique Septentrionale les pays ou provinces de Nouvelle Ecosse.” I am not stressing that too much, but it does show again—and indeed I can establish it abundantly from the documents as well as from the maps—that “ the coast ” is, amongst other things, an area within which you will find the thirteen ancient Colonies of Britain. And again and again you will find that this is described as “ les Côtes Orientales de l'Amérique.” On this map there are all sorts of other notes which are quite interesting from the historical point of view. For instance, there is a note as to the early discovery of Newfoundland, and again as to the early establishments of New France, and so on ; but I confine myself to the matters on the map which seem to me to be directly relevant.

Viscount FINLAY : It says that the river of Canada or St. Lawrence was called Hochelaga by Jacques Quartier.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord, who first discovered it.

Your Lordship remembers that “ Hochelaga ” was found to be an Indian word for some settlement close to Montreal, I think.

Lord WARRINGTON : The distinction between the Gulf of St. Lawrence and the River St. Lawrence was shown as we have always supposed that it was.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord, it comes again and again.

Lord WARRINGTON : It comes into the western end of Anticosti, which is the end of the river, or thereabouts.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord ; and I think that the more common practice is to take the Cape at the end of Gaspé as being the extreme point of the river. I do not think that much can be made of it, because I should have thought for my purposes that you were in the gulf before that. But if we are dealing with nomenclature, I think my learned friend Mr. Macmillan was making a fair claim when he said that they used the word “ River ” instead of “ Gulf ” as far as that. I agree about that.

Now if your Lordships will take the third map, it is a Dutch map, and the Dutch, of course, were very vigorous explorers at this period.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : The second one was a Venetian map, was it not ?

Viscount Finlay.

Sir John Simon.

Lord
Warrington.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, it was. There is a date on this map which I wish to call attention to ; it is the Mortier map of 1693. I do not know any map in the series, if carefully inspected, which more clearly establishes the proposition that at this period the watershed was constantly sought for and used as a boundary. 1693, your Lordships appreciate, is after the Hudson's Bay Company had got their Charter, but it was before the Hudson's Bay Company had made any very extensive or effective settlement, and it is first of all striking to observe, if your Lordships will kindly follow what I am suggesting, on the lefthand side of the Hudson's Bay there is a place called Port Nelson, and there is an inscription which is written upon the land side of Port Nelson : “ Poste François decouvert et occupé par la Compagnie qui s'est formée en Canada pour la Baye de Hudson.” The Company that is there referred to is not the Hudson Bay Company which Charles II founded, but it is a rival French Company due to the efforts of the French Authorities in French Canada to promote trading relations in that part of the world, and it illustrates the fact which your Lordships know culminated in the most violent controversy on the shore of Hudson's Bay, the fact that you had French traders and explorers pushing their way up there, while you had the British enterprise of the Hudson's Bay Company resisting them with all their might. That is one of the reasons, your Lordships remember, why when the very unsatisfactory Treaty of Ryswick was entered into only four years later—it was in 1697—the British position then being a very weak one, the Hudson's Bay Company were constrained to give up some parts of the rights which they really had if they simply relied upon the grant of Charles II. Then would your Lordships please observe a very very remarkable thing that follows; there you get a dotted line which I assert, and I think can prove, to be an indication of the watershed. Would your Lordship carry your eye along the dotted line from the left till you reach an inscription, “ Lac des Temiscaming.” Just at the word “ Temiscaming,” or just above it rather, you will notice the inscription “ Separation des Eaux.” That is an indication by the cartographer—which I daresay is quite contrary to the physical facts, but it does not matter—at that sort of place the waters are running both ways, or rather, it is divided there. I am not saying whether it is right or not, I am only saying this is the method adopted by everybody.

Lord SUMNER : It is a good line. The next thing the line does is to charge direct into the line of mountains.

Sir JOHN SIMON: I quite agree. Would your Lordships carry your eyes along this dotted line with all those imperfections or inaccuracies—there is a very remarkable inscription immediately underneath the bottom of Hudson's Bay. I am sorry the print is so small, but I think I can read it. “Poste pour couper les Sauvages par le haut de la traite de Tadoussac et les empêcher de descendre a La Baye de Hudson.” That is a very remarkable indication : it indicates as I apprehend this ; the French King, of course, who was the Sovereign on the St. Lawrence,

Sir John Simon.

p. 817

Lord Sumner.

granted, as your Lordships know well, farming rights and leases and monopolies of trade in this area called the Traite de Tadousac, and no doubt was much disposed to grant more than he had got. I should not be at all surprised if he sometimes authorised people to go further than, according to British ideas, they ought to go. But on the other hand, there were the British enterprises on Hudson's Bay which were pushing uphill from the north just as the French traders were pushing from the St. Lawrence uphill from the south.

Sir John Simon.

Viscount FINLAY : Where do you understand the post which that legend relates to was situated. The legend covers an enormous amount of territory.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : There is a little square mark above it.

Sir JOHN SIMON : There is a little square mark. I think, Lord Finlay, in this map they mark the posts with a little square, and then with a cross in between. You will find a similar use of that marking on the post near Port Nelson.

Lord WARRINGTON : It is the same if you look through a magnifying glass. It is either a cross or a fleur-de-lis, I am not sure which.

9 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : The third illustration of the same sort is to be found on the extreme left of the map, also on the dotted line, where you get the rather remarkable inscription : Poste du Sr Duluth pour empêcher les Assiniboels et autres Sauvages de descendre a la Baye de Hudson.” All I am saying is, I think it is pretty plain that that dotted line, however imperfectly drawn, was thought to be indicating roughly, at any rate, some sort of height of land or a watershed, and if I am right about that, then observe the significance of the dotted line rather more to the east, where you get “ Labrador ou Terre des Esquimaux,” and a dotted line with “ Nouvelle France ” marked below.

Lord SUMNER : I should have thought personally these posts which checked the descent of the savages towards Hudson's Bay were really posts upon a navigable stream by which they must descend.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I think that is true, that is a very practical observation. At the same time, my Lords will attach whatever weight they think proper to the inscription which specially struck me, namely “ Poste pour couper les Sauvages par le haut de la traite de Tadoussac.”

Lord SUMNER : How do you exactly translate that.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I prefer to read it, however imperfectly, in the language in which it is written. At any rate I rather understand it to mean, if I translate it absolutely literally it evidently is, “ at the height.”

p. 818

Lord SUMNER : Of the Treaty ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : No, “ traite de Tadousac.” The word “ traite ” means there “ trading.”

Viscount FINLAY : Would you kindly just read the words of the French. I got down to “ Post pour couper les Sauvages ” –

Sir JOHN SIMON : “–par le haut de la traite ”–by the height.

Viscount HALDANE : What is that that follows ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : “de la traite de Tadousac.” Your Lordships will, I daresay, remember that the French King granted an area which was called indifferently the Royaume du Roi or was called “ la traite de Tadousac,” or was sometimes called “ les pontes du Roi.”

The LORD CHANCELLOR : The “ traite ” is a tract of land ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : I think they used “ traite ” as “ trade ” ; it constantly occurs in these old documents ; I think it is the trading area.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Quite incorrectly you find the accent put on it in some of these documents.

9 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, I have been rather puzzled with the word, and I have read a good many of these French documents for the purpose of the case. Constantly you find “ traitor avec les Sauvages,” to trade with them. I do not wish to spend too much time on it, because I quite agree we cannot go on too far.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : The dotted line from that point onwards runs above the rivers, except one river, where it seems to cut it.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, I could not possibly attach exaggerated importance to the smaller things. It is quite obvious, whoever did this did not spend very long doing that dotted line, it was quite a rough thing ; all I am saying is, to say the least, it is not inconsistent with the notions which I have ventured to put before the Court.

Viscount HALDANE : You do not expect exactitude.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Indeed there was not much good in it, as nobody knew what was there. Now there follow three or four maps which I should like to group together. You will find it convenient to turn to the last of them, because they really are editions of the same map,

p. 819

they are the maps of a very distinguished man, my Lords, Guillaume de L'Isle. Guillaume de L'Isle was a cartographer in Paris, who was the official adviser in these matters to Louis XV, and who was consulted by Peter the Great ; he bore the title of “ Premier Géographe du Roi.” He was undoubtedly a geographer of distinction.

Viscount HALDANE : It was published at Amsterdam.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, some of them were, that is quite right, but he carried on his work in Paris very largely. Your Lordships I think will find it convenient to take 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8; they are all editions of Guillaume De L'Isle's maps. I have no objection to examining them in detail, I have done it personally with the help of my friends, but I think for the purposes of any point I need to make, you get the clearest indication if you go to the later one, because there you get colours which rather help your Lordships.

Lord WARRINGTON : 4 seems to be a later one ; it is 1708. No. 6 is 1700

Sir JOHN SIMON : That is right.

Lord WARRINGTON : They extend from 1700 to 1708, or thereabouts.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, as a matter of fact the inscription we have printed opposite the first of them gives you the details if you want them. All I am concerned with is to see what Guillaume de L'Isle had got to say about this thing so far as he could be regarded as any sort of authority. Would your Lordships think it convenient to take No. 8. First of all would your Lordships notice this : No. 8 I think is the map of 1703, and this one, Lord Haldane, was published at Paris at “ le Quai de l'Horloge ” and the “ Golden Eagle.”

9 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

It was a grand thing when Messrs. Stanfords sold their maps by signs of that sort hung up outside their shops. There are several things worth noticing about this map. First of all would you observe this is one of the maps which on the right hand side indicates this large body of water which penetrates the general trend of the land on the Labrador seaboard, and there you get the inscription which is repeated in many maps but you get it in its fullest form, these are the words “ Entrée trouvée en 1586 par Davis Anglais.”

Viscount FINLAY : Where is that. Take “ Terre de Labrador.”

Lord WARRINGTON : It is here (indicating on the map).

Viscount FINLAY : I do not read it in that way.

p. 820

Sir JOHN SIMON : I read it in this way : “Entrée trouvée,” then. you see the figures—“ En. 1586 par Davis ”—the British sailor —“ Anglais qui trafiqua ”—it is the same thing there—“ AVEC ceux du pays ”—with the people of the. country—“ et dans laquelle ”—in which Inlet—“ Weymouth s'avança 30 lieues,” that is 30 leagues. It was not Davis himself who went 30 leagues up the Hamilton Inlet ; it was one of his lieutenants or companions whose name was Weymouth. That kind of inscription occurs again and again. It is a little striking that that should be the kind of picture which at the beginning of the eighteenth century you got of the break in the Atlantic seaboard of Labrador when you remember that when the instructions come to be drawn up for the Governor of Newfoundland, Governor Graves, on the occasion when all the coasts of Labrador are annexed to his jurisdiction, one of the instructions which is specifically given is this, that he is to explore the Davis Inlet for the purpose of ascertaining more accurately the character of what is within.

The Lord
Chancellor.

Viscount FINLAY : What do you suppose that corresponds to on the maps of the present day ?

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : We have had this point, your Lordships will remember, before. Really the matter is quite clear, and in the documents, if necessary, I can prove it ; I state it categorically, the Inlet that is there being described as running 30 leagues in is, in fact, Hamilton Inlet. There was for some time a confusion of nomenclature ; the thing which is now called Davis Bay, or Davis Inlet, is not the same thing as Hamilton Inlet, but was to the north of it.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : You see “ Baye des Esquimaux,” down below. I think that is probably Davis Inlet, but they fitted the facts which, related to Hamilton Inlet to Davis Inlet.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Your Lordship puts it quite right, that is what it is.

Viscount FINLAY : Davis occurs in connection with Davis Straits, which is a good deal further to the north.

Sir JOHN SIMON : It is the same man.

Viscount FINLAY : It is the same man, certainly, but the place is a good deal to the north.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Davis was an explorer and navigator. Your Lordship has in mind the passage I was referring to in the instructions. I do not invite your Lordships to turn to it unless you wish, but I may give you the reference because it is useful to write it against this sort of inscription on the map. When Thomas Graves was given his instructions, in view of the fact that the Labrador territory was being added to Newfoundland, one of the things he is particularly told is this, that he is to make his best endeavours “ to procure accurate Draughts or Maps of the several Harbours, Bays and Coasts Sir John Simon. of Newfoundland, and other Islands and Territories under your Government.” I have already proved to your Lordships that “ territory ” there is a new word and refers to Labrador—“ and you are more particularly to direct the Officer of any Vessel under your Command, which may be appointed to visit that part of the Coast of Labrador which lyes between Hudson's Streights and the Streights of Bellisle, to search and explore the great Inlet commonly known by the name of Davis's Inlet, in order to discover, whether the same has or has not any passage to Hudson's Bay, or any other inclosed Sea.” Now your Lordships see the position would have been a curious one if it turned out to be true, because the Hudson's Bay Company had got an area which we know is to begin at the entrance of the Hudson's Straits. But here we are dealing with a more southerly aperture, as we see in map after map that sort of inscription. I venture to think it is very difficult to suppose that the people who drew up the document of 1763 can ever have meant to accept the view of the Dominion of Canada so persuasively presented by my learned friend that when you came to Hamilton Inlet you are to skip across from one headland to the other and leave the 30 leagues of water inside this invisible line as a land-locked or at any rate a juristically locked area of water.

Viscount FINLAY : It is clear they knew very little about the conformation of the land. Look at the delineation of that Inlet ; it is widely separated.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Very widely.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : What do you say about these maps, because they do not seem to me to bear very much on the point.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Would your Lordship bear with me while I suggest one thing it does. Your Lordships see “ Canada ou Nouvelle France ” in big letters across the map. Would you kindly carry your eye about one-third of an inch below the letter “ E,” the final letter in “ Nouvelle,” and there you will find a dotted line which is marked “ Hauteur des Terres.”

Lord SUMNER : A dotted line which strides across streams.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I still think, however inaccurate it is, it indicates an intention—

Lord SUMNER : The point, to my mind, is that the person who drew that line and marked it across the waters did not understand what the height of land was, or did not think it mattered.

p. 822

Sir JOHN SIMON : If your Lordship pleases, I can save your Lordships' time. The next map, No. 9, is an English map ; it is produced by a man called Senex. It is really, I think, very largely based upon de L'Isle. Your Lordships will now read very easily the corresponding inscription in the opening : “ An entry discovered by Davis in 1586 into which he sailed 30 Leagues and trafficked with the natives.” It is not quite correctly translated ; it was not Davis who sailed there ; it was Weymouth who sailed, otherwise it is much the same. In the same way I do not wish to make small points ; there are some small points I could make on it, but it does not matter. No. 10 is the first of a number of Bellin's maps. Your Lordship remembers the name of this man ; I desire to save your Lordships' time in the same way. No. 10, No. 11 and No. 12 are all maps by Bellin, and if your Lordships think it adequate I should propose to take the last of them, just as I did in the case of de L'Isle's maps.

Now, again, my Lord, I do not wish, I am sure, to make more of the point than it will fairly justify, but I cannot help noticing that the Bay of Hudson in this map which is edged in yellow undoubtedly is indicated as an area—it is thought to be an area where you get the watershed. Your Lordship remembers, of course, that the expression “ The Bay of Hudson ” or “ Hudson's Bay ” without using the expression “ territories ” is an expression often used for the territory of the Hudson's Bay Company ; it is so even in documents passing between Britain and France. Would your Lordships notice, you see the boundary which is edged yellow on the one side and green on the other, would you kindly perambulate it with me for a moment, starting on the western side where, of course, the country was extremely little known, and you will find that you come twice over to a crossing place where you might be disposed to say, as Lord Sumner said just now, this geographer most cheerfully goes walking across the Rivers. Well, in this case he does not, he indicates with arrows that there is water which is running down to Hudson's Bay to the right and there is water which is running, say the River Bourbon, to the left. If your eye catches the arrow which is just in front of the “ R ” of “ River Bourbon,” would your Lordship then carry your eye past the description “ Grande etendue de Pays entierement Inconnue.” You will see first “ Hauteur des Terres ” ; then still carrying your eye along the boundary, when you get at the lowest point below James's Bay you will find again “ Hauteur des Terres,” and if you will then continue to carry your eye up you will see that the general scheme of the thing is throughout to indicate that sort of boundary.

Lord WARRINGTON : There are arrows here again ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, whether such things existed as frequently as this gentleman thought is not the point. There cannot be the slightest doubt I venture to think that in 1755 which is a very important year for me—

Sir John Simon.

p. 823

Lord WARRINGTON : This was 1755.

Sir JOHN SIMON : This was 1755.

Lord WARRINGTON : The earlier one was 1743.

Sir JOHN SIMON : It is becoming so critical. Here we are on the eve of the outbreak of the Seven Years' War ; here are the expeditions being fitted out, one of which, under the command of General Wolfe and Admiral Saunders, won the great victory at Quebec. Here we have the stage set for a great fight between the French Empire and the British Empire in British North America. Is it to be supposed that the most authoritative French map of the moment, when it colours the “ Baye de Hudson,” an expression which occurs again and again in the French documents for 50 years as meaning Hudson's Bay Territory—is it to be supposed that he was not really indicating the contemporary view, as far as this very authoritative man was concerned, that you really had to find these boundaries by reference to the watershed.

9 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Lord SUMNER : I think his little black arrow routes are useful on this map because what he is doing is to say “ From Janssen, whom I consulted, I find you go from James's Bay up a river and then down another river, and then there is a part which leads to somewhere. That is what I am told. Then I know that there is a height of land somewhere, I can more or less indicate the stream from Janssen, but exactly where the water stops and the land appears I cannot say, so I will draw my colour to that point.” Its importance is it is a boundary of the Hudson's Bay country.

Mr. Macmillan.

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : That is exactly the point. Might I tell Lord Sumner an incidental confirmation which occurs to me as he has taken that point ? I can put my hand on the page I think, I know there is a document, and a document which was shortly before this time, where the French Traders in French Canada were saying it was quite impossible to accept the view of the Hudson's Bay Company that they were entitled to everything—to all the land which you could get at from Hudson's Bay by water because at that time it was believed there really was a water connection between the St. Lawrence and Hudson's Bay. They give that actual reason, they say it is quite impossible for us to admit that the Hudson's Bay Company has got this territory which includes all the land which you can reach by water from Hudson's Bay because they say if that is the case they would have the St. Lawrence and the whole thing. I think I am justified in saying in 1755 at any rate on the French side—you will see the English side in a moment—in the very same year that was the view. Would your Lordships, while the map is before you, please observe exactly the same principle appears to be indicated in other parts of the map, for instance, take what are commonly called the ancient colonies which are bounded in yellow on the Atlantic shore. Your Lordship sees what I mean by that yellow area.

p. 824

You have already had the point, my Lord. If you read Bellin's Commentary—you will remember I had the book from the British Museum—you will find he says with reference to this identical map that one of the vast compartments of North America is “Les côtes orientales,” and he identifies that as being this yellow area containing, for instance, Virginia and Georgia, and North and South Carolina. He in terms describes that in his contemporary document as “Les côtes orientales de l'Amerique.”

Mr. MACMILLAN : I wonder whether I might draw attention to one matter. At the end of the legend the geographer says : “Note qu'on n'a point marqué de limites.”

Sir JOHN SIMON : I think that is rather like an inscription which you read on an ordnance survey. You must not take the fact that a right of way is marked on the map as conclusive proof that it is.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Perhaps this refers to the western boundary, where the line breaks.

Sir John Simon.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I do not know, my Lord.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I think my friend is quite justified in raising the point. I think he really means that if you take the green line which bounds Louisiana, or again, the yellow and green line bounding Hudson's Bay, you reach a point west where you do not get on the limits.

Lord SUMNER : I fancy he means he does not know whether it is land or sea. It is absolutely unknown.

Sir JOHN SIMON: Yes. Would your Lordships turn now to Volume VIII. I have a reference in that volume which bears I think directly on this point, and then I think I have finished all I wish to say about these maps. The reference is Volume VIII, page 3774. That is a part of the book which contains some extracts from that commentary which M. Bellin invites us to buy so attractively in his map. It is headed “ Extracts from ‘Remarques sur la carte de l’Amerique Septentrionale.’” That is this very Map No. 12. This is the handbook to it. In those days when you bought a map you bought a handbook with it, and you looked at the map and looked at the handbook and found out from the handbook more about what was on the map. After the preliminary self-advertisement of a rather striking character, he says the early geographers were always writing down things that they did not know, but he is adopting a better plan. He criticises remorselessly some people's maps, and having done that, he says, at page 3775, line 28:—I will endeavour to translate as I go along—“ Such are the rules that I have imposed on myself, and now it is for the public to judge if I have departed

p. 825

Viscount Finlay.

Sir John Simon.

from them.” Then he goes on to say : “ After these preliminary reflections which have seemed to me essential in the present circumstances, I am going to enter upon the geographical discussion”—of what ?—“of the principales Parties de l’Amerique Septentrionale, renfermées entre le 28 and le 72 degré de latitude.” He does not deal exactly with the Isthmus of Panama, neither is he dealing with the North Pole. Then he says : “To do it in some sort of order I have divided this great stretch of country into six principal parts beginning in the north and following towards the south, which is the natural order in geography ”—and these form a number of different articles or sections. Here they are : “The Bay of Hudson and the surrounding country.” Your Lordships will observe that the label on his map is: “ Bay of Hudson ” edged in yellow. The next one is “ New France, or Canada.” The third is: “ Les Côtes Orientales de l’Amerique, depuis l’Acadie ”—which is Nova Scotia—“ jusqu’a la Floride, contenant les Pays possédés par les Anglois, entre les Montagnes des Apalaches et l’Ocean.” So that you have in 1755 at the very outbreak of the Seven Years' War, a contemporary assertion on the French side that the “ parties,” the solid territory, are properly to be called “ Coasts ” if they go back to the watershed. There you have it in express terms illustrated by the map.

Viscount HALDANE : What are the Apalaches ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : They are the continuation of the Alleghany Mountains. The Alleghany Mountains are the boundary in the upper half, and the continuation was known as the Apalaches. What I am saying is that anyone who studies the treatment of this subject on the French side at the outbreak of the Seven Years' War, I venture to submit, is driven to the conclusion first that " Les Côtes" was at the time constantly used to indicate the band of territory which you would measure laterally by going back to the watershed, and secondly that the height of land, or the watershed, or whatever the expression may be, was at the time regarded and treated as the boundary which would divide competing and adjoining territories.

Viscount FINLAY : It was an elementary fact with regard to these colonies that they were all between the range nearest the Atlantic Coast, that is to say the Alleghanies with their continuation, and the sea.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Your Lordship is perfectly right. In that respect his geography is correct, but, of course, what is important for me is not whether he made a correct picture, but taking his assumptions, how he uses his language. I have made my point absolutely good on the French side, your Lordships see. Now if once again your Lordships will remind yourselves of the map on the stand, your Lordships will appreciate that that map—

Viscount FINLAY : That is Mitchell's map.

Lord Sumner.
Sir John Simon.
Viscount Finlay.
- Lord SUMNER : Before you leave the passage you have been referring to, I see at the top of page 3777 there are some words which I think you have referred to before. It is a quotation from Bellin's book, I think. " Au nord du Detroit de Belle-Isle sont les Côtes de Labrador, grand et vaste pays, que les Francois avaient nommé anciennement nouvelle Bretagne." Of course, it is only Bellin.
- Sir JOHN SIMON : It is only Bellin, I quite agree. That is the passage the Lord Chancellor picked up when he saw the book. I will tell your Lordship this. Of course, I do not wish to do other than serve the Board. I suppose it is conceivable that it might be said that " grand et vaste pays " qualifies Labrador as distinguished from " Les Côtes." I do not say it is right, but I should have thought it did as a matter of fact refer to " Les Côtes."

Viscount Finlay.
- Lord WARRINGTON : A little lower down he describes Esquimaux Bay, but he does not say anything further than simply saying that it goes back 40 leagues.
- Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes.
- Lord SUMNER : I notice also he says that before 1713 Newfoundland belonged to the French, and it was then they ceded it to the English.
- Sir John Simon.
Lord Warrington.
Sir John Simon.
- Sir JOHN SIMON: There was, as your Lordship knows, under the Treaty of Utrecht, a cession of so much of Newfoundland as was in the possession of the French. The fact was that the French had some settlements on one part of the Island, whereas the British had settlements on the other part, and actually in terms the Treaty of Utrecht does contain a cession of Newfoundland to Britain. There was, your Lordship will remember, in the actual British Museum book another passage not printed here, which seemed to some of us to be material. It is only another illustration of the same thing. I may remind your Lordship of it. He says when he deals with Greenland, for example, that the western coast of Greenland is called " New Greenland," and I remember I pointed out to your Lordships that looking at his map one saw what he labelled New Greenland. He is obviously using the word "Coast " there in my sense. And other illustrations could also be given.
- It is enough for me to say now I have gone through in my atlas the maps which preceded the making of the new areas, whatever those areas were, in 1763.

Viscount FINLAY : With regard to line 8, on page 3777, what do you understand to be the " great Bay " that is referred to in the

p. 827

sentence : " A la Cote Orientale de ce Pays, on trouve la grande Baie des Esquimaux ? "

Sir JOHN SIMON : That is Hamilton Inlet, which is also called Esquimaux Bay, and sometimes Ivortoke Bay.

Viscount FINLAY : It says " granted to the inhabitants of Quebec by the Governor of Canada."

Sir JOHN SIMON : Of course, your Lordship appreciates this is in the time of the French regime, before Wolfe's victory. Indeed, it was the fact that you had French Canadians who had, as they thought, certain rights in that corner of the world, that added so much to the complications of Governor Palliser's administration.

Lord WARRINGTON : Now we find a further name for Hamilton Inlet, because it goes on to say : " Le sieur Joliet, qui fut envoy  en 1694 par M. de Frontenac, Gouverneur du Canada, pour visiter la C te de Labrador, la nomma Baie S. Louis."

9 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : That is the fourth or fifth name for the same thing. Lord Cave will observe on the following line the word " traite " as meaning " dealings."

Viscount FINLAY : Of course, the Slave trade was always known as " La traite."

Viscount Haldane.

Sir JOHN SIMON : That is another example. In the same way your Lordship will notice at line 25 the use of the expression " La C te " again, which quite plainly means the whole band, as it describes it as being watered by rivers. " La C te " means there the whole band of country. That kind of thing could be gone into in more detail, but I have now been through every map in my atlas down to the time of the critical documents. It may be said there are some more maps, though I think I may say of them that they are so very ancient that they do not help at all. One of them looks to me as if very likely it was the map which Shakespeare undoubtedly had seen when he described a famous character's appearance as like the new map of the Indies—it is drawn all over with lines. The principal addition is the map on the screen—which is Mitchell's map. So that you have this situation. If you were to imagine the English authorities as examining the most authoritative English map . they would see upon it an indication quite clear that the boundaries of the Hudson's Bay Company were boundaries to be traced along a watershed, and indeed the further assertion that that merely illustrated the Treaty of Utrecht which had said that the French were to withdraw behind the boundaries of the Bay of Hudson. If, on the other hand, you were to regard yourself as examining the most authoritative

Sir John Simon.

p. 828

Lord Warrington.

maps on the French side in exactly the same year, at the outbreak of the Seven Years' War, you would find that the most authoritative map was the map of Bellin, Map No. 12. And if you went further and were disposed to consult the latest and most authoritative treatise on the geography of this part of the world you would have read the "Remarques " of Bellin, and you would have found he used the word "Coasts " over and over again with the definite annotation, meaning " the slope of land down from a watershed." The question is whether in those circumstances I have not shown on the maps that it is completely wrong to suggest that a reference to " watershed " in reference to the area of Hudson's Bay is a nineteenth century invention which, as Mr. Geoffrion says, nobody dreamed of until President Monroe put it into somebody's head. So much for the maps.

Sir John Simon.

Viscount HALDANE : Would you tell me before you pass from the maps, what is that cluster of lines in the left-hand corner of Labrador ? I am looking at Map No. 12. What does that stand for ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : Does your Lordship mean under the word " Nouvelle " in "Nouvelle Bretagne " ?

Viscount HALDANE : Yes.

9 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : That is intended to indicate first a certain number of lakes, the names of which are given, as, for instance, the " Lac du Loup Marin," which I think is marked " inconnu." Secondly, it is designed to indicate a space enclosed between the series of lakes, by rivers and the like ; and thirdly it is supposed to indicate that in that part of the area the mountains reach a considerable height. In that respect it is right. You will notice there is a curious irregular outline which is intended to be a lake. I suppose my friend, Mr. Macmillan, would say it had a maritime flavour, because it is called " Le Lac du Loup Marin." The Lake below that is " Le Lac de la Loutre," which would be the Lake of the Otter.

Lord WARRINGTON : There is a note under that, which says : " The whole of this country is filled with lakes and rivers. The detail is not too well known."

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, that is the answer to my Lord Haldane. That is the actual inscription upon it, which my Lord Warrington has just been able to read. " All this part is filled with lakes and with rivers, of which the detail is not too well known."

Viscount HALDANE : I think that explains it.

Viscount FINLAY : I think that is borne out by the map.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes. Considering he was a geographer, he was giving nothing away. So much for the maps. I am sorry to have had to trouble your Lordships so much with them.

p. 829

Now I want to take the supplementary matter on the same head, namely the documents. I think it is a complete mistake to suppose that the Hudson's Bay Company failed to put forward this contention, or that it was not recognised as their contention, and that it has remained in dubio. It has remained in dubio only in this sense. There has never been an actual judicial interpretation of their claim to any extent. I will show your Lordships now that as a matter of fact it has not only been put forward again and again by the Hudson's Bay Company—and, of course, as we know, has been the advice given both to them and to the British Government—but that the British Government inquired whether the persons who challenged it had the smallest intention of challenging it effectively, found that they did not, and wrote a document which they addressed to the Hudson's Bay Company in which they said, " that being so, the British Government accepts this as the area." That is the reason why in 1857 you do not find anything about it.

Viscount FINLAY : That is the letter you referred to some time ago ?

Sir JOHN SIMON: I am coming to it eventually. Now may I give your Lordships one or two references. Will your Lordships take Volume VIII and look at page 4054. You will see there one of the documents which I referred to before, in which in anticipation of the triumphant Treaty of Utrecht the Hudson's Bay Company were putting their claims so high as to push to Grimmington Island, which they were not entitled to do. At line 18, they asked "that a line be supposed to pass," and so on, and "that the French shall not come or any others employed by them, to the north or northwestward of the Land Lake or supposed Line by land or water, on or through any rivers, lakes, or settle on any river leading towards or into the Bay of Hudsons to trade or erect any forts or settlements whatsoever, and the English on the contrary not to pass the said supposed Line either to the southward or eastward."

I have conceded from the very beginning that the Hudson's Bay Company at that stage took advantage of their opportunity to put forward an exaggerated line, but even then they were insisting upon the main principle that there should not be any invasion of the area which was drained by any river leading into Hudson's Bay. In the same way on the French side, if your Lordships will take this reference, the Intendant, as he was called, the French Governor of Quebec, Intendant Hocquart, in 1733 was treating the French area, the King's Posts, as running back on the south side to the watershed. You will find that in Volume VII, page 3205. Volume VII is the volume which I think has been least quarried in the course of the argument, but I will resist the temptation, though there is a great deal in it which I think is interesting. The document I refer to begins at page 3202, and it is the Ordinance issued by Intendant Hoc quart, who is the French

Governor of Quebec. You will see that this is in 1733, at a time when the French Empire in Canada was flourishing, on the limits of the Traite de Tadoussac. I am not saying that there are not indications in some places that he was disposed to proclaim the boundaries of this French trading area to a point which would have infringed or impinged upon the Hudson's Bay area. That, of course, was natural, because these were competing Sovereigns, and each of them granted as much as ever he thought would sound plausible without any regard to the claims of people of another nation—just as the King of Spain or the King of Portugal would cheerfully appropriate the whole of the New world. But still it is striking that even at the time when the French were in strongest power on the St. Lawrence, Intendant Hocquart is really still treating the watershed as being the boundary up to which these operations are likely to go. For example, you will see on page 3205, he says at line 32—taking the translation—"We have ordered that, at the suit of Sieur Cugnet, an exact map of the extent of the said Domaine shall be prepared ; on which map shall be shown the banks of the river St. Lawrence from the lower part of Isle aux Coudres to and including the river Moisy and, in the hinterland of the said tract of country, the rivers and lakes which discharge into the Saguenay river, with their magnetic bearings, the extent of the country traversed by them, from their sources to their mouths"—those are all rivers coming down in the end to the St. Lawrence—"and the names of the principal posts where trading is or can be carried on with the Indians. To which end, we have, under the said ordinance, commissioned Sieur Louis Aubert de la Chenaye to survey and traverse the banks of the river Saint Lawrence, comprised in the extent of the said domain of His Majesty, from the lower part of Isle aux Coudres to and including the river Moisy, as well as the Saguenay river, and the rivers and lakes which discharge into it." So far as there was any international understanding about these things, it is not unreasonable to see on the French side that in the same way that was treated as the position, because this is long after the Hudson's Bay charter had been granted by Charles II. At the bottom of page 3208 you will get the formal definition of the "Traite de Tadoussac " by this French authority.

Viscount FINLAY : But " La Traite de Tadoussac " means the trading area ; it does not mean the territory.

Sir JOHN SIMON : No, my Lord, it does not. The French system, as your Lordship knows, was this. In the days of the French Empire in Canada, the French system was to grant a monopoly of trade to, it might be, an individual or a company, and then indicate the area within which that monopoly would be enjoyed. One of the most famous of them was the "Traite de Tadoussac" based no doubt on Tadoussac in the River St. Lawrence.

Viscount FINLAY : That was their trading area.

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Your Lordship is right. If you will look at page 3208, the translation is at the bottom of the page, and it is I think very well done, so that I will take that if you please. It says : "And the whole being considered ; We have fixed the limits of the domain of the King called the Traite de Tadoussac, that is to say, on the north bank of the river Saint Lawrence from the lower end of the seignory of Eboulemens"—there then follows a lot of description. I have traced it. It is as a matter of fact arranging the boundary at the Quebec end.

Viscount FINLAY : I wish you would indicate to me on the map where these places are.

Sir John Simon.

Mr. Macmillan.

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Will your Lordship take my map. The actual detail at the beginning of this passage does not matter much. It is marked in a red line on the map. What I want your Lordship to see is not so much the names of the places as the method which is followed. What is his method is the point. After all, the question is not a geographical question, but a linguistic question. Would your Lordship look at the text. It goes on to say : "which is opposite the north-east point of isle-aux Couches, to cape Cormorant, being about ninety-five leagues of front, with the isle-aux-Oeufs and other isles, islets and shoals adjacent thereto ; on the western side, by an imaginary line drawn east and west, to commence from the lower end of the seignory of Eboulemens to the height of land at the portage of lake Patitachekao " —and so on—and then he describes the portage. You are to go on by the fleur-de-lis " and so on, "further to the west by lakes Spamoskoutin, Sagaigan and Kaouakounabiscat, at the height of land, in the latitude of 47° 27', where the said Sieur Normandin has also affixed four fleur-de-lis on four balsam firs" —apparently if you went into the backwoods you would find balsam firs ornamented with the fleur-de-lis—" and running still to the west, towards the region of Three Rivers, and in depth by the height of land, about two leagues from the Little lake Patitaouaganiche," and so on, down to line 42, where it says : "all of which lakes and rivers pass through Lake St. John into the Saguenay "—therefore being in the drainage area of the St. Lawrence—" and form the boundary which separates the lands of the Domaine from the hunting country of Three Rivers. I am not saying more than this. It is perfectly plain. In the flourishing days of the French Empire in Canada where the French were engaged in marking out the boundaries in which they were proposing to grant a monopoly of trading rights, I do not suppose they had been squeamish about allowing Frenchmen to invade the Hudson's Bay territory, but the thing to do was to mark out a boundary, and that they did. In that respect the map which Lord Finlay has before him and which comes from a Canadian atlas, and which, so far as the marks on it are concerned, has been prepared for the purpose of this case, is not very accurate, because although it is drawn with great accuracy so far as regards the beginning and the end, the gentleman who has drawn it, once he has got into the interior, has allowed either his pen or his imagination to take charge and has gone charging away not to the height of land but beyond it, for which there is no justification at all.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Perhaps you will help me in one respect. I am a little puzzled. I quite see the point about the watershed being shown and indicated by this description, but I do not take it that you are suggesting, are you, that the watershed was the southern boundary of the Hudson Bay territory ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : No.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I. was a little confused.

Sir JOHN SIMON : What Lord Finlay put to me was, if I may say so, a perfectly just correction. I am not saying in this passage the height of land. is being indicated as being a Hudson's Bay boundary, but, I am saying that this shows from the French side, dealing with a country of this sort which, of course, was unsurveyed and largely, therefore, unknown, that really faute de mieux if you want to have a boundary at all, this is the sort of boundary you have.

9 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Viscount FINLAY : It is obviously a physical feature.

Sir JOHN SIMON : And I do not know any other. Your Lordship sees what I mean by saying they have gone a little wild. I am content now to conclude this, and I will keep myself to this, the remaining point about Hudson's Bay, by taking what your Lordship knows in several pieces already, 1815, the year in which the Hudson Bay Company got the advice of Sir Samuel Romilly, and so on, 1849, the year in which the Colonial Office got the advice of Sir John Jervis, and 1850, the year in which the Government of the day, having got the view of the Law Officers that the Hudson's Bay claim was perfectly right, announced, as I shall show, to the Hudson's Bay Company that they felt bound to accept it. Of course, these things, though they are interesting, do not prove the case at all. It is merely that I am anxious to get these particular events in their proper sequence. First, we have had printed, and I think it is convenient that your Lordships should have the document which I produced in original and which my learned friend afterwards inspected, the document of 1814. I do not think your Lordship will regard the time as being unfairly occupied if we look just for a moment at this. It contains some very interesting matter. (Handing document to their Lordships.) What I am handing you is, on the front page, the opinion of Sir Samuel Romilly, Mr. Cruise, Mr. Holroyd, Mr. Scarlett and Mr. Bell, on the first point asked, and inside you will find the case submitted. If you look at the Case, there are some interesting things in it, showing how the Hudson's Bay Company regarded their own rights. Will you please observe that after making an extract from the Act they say, on page 2, "The description in the grant made to the Hudson's Bay Company by their aforesaid Charter has been held by the most eminent Geographers to include all the country lying upon the waters which run into Hudson's Bay." I have established, I hope, this morning, that that was a perfectly just statement. It is perfectly true of Bellin, de L'Isle and Mitchell ; everybody you can think of. Then they go on at the bottom of page 2 and say this, which is very interesting and was rather new to me : " In the year 1745 an Act of Parliament was passed granting a reward for the discovery of a North West passage through Hudson's Bay, but with a saving clause reserving the rights of the Company. In the year 1748 Mr. Dobbs and some other gentlemen, who were associated to prosecute this discovery, made an attempt to set aside the Company's Charter. They alleged that the grant of land was originally annulled "—he means was originally null—" because it was not limited by any definite countries "—it was void for uncertainty, you see—" and that the grant of an exclusive trade was illegal as a monopoly. They also alleged that the conduct of the Company had been such as to vacate any right they might have had ;that they had neglected to occupy, settle or improve the country, to extend its trade, to prevent the encroachments of the French from Canada or to prosecute the discovery of a North West passage—on these grounds Mr. Dobbs and his associates applied to the Crown for a grant of part of the country within Hudson's Bay with various privileges." Then this will interest Lord Haldane, I think. " This petition was referred to the Attorney and Solicitor General." If your Lordships search your memory you will, I have no doubt, remember that the Solicitor General was no less a person than Sir William Murray, the Lord Mansfield of whom Lord Campbell says, " He was the first Scotsman who ever gained distinction in the profession of the law in England." The Attorney, I think, was Sir Dudley Rider, but the Solicitor was undoubtedly Sir William Murray, and they " reported that 'Considering how long the Hudson's Bay Company had enjoyed and acted under this Charter without interruption or encroachment, they did not think it advisable for His Majesty to make any express or implied declaration

9 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

against the validity of it, till there had been some judgment of a Court of Justice to warrant it and the rather because if the Charter was void in either respect there was nothing to hinder the Petitioners from exercising the same trade which the Company now carried on.' "Therefore the matter was left unsettled. That is said, and I think fairly. Then they go on in their case on page 3 to refer to the Peace of 1763 and they say : " They have frequently passed the Canadians into the country within the limits of the Hudson's Bay Company and even made some fixed establishments near the source of the rivers which run into Hudson's Bay." Then they describe the matters which had followed on that, and then they finally put this question on the fifth page : " Under these circumstances the opinion of Counsel is requested as to the rights of the Hudson's Bay Company on the following points :—1. Whether any objection can be made to the grant of the soil contained in the Charter and whether the grant will include all the country, the waters of which run into Hudson's Bay, as ascertained by geographical observations." Now what happened. Because it is the sequence that matters now. That being the opinion which the Hudson's Bay Company obtained, they sent that opinion to the Colonial Secretary, Lord Bathurst. The reference is in Volume VIII, page 4117, at the top, about the second or third line of the page, where they say : "We enclose the opinion." It is the third line : "A copy of these opinions is inclosed for your Lordships information." They call it "these opinions" because they had consulted several Counsel. I am anxious to show what is new matter, namely, that the Government adopted it; not merely the Law Officers, but the administrative and executive authority. They then went on to say that they hoped the Law Officers would be consulted as to whether that is right.

p. 834

Lord WARRINGTON : The letter which accompanied the opinion makes the claim founded upon the height of land.

9 Nov., 1926.
Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : In plain terms, my Lord. I was trying to show your Lordship, and I hope I have done so, that it was a misapprehension to say that this was a new invention. This has happened all the time. It was not a thing invented because President Monro suggested it. They said they would like to have the Law Officers' view, and I gather they would be content to have it. The Law Officers' view was not taken at the time, and my learned friend, Mr. Macmillan, was perfectly right when he corrected what was rather a gross chronological error of mine. I had given the impression, I think—I had not meant to—that the Law Officers' opinion followed at once. As a matter of fact, neither in 1815, nor, indeed, in 1820, was an opinion obtained from the Crown advisers. If you turn to page 4124, you will see that in 1820 the Hudson's Bay Company is still saying they do want to have a declaration that this is their boundary. This is the nature of the petition at the bottom of page 4124.

Viscount HALDANE : It looks as if there had been some other questions submitted and answered, but perhaps they are immaterial.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I have looked at them, my Lord, they are perfectly immaterial, they do not bear upon this at all.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I agree with my learned friend.

Sir JOHN SIMON : My learned friend has looked, and he agrees. Then you will look at page 4124. 1820 follows 1814, and the Hudson's Bay Company are saying : " Wherefore your Petitioners most humbly pray leave to refer to the said Memorials and documents and to exhibit other evidence in support of this their petition and to be heard by Counsel therein and that your Majesty will be graciously pleased to declare that by Virtue of the said Letters Patent of His said Majesty King Charles the Second, your Petitioners are the sole and absolute—Lords Proprietors of all Lands between the extreme heights from which any Waters flow into the seas within Hudson's Streights and the said Seas, and that Your Majesty will be pleased to appoint commisioners to run a Line along the said Heights." They are still pressing for the thing to be done. Nothing was done. What happens next you will find conveniently collected in the other little print which I have here, which includes the opinion of Sir John Jervis. This happened as late as 1849. These are command papers which were included in a return to the House of Commons. Now see what happened. It is a piece of Parliamentary history which is very easily overlooked. In July, 1849, the House of Commons " Resolved that an humble address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to direct that such means as to Her Majesty shall seem most fitting and effectual, be taken to ascertain the legality of the Powers in respect to Territory, Trade, Taxation and Government, which are or recently have been claimed or exercised by the Hudson Bay Company," and the address is therefore given to Her Majesty. Then, of course, what happened is what you would suppose, that the Law Officers are consulted, and your Lordship has on the next page, page 2, the opinions of Sir John Jervis and Sir John Romilly, written from The Temple, in January, 1850, in a form which was familiar and usual then and long afterwards. As Lord Finlay knows, you started by reciting all the instructions you got. They proceed to say at the bottom of page 2 that : " having had the statements furnished to your Lordship by the Chairman of that Company "—which, as your Lordship knows, included the opinion of these learned advisers in 1814—" we are of opinion that the rights so claimed by the Company do properly' belong to them. Upon this subject we entertain no doubt." Now, so far we are merely dealing with the Law Officers on the one hand, and private legal advisers on the other. Now see what happened.

p. 835

Mr. Hawes is writing from Downing Street—he is the Under-Secretary of the Colonial Office, Under-Secretary to Lord Grey, the Lord Grey of the Reform Bill—to Mr. Isbister, who is the gentleman who had made himself particularly objectionable on the subject of what is the extent of the Hudson's Bay territories, and he is informing him that there has been this address from the House of Commons, that there has been a statement obtained from the Company, that this has been put before the Attorney General and Solicitor General, and that they advise that the Hudson's Bay Company is quite right. Then follows what I had not sufficiently appreciated when I addressed the board before, namely, a letter from the Colonial Office, Downing Street, of the 6th June, 1850, to Sir John Pelly, who was the Chairman, the Governor, as it is called, of the Hudson's Bay at the time, in which he says this : " With reference to your observation that it would be of the utmost importance if the decision of the Privy Council on the rights and privileges of the Company were sent to Hudson's Bay by one of the ships appointed to sail on the 8th instant, I am to remind you that the proceedings for the purpose of giving effect to the Resolution of the House of Commons of 5th July, 1849, have not led to any reference to the Privy Council, and that the question raised by that resolution stands in the following position: Steps having been taken as you are aware, to obtain from the Hudson's Bay Company a statement of its claims, that statement was duly submitted to Her Majesty's Law Advisers, and Her Majesty's Government received from them a report that the claims of the Company were well founded. It was observed in that report that, with a view to the fuller satisfaction of the House of Commons, and the parties interested, it would be advisable to refer the inquiry to a competent tribunal, and that the proper method of raising a discussion upon it would be for some person to address a petition to Her Majesty, which petition might then be referred either to the Judicial Committee, or the Committee of Privy Council for Trade and Plantations." The last paragraph, which I have no doubt you have observed already with your eye, is very important for me. It is : "Such a petition was therefore essential to the complete prosecutions of the inquiry, Lord Grey accordingly gave to certain parties in this country, who had taken an interest in the condition of the inhabitants of the Hudson's Bay Company's territories, and had questioned the validity of the Company's Charter, an opportunity to prefer the necessary petition if they were so disposed, but, for the reasons which it is unnecessary to repeat, they respectively declined to do so." Then observe how it ends : "Lord Grey"—that is the Secretary of State—"having, therefore, on behalf of Her Majesty's Government, adopted the most effectual means open to him for answering the requirements of the address"—the House of Commons says, what is the boundary?—"has been obliged, in the absence of any parties prepared to contest the rights claimed by the Company, to assume the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown in their favour to be well-founded." I therefore make entirely good, I trust, the second point which I sketched to your Lordships this morning. I have not only shown, I trust, that this conception of the Hudson's Bay area being bounded by a watershed or height of land is as old as the middle, at least, of the eighteenth century, and was not at all a new-fangled invention, but I trust that it is now plain that the Government of the day, not the Law Officers, the Secretary of State, accepted in 1850 that this was the boundary.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : It was re-opened in 1857, you remember.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I do, my Lord ; I have not forgotten it ; but if you examine what it is which is asked in 1857 it is really this. I quite appreciate that Sir Richard Bethell says in 1857 it would be well to have this decided by the Privy Council. The real question he is asked is this : Would it be proper for the Crown, first, to challenge the validity of the grant, and, secondly, if machinery were to be adopted to ascertain what its true ambit is, what machinery should that be ?

p. 837

The LORD CHANCELLOR : What are the geographical limits.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I meant that.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : It is not very important, because, after all, what happened in 1857 is not the important thing ; it is the view which was taken in 1763.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I quite agree, my Lord. I thought it my duty to do what I could to show in a consecutive form to what extent it may be fairly claimed by the Hudson's Bay Company that the kind of boundary they had insisted upon was a boundary which was not only approved of by the Law Officers—I speak of them with all respect, but they do not always decide matters of policy—but was formally adopted by the Secretary of State. I think I am right in saying (the Lord Chancellor has it before him and I have a copy here) in 1857 what is really being asked of Sir Richard Bethell is this : it is suggested that this charter of Charles II, could be impeached on various grounds, vagueness, illegality, and all the rest of it. The first question is, is it not, Would it be proper ? It is page 402: " Whether you think that the Crown can lawfully and constitutionally raise for legal decision all or either of the following questions." That is the question asked Sir Richard. He is not asked his advice on the facts ; he is asked whether he thinks it is lawful and constitutional for the Crown to raise the question. He says as regards the question of the validity of the charter, " I do not think you ought to raise it at all." Then he says as regards the validity of the territorial claim, if that was to be raised it would have to be decided by the Privy Council. I might perhaps observe in passing—and my learned friend, Mr. Macmillan, will forgive me—that it was a slip to describe the author of this letter from Downing Street as though he was the Secretary of the Hudson's Bay Committee, House of Commons ; This letter is signed H. Merivale, and he is Mr. Herman Merivale, a very important public figure in the middle of the last century, at one time Under Secretary for the Colonies and later on extremely well known in a Public Department as well as being a man of letters. I only want to show that the real question that Sir Richard was asked was not really to express a view as to whether the area was or was not what was suggested ; he was asked a question of constitutional propriety and he advised by saying that it would be quite improper to challenge the claim of these people to have a charter, and as for what its area is, the only judicial conclusion to be reached about that would be to ask the Privy Council.

Viscount FINLAY : Nobody would take it on.

p. 838

Sir JOHN SIMON : I quite agree, if I may say so, with the Lord Chancellor, that these matters are only incidentally relevant, but I trust that I have at any rate established all I wanted to establish with regard to the Hudson's Bay Territory, and I claim to have established it ; first, that in 1763 the statesmen and draftsmen who were contemplating dealing with newly-acquired areas, having before them, as we must suppose, such a map as the map of 1755, or what you please, must be treated as having regarded the Hudson's Bay territory as a territory which, on the Hudson's Bay side, went up to the watershed. If I make good that point, then, of course, I have gone one very important step on my way, because it would be rather a remarkable circumstance (if I may use the pointer) if there already was, in the view of the statesmen of 1763, a horse-shoe shaped bite taken out of this territory here, and when they come to make the grant of what is admittedly territory which is going to be annexed to Newfoundland, starting as they do at exactly the same point that The Hudson's Bay territory started from, because they do not start from Cape Chidley, they start from the entrance to Hudson's Straits---

Viscount FINLAY : What is that ?

9 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : That is Cape Chidley. It is exaggerated vertically many times in order to give your Lordships a proportional view. It would be a remarkable thing if the statesmen dealing with the situation as it was, did not proceed on this view, that you already had a line which was running notionally along the watershed, which would mark the divide between the area which threw the water into Hudson's Bay and the area which threw the water on to the Atlantic Coast, and still more remarkable when you remember that the language they use is " The coast of Labrador from the entrance to Hudson's Straights," which is the precise language that is used by the Hudson's Bay charter. Therefore, unless you are to suppose that they contemplated starting from this part where I am resting the pointer, and travelling along some different line with the result that you get a sort of curious undistributed middle, the inference is, I venture to think, a strong one (if the language is one which can be fairly so interpreted) that by the coast of Labrador beginning from the entrance to Hudson's Straits, they meant, on the top, the other half of this. That is all I wish to say about Hudson's Straits. I am sorry it has occupied as long as it has.

Might I put before you in a rather more complete way what my learned friend, Mr. Macmillan, very usefully called the calendar of 1763. My learned friend, of course, was quite accurate in the references which he made, but he did not include them all, and I have taken the liberty of having a little calendar drawn up in order of date for the year 1763 with a second column which gives the references in the green book or red book to the document, and a short description of the different documents. Your Lordship will observe at once that it was an extremely busy year. The reason that so much had to be done was, as I indicated to your Lordships briefly yesterday afternoon, that when you came to the midsummer of this year 1763 you would have found Whitehall and Downing Street in a fever of anxiety about the situation in British North America, in view of the Indian war. I am going later on to ask your Lordships to have this table of dates before you, that you may see what was the information that was reaching this country ; because it explains very clearly indeed why the proclamation of October came to be made. Would your Lordship just glance down this diary ? You will observe that I have one or two extra documents to introduce. First of all February 10th, as we all know, on page 330 of the first volume, is the actual date of the Treaty of Paris. Then the next document of March 15th, has been read to the Board, but now that we have this matter, I trust, in a more complete shape, I venture to think the gloss put on it by my learned friend Mr. Macmillan is not quite accurate. It is Volume II, page 386. I am not quite sure whether it has been appreciated, I confess I had not appreciated it myself, that as a matter of fact there was a very sudden change of policy in reference to the relations between Newfoundland and the mainland which, when you go through these documents in the months of March and April, will become evident. Your Lordships may have observed it, I must admit I had not myself. It is this. Down to a very late date in March there was no intention of putting any territory in Labrador under the Governor of Newfoundland at all. All that was intended was just to have some cruisers inspecting the coast. That was the conception which was carried down to a particular point, when, within the course of quite a few days, three or four days, the policy was changed, and the alternative policy was adopted of securing for Newfoundland a territorial footing upon Labrador.

You will find that this is quite clear when one takes these documents in order. If you will take page 386 you will perhaps remember that in that document the Lords of Trade

9 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

indicated an alternative. They said : “Now as far as regards this Labrador coast, we shall have to do one or other of two things ;” and my friend Mr. Macmillan urged that at the date that they wrote this document the alternative which was ultimately adopted was the second of these two alternatives. My friend is wrong about that, I think. At page 387, line 32 : “As to the Concurrent Fishing on the No. East Coast of Newfoundland, in case any of your Majestys Subjects should engage in it, much will depend upon the Temper, Judgement and Discretion of the Officer of the Navy, who shall be appointed to superintend that Fishery, and who certainly should be instructed to adhere to the Sense & Execution of the 13th Article of the Treaty of Utrecht with Justice to the Subjects of both Crowns. Upon the Coast of Labrador” — now this was the view on the 15th March— “it will be impossible to prevent the French continuing to have the full benefit of their former should be made there.” I do not think the stress there is upon private occupation ; it really means, unless you treat it as you may treat a plantation in a colony. “Or sufficient Cruizers stationed with instructions to the Commanders to seize all French ships coming Commerce with the Indians of that Coast, unless some British settlement within a certain Distance of that Coast.” What happened was that originally the second of those alternatives was adopted ; there was no idea of extending territorial jurisdiction on the mainland of Newfoundland at all, and that suddenly a change was made, because it was realised that a more complete authority upon the mainland was necessary. That will be made clear by the documents which follow. First, there is a new document ; I am sorry I have to introduce it, to complete the story. That is the 17th March. I must now hand your Lordships these new documents. It is from Lord Egremont to the Lords of Trade. There is a bundle here of some new documents, and in these new documents the communication from Lord Egremont of the 17th March, 1763, is Document No. 10.

p. 840

Mr. MACMILLAN : We have not seen these.

Sir JOHN SIMON: You will find that several of them have already been read, we have already printed them ; but as a matter of fact this one is a new one, March 17th, 1763: " My Lords, I have the King's Commands to acquaint your Lordships, that his Majesty having taken into Consideration your Representation of the 15th instant,"—that is to say, having taken into consideration the document I read last in Volume II, at page 386—" does not judge proper that any Steps should be taken thereupon untill Your Lordships shall have fully complied with the Directions given you by His Majesty's Orders, in my Letter of the 8th. I am therefore commanded to signify to Your Lordships His Majesty's pleasure, that you do, without loss of Time,"—now see what it was—" prepare a Draught of Instructions for the Governor of Newfoundland for this Year, with such alterations from, or Additions to, the Instructions, which have been formerly given in time of Peace, as Your Lordships shall judge necessary or expedient, in order to render them conformable to the stipulations of the Definitive Treaty, which I have already transmitted to you. As it is the King's Intentions that the Governor of Newfoundland shall sail as soon as possible"—they usually left this country in the month of April— "I am commanded to signify to Your. Lordships His Majesty's Pleasure that you do acquaint me, for the King's Information, how soon he may expect the Draught of Instructions above-mentioned."

At that stage there is no request to draw a Commission or to make instructions which will include anything but the Island of Newfoundland. Then if you will go back to my Calender you wilt find that on March the 21st, Document No. 11, the Lords of Trade reply. They say : "In obedience to your Majesty's commands signified to us by the Earl of Egremont, one of your Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, in his letter of the 17th instant, We have prepared and humbly beg leave here—with to lay before your Majesty, 'a Draught of instructions for the Governor of Newfoundland for this year, with such alterations from or additions to the Instructions which have been formerly given, in time of peace, as we judge necessary or expedient, in order to render them conformable to the stipulations of the definitive Treaty' which has been transmitted to us by his Lordship. It may be proper for us to observe to your Majesty that the Draught of Instructions does not extend to the islands of Cape Breton or St. John's "—St. John's is Prince Edward Island in this connection—" or to any part of the coasts of Acadia, Canada or Labradore ; For those Islands and that tract of country "—you will observe that the coast of Labrador is regarded as a tract of country—" having never been included within the limits of the Commission of the Governor of Newfoundland, to which we are confined by the words of the last reference made to us by your Majesty's Secretary of State, We have not thought ourselves at liberty to extend our consideration beyond the words of the Reference itself."

That, therefore, is what happened on the 21st March. On the 23rd March, in Volume VIII, at page 4110, following the strictest chronology, you come to the next document, and, of course, we see now the full significance of it. I have always observed that it came immediately before the operative draft of the Commission, but I had never appreciated until these documents were supplied that this really indicated a prospective change of policy. Down to this moment what Lord Egremont has got is a draft which is simply going to give the Government of Newfoundland what he had before, with a few frillings. Lord Egremont is beginning to think in his own mind : " Well, I am very much disposed to think that the Governor of Newfoundland ought to have this tract of Labrador." He then says to himself : " But if I am going to give the Governor of Newfoundland a tract of Labrador I must be careful that I do not impinge upon the Hudson's Bay Company." So on the 23rd March, 1763, it appears that Mr. Rivers had written a letter, which is here acknowledged, signifying Lord Egremont's desire to know as soon as possible what are the limits upon the coast between Hudson Bay and the coast of Labrador. If he had been examining some of these maps with a Grimington line on it he may very well have wanted to know, because, of course, he had to be careful that he did not overlap territory which the Government never had touched. That is the real significance of that. Then having presumably had his interview, which was apparently by word of mouth (there is no record of it), on the next day, March the 24th, in Volume II, at page 389, you get the communication to the Lords of Trade, who were the draftsmen in this business, of the change of policy ; and this is the first moment in any document where you can find the record of an executive intention to include what has been called the tract of Labrador in the territorial area of Newfoundland. Lord Egremont has had his interview the day before and he has thought it over ; so now you see he is describing a quite different plan, which involves changing the instructions. " The King having judged it proper, that all the Coast of Labradore, from the Entrance of Hudson's Stieights." Where did he get those words from ? He got those words, of course, from the interview with the Hudson Bay Company the day before. " To the River of St. John's, which discharges itself into the Sea, nearly opposite to the West End of the Island of Anticosti." If you imagine Lord Egremont looking at that map now on the screen, which is probably the most authoritative map at the moment, you can see it ; the River St. John, nearly opposite the west end of the Island of Anticosti--

The LORD CHANCELLOR : The interview was not the day before ; it was that morning.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I am obliged to your Lordship ; it was the same day. "Including that Island, with any other small Islands on the said Coast of Labradore, and also the Islands of Madelaine in the Gulph of St. Lawrence, should be included in the Government of Newfoundland—that is the significant thing—"I am commanded to signify His Majesty's pleasure to your Lordships, that you do forthwith prepare to be laid before the King for His Royal Approbation the Draught of a New Commission for Capt. Thomas Graves, to be Governor of the Island of Newfoundland, & of the Coast of Labradore." As I said yesterday, the quality of the jurisdiction is exactly the same in both cases—" with the several Islands as above described : And I herewith return to your Lordships the Draught of Instructions for the Governor of Newfoundland, transmitted in your Report of the 21st Instant (which the King entirely approves) in order that your Lordships may make such Additions to the same as you shall judge expedient, & necessary, to render Them conformable to the new Commission above-mentioned."

9 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

These people did certainly work at it ; on the next day, March the 25th, you will find in my bundle of new Documents No. 13, the Report of the Lords of Trade sending the new document to the Privy Council. What they are doing is this. It is the 25th March, 1763 : "In obedience to your Majesty's commands, signified to us by the Earl of Egremont, one of your Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, in his letter of the 24th instant, we have prepared, and beg leave humbly to lay before your Majesty, the Draught of a Commission, appointing Thomas Graves Esqr. to be Governor and Commander in Chief of the Island of Newfoundland and all the coast of Labradore from the entrance of Hudson's Streights to the River St. Johns," and so forth. That is the explanation of the new Commission, and your Lordships remember that Mr. Barrington-Ward marked out yesterday for me what the alterations were.

Viscount Finlay.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : There seem to have been some midnight conferences.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I cannot help thinking that my temptation to envy the ease and leisure of the Eighteenth Century has been perhaps a days later, in Volume II, at page 390, after more midnight conferences —because it was a much longer document—in four more days or nights they have concocted the new instructions which your Lordships little misplaced. They were working very hard at this. Then four remember was a horrible affair of 80 or 90 paragraphs, some of which I

Sir John Simon.

p. 843

rather relied upon in what I said to your Lordships yesterday. So they are saying : "In obedience to your Majesty's commands, signified to us by the Earl of Egremont, one of your Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, in his letter of the 24th instant, we have prepared, and beg leave humbly to lay before your Majesty, the Draught of a Commission, appointing Thomas Graves Esqr. to be Governor and Commander in Chief of the Island of Newfoundland and all the coast of Labradore," and so on. That is the way in which the draft turns up and the draft itself follows, and is a document extending page over page, introducing for the first time the word "territories" and introducing the word "rivers" and doing a good many things which your Lordships have already noticed. On the next day (this is a matter I mentioned yesterday, my friend will remember) we have now ascertained there was a meeting of the King in Council, the 30th March.

Viscount FINLAY : Why is that letter of the 24th March reprinted ? I suppose it is merely copied again in this connection ? There is nothing in that.

9 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I am sorry, my Lord. I have not followed what your Lordship is asking.

Viscount FINLAY : This is the same letter which we have of this reprint No. 12. It appears at page 389 of Volume II.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : You made your extract complete.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I am sorry, my Lord ; we ought not to have printed that. I did not mean to print anything which was already printed. That is a slip.

Viscount FINLAY : It does not matter.

Sir JOHN SIMON : It is the same. It is a little difficult in putting them together quite to see what is new and what is old.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I think one is a draft and the other is a letter. This is called a draft in the book.

Sir JOHN SIMON: Yes, I think that is right. At any rate it does not, I think, matter, as my Lords agree. Now see how it goes on, because this is the pinch of the thing. If you turn to document No. 14 of my new documents, there exists in 5th Privy Council Register a Record which shows that on the 30th March there was a meeting of the King in Council, and before the King in Council were brought both the draft Commission and the draft Instructions. The Record is : "Upon reading at the Board a representation of the Lords Commissioners for Trade and Plantations dated the 17th of this instant, setting forth that, in obedience to his Majesty's Commands signified to him by the Earl of Egremont, one of His Majesty's Principal Secretarys of State, they have prepared the draught of a Commission appointing Thomas Graves Esqre., to be Governor Commander in Chief of the Island of Newfoundland and all the Coast of Labradore from the entrance of Hudson's Streights to the River St. John's which discharges itself into the sea nearly opposite the West end of the island of Anticosti, including that island, with any other small islands on the said Coast of Labradore, and also the islands of Madelaines in the Gulph of St. Lawrence, His Majesty this day took the said Representation together with the said draught of a Commission into his royal consideration, and was pleased with the advice of His Privy Council to approve the said draught, and to order"—now this is why I said the operative document of these earlier documents is not the Proclamation— "and to order, as it is hereby ordered that the Right Honourable the Earl of Egremont, one of His Majesty's Principal Secretarys of State do cause a warrant to be prepared for his Majesty's royal signature in order to pass the said draught of a commission under the Great Seal."

Viscount Finlay.

Sir John Simon.

There is a corresponding record about the instructions. With regard to those two documents I should like, if I may, to make my grateful acknowledgments. They were discovered for me when I made an inquiry in this building about the middle of the case. A gentleman was so kind as to give his attention to it ; he produced an index which they had in this building, of the Orders in Council which had been made, and he was able at once to tell me that at this particular date there would be found in the Record Office the Order in Council—which was found within half an hour.

Lord WARRINGTON : A Commission had to be passed under the Great Seal.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord, and in order to be complete you had a Privy Seal, which was the authority for putting the Great Seal on.

Therefore, my Lord, I think this makes good this proposition : that first, there was a change of policy, and secondly, that the 30th March was the date when these two documents and the instructions, outside world, the other the regulation of the powers as between the Sovereign and his servant, were authorised to come into existence. Consequently I venture to think that when my friend, Mr. Macmillan, marching side by side, the one, of course, the authority vis-à-vis the said in reference to page 387 that, there being two alternatives, it was the second alternative, namely, sufficient cruisers stationed with instructions to commanders to seize all French ships, that was adopted, that really was a mistake. That was the original idea, but the idea was abandoned, and I suppose abandoned because the Secretary of State thought : Here was an area which he called a tract, whatever he may have meant by it, in which it may be necessary to annex territory to the Government of Newfoundland.

Viscount FINLAY : I think you indicated that you considered that this change of policy was connected with the apprehensions with regard to a very extensive rising of the Indians.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Not this change of policy ; that is an entirely separate matter. In my reply I am going to deal, in a compartment, with that question of what is the Indian country, and in that connection I hope to be able to show your Lordships that it is not the green area.

Viscount FINLAY : It has nothing to do with this?

Sir JOHN SIMON : It has nothing to do with this. This merely shows that there was a change of policy by which it was determined, not as was at first intended, simply to have cruisers, as they called them, which were inspecting or watching this coast or controlling fisheries or preventing the French from coming ; that was the first idea, but that idea was abandoned and instead of that, in the late days of March, under considerable pressure and haste apparently, a completely different scheme was adopted, which involved annexation of territory, whatever " territory " is, to Newfoundland.

Now may I just finish my little Calendar, which I can do now more rapidly, I hope. On April 25th, nearly a month later, the Commission was sealed. That is the date when it passed under the Great Seal. Your Lordships will find that in the first volume. I think myself it was held back because they did not get the Commission until just before the ships were starting. Your Lordships appreciate—it is interesting to remember these things—that Thomas Graves was afterwards a very distinguished man ; I rather think he was Second in Command on the Glorious First of June, and he was a very distinguished man ; you will find all about him in the Dictionary of National Biography. I think he ended with a peerage. The Newfoundland Governorship was only a stage in a very distinguished career. The Commission was sealed on April 25th. The Admiralty instructions were an entirely subordinate thing, and indeed came to him in another character. Your Lordships have observed that, because, while he is Governor and Commander-in-Chief of the Island of Newfoundland, he is also under the directions from the Admiralty, who, as my Lord Haldane said, were disposed to be a very independent body in those days. He has got, really in quite a different character, instructions from the Admiralty, which are not given him as Governor and Commander-in-Chief of Newfoundland, but are given to him as Commander-in-Chief of the Fleet on the Newfoundland Station, which is a different thing ; and, indeed, as your Lordships remember, he continues to be that, or his successors do, notwithstanding that later on the territory here is added to Quebec ; it does not make any difference to the Admiralty or the ships of the station at all. That follows on the 2nd May. I think I have seen somewhere—I have forgotten where —an indication that he sailed just at that time ; I am pretty sure that that is so, but I cannot give you the page. The spring has come, the ice is beginning to break up and they leave the country about the end of April.

[1927lab]

Lord WARRINGTON : He is directed to put to sea and take great care to do so without a moment's loss of time.

Sir JOHN SIMON : That is so ; he is a little later than usual ;they usually went about the end of April. Then on May the 5th comes the matter which introduces my Indian question. That is in Volume III, at page 899.

Lord WARRINGTON : You have finished with the Commission of Newfoundland and you are beginning a new subject altogether ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, that is right. In my humble submission (your Lordships will decide in the end whether I am right) what had happened was that by May you had got this much done. You had got already what I have called the horseshoe of Hudson Bay carved out long ago and, if there was any doubt about it, Lord Egremont had had some information. You had got, as I humbly submit, the carving out, whatever it may turn out to be on the ground, of an area which was to be ascertained on similar principles on the Atlantic coast and indeed down to the St. John, because it was before the pink was cut out. Now comes the question : "We have really settled this Labrador business. Part of it is Hudson's Bay and the rest of it we have settled ; we have disposed of that , now we want to address ourselves to the question of what is the proper way in which to deal with these important and fruitful possessions which are the result of our victories over the French." This is why I have, I am afraid, so frequently repeated that it seems to me to give quite a wrong historical balance to the case to suppose that, in reference to that second and different subject matter and all the troubles about the Indian wars and all the rest of it, they were really thinking about this icebound strip. You will find when you look at it that everything that is done now is done in reference to an area which is to the west and to the south. The maps which are drawn are maps which do not even include Labrador. The officials that are appointed Commissioners of the Indian territory are Commissioners over areas which do not include Labrador, and the whole thing now from beginning to end is shifted into a perfectly different part of the country. That is the reason why these documents in Volume III now become of such extreme importance. I will do my best to keep to Volume III for a little bit. In Volume III, as your Lordships know well, is the origin of this new inquiry which one of your Lordships has just said appears to be a separate inquiry. It is May 5th, 1763. Lord Egremont did not give these unfortunate Lords of Trade much rest ; they are now turned on to their new mission. Would your Lordships look at line 11 : "is now pleased to fix His Royal Attention upon the next important Object." It is a new object and it has reference to a new area. If you had asked Dr. Johnson, who was living at the time, where it was that the French had formerly had the trading interest and the enjoyment of the advantages of the French Empire, and where it was that Britain had got it instead, he would never have said in Labrador, in Naskopiland ; he would have said in the valley of the Ohio and the Mississippi ; and, of course, he would have been right.

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : My Lords, I now ask attention to the concluding entries in the Calendar of the year 1763, and I have just approached the documents which bear on the matter I indicated in advance, as to which Lord Finlay enquired—the part of the case which bears upon the Indian territory. Your Lordships have noted in Volume III, at page 899, how on the 5th May, the Lords of Trade were instructed to consider and recommend how the remainder of the acquisitions of the British Crown on the North American mainland were to be dealt with ; and I had asked your Lordships to note line 11 on that page.

Viscount
Haldane.

Sir John Simon.

Viscount FINLAY : Which page do you say it is ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : Page 899, and there are a number of pages which follow. I hope to be able to save your Lordships from much shifting about between book and book now. Your Lordships notice on page 899, in the first paragraph, the nature of the inquiry addressed to the Lords of Trade : "His Majesty having brought the Negotiation with France & Spain to a happy Conclusion, and having given the necessary Orders for carrying into Execution the several Stipulations of the late Treaty, is now pleased to fix His Royal Attention upon the next important Object of securing to His Subjects, and extending the Enjoyment of the Advantages, which Pease has procured." He transmits the definitive Treaty of Peace and he asks a large number of questions ; and the question which comes first, as shown on the top of page 900 is : "What New Governments should be established & what Form should be adopted for such new Governments ? and where the Capital, or Residence of each Governor should be fixed ?" I am most anxious, if I can, to con centrate my own argument, and if I may be allowed to say so, to secure your Lordships' attention to the passages in this and the following documents which deal with the Indian country. It seems to me to be most critical to adjust our attention to the whole case. Of course we are still reading the instructions. At the bottom of page 900 is the 5 first reference that I have observed to "the Indian country." Will your Lordships kindly pick out the words on page 900, at line 34, "the Indian country."

Viscount HALDANE : It is an observation that may be in your favour, that that applies not only to Labrador, but to a great many other 10 places.

Sir JOHN SIMON : That is, as your Lordship has justly said, an observation in my favour. My argument is going to be that "the Indian country," if we just compare three or four documents now, will be found easy to be identified as being not Labrador but a very different 15, area, and I am going to call attention to maps which so describe it.

9 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Viscount FINLAY : I am not sure that it excludes Labrador.

Sir JOHN SIMON : That would naturally depend on the contents of the documents

Viscount FINLAY : It might include it.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I am merely anticipating, my Lord ; I am making no assertion.

Viscount FINLAY : Certainly Labrador was not "the Indian country" par excellence.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Your Lordship will forgive me, I am sure ; 25 I am endeavouring to call your Lordships' attention to a series of documents which now follow, which I trust will enable your Lordships to find out without difficulty what "the Indian country" is. I am making no assertion about it at all ; it is all here in the pages which follow. "The Indian country" is referred to at line 34. Now may I just read 30 the paragraph, because it is very important for my purpose : "Tho' in order to succeed effectually in this Point, it may become necessary to erect some Forts in the Indian Country, with their consent"— you see, it is treated as an area known as "the Indian Country," in which forts could be erected with the consent of the Indians. There are just 35 three or four passages, which, taken together, have, in my humble submission, a perfectly definite connotation, and their meaning is not, if I may say so, to be ascertained by speculations, as to what "the Indian Country" might be supposed to mean. Documents are coming on which show what those words mean. Then at line 34 : "Yet His 40 Majesty's Justice & Moderation inclines Him to adopt the more eligible acquired by fair Purchase only ; and it has been thought so highly expedient to give them the earliest and most convincing Proofs of His Majesty's Gracious and Friendly Intentions on this Head";— now here is a geographical indication— "that I have already received and transmitted the King's Commands to this Purpose"—now, to whom ? —to the Governor of Newfoundland and all these people who are already existing ?—No, but "to the Governors of Virginia, the Two Carolinas & Georgia, and to the Agent for Indian Affairs in the Southern Department."

Sir John Simon.

I will show your Lordships in a moment that there were two Agents for Indian Affairs ; one was the Agent for Indian Affairs in the Southern Department, and the other was the Agent for Indian Affairs in the Northern Department ; and I have got the Commissions for each of them, and I shall be able to show your Lordships within what areas their duties range and I will satisfy the Board, if I do not misunderstand the material which I have done my best to put together and study, that it has no reference to Labrador from beginning to end. Then on the top line of page 901: "As Your Lordships will see fully in the inclosed Copy of my Circular Letter to them on this Subject." I quite agree that, reading that paragraph by itself, one might remain in some doubt ; but now will your Lordships kindly turn to the next document, which is on page 903, and comes in the Calendar next, June 8th. There are at least three passages in the next document, which is a long document, dealing with the Indian Country, which will go a very long way to identify it.

Viscount HALDANE : Before you pass from that, will you tell me who is the Agent for Indian Affairs in the Southern Department ? The reference is at page 901 ; is that the Southern Department of State ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : No, my Lord. I meant to convey that there were in this part of the world two Agents for Indian Affairs, one of whom was for the more southerly portion of the Indian Country, and the other of whom was for the northerly portion. The Agent for the southerly portion at the moment was a gentleman named Stuart ; it had previously been a man named Atkin ; the Agent for the Northern Department was Sir William Johnson, who lived at a place called Johnson Hall, which we are going to identify on the map, on which your Lordships will find the area within which they each operated identified with quite sufficient precision.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : These instructions, I suppose, are No. 9 in your book of new documents ?

p. 850

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, they are, my Lord.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I see them there.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I am much obliged. Would your Lordships be good enough to turn to my additional documents, document No. 9. That is a document of 16th March, 1763. This answers Lord Haldane's question. It is a circular letter to the Governors of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina and Georgia. Your Lordships have no need to turn to the map, but, of course, it is quite obvious that that is hundreds or thousands of miles away from Labrador and it is to "Mr. John Stuart, Agent for Indian Affairs in your District"—that was the Southern District—"from Lord Egremont." The instructions I think, are worth just looking through. They refer to what was at this moment becoming the most serious anxiety, namely, the state of rebellion and hostility which was developing in that area. "As the removal of the French and Spaniards from the countries which extend from the Colony of Georgia to the river Mississippi, and which are now ceded to His Majesty, will undoubtedly alarm and increase the jealousy of the neighbouring Indians, the King judges it to be indispensably necessary to take the earliest steps for preventing their receiving any impressions of this kind, and for gaining their confidence and goodwill, without which it will be impossible for this nation to reap the full benefit of its acquisitions in that part of the world."

9 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Now, my Lords, I should tell you that we are going to travel further north than the Colony of Georgia in a moment, but at any rate we see what is being dealt with here : "The French and Spaniards in Florida, and Louisiana have long and too successfully inculcated an idea amongst the Indians, that the English entertain a settled design of extirpating the whole Indian race"—I do not imagine anybody supposes that that piece of propaganda had been carried on in Labrador—"with a view to possess and enjoy their lands and that the first step towards carrying this design into execution, would be to expel the French and Spaniards, the real friends and protectors of the Indians ; In order to prevent the ill effect of these suggestions, which our taking possession of those countries will seem to verify, it is His Majesty's pleasure that you should, in concert with the Governors of Virginia, the Two Carolinas, and Georgia, without loss of time, immediately invite the chiefs of the Creeks, the Chactaws, Cherokees, Chickasaws and Catabaws, to a meeting with them and the Indian Agent for that department." That answers Lord Haldane's question ; there is a South and a North Department : "at Augusta in the Province of Georgia"—these places can all be identified on the map, if needed—"or any other place equally convenient for the several parties ; at which these chiefs are to be apprized in the most prudent and delicate manner of the change which is going to take place. In doing this, the King judges it to be absolutely necessary not only to avoid every expression which might awaken the fears or point out the dependance of the Indians upon us, but to use every means to quiet their apprehensions and gain their good opinion. For this purpose it would be proper to recur to the original causes of the war with the French, to mention and dwell upon the several cruelties they exercised during the course of it, the arts they employed, the groundless stories they propagated among the Indians in order to excite their jealousies, to alienate their affections from this nation and to provoke them to commit such violences as His Majesty was at length compelled to resent, that by the same insidious arts they had so far wrought upon the credulity of the Spaniards, as to involve them in their quarrel, and its consequences, that thro' the special favour of providence, the wisdom of the King and the courage of His Troops, all these mischievous practices and designs have been discovered and defeated. In order to prevent the revival of such disturbances and troubles by repetitions of the same dangerous proceedings, His Majesty found himself obliged to insist in the Treaty of Peace, that the French and Spaniards should be removed beyond the River Mississippi"—your Lordships remember they were shifted entirely to the west—"to the end that the Indians and his White People may hereafter live in peace and brotherly friendship together ; That the English feel a particular satisfaction in the opportunity which their successes afford them of giving the Indians the most incontestable and substantial proofs of their good intentions and cordial desire to maintain a sincere and friendly correspondence with them ; That these proofs will consist, 1stly, in a total oblivion and forgiveness of all past offences, fully persuaded that they were entirely owing to the deceiving arts of the French, and no ways to be attributed to any ill will in them ; 2ndly in opening and carrying on so large a traffick with them as will supply all their wants ; 3rdly in a continual attention to their interests and in a readiness upon all occasions to do them justice ; and lastly, in the most solemn assurances"—now here are the forts—" ; that those forts now ceded to us"—the question of forts is important. I may tell your Lordships what the forts were, or some of them. There was a fort further north, for example, at what is now called Detroit, which was the name originally given to the Narrows between two of the great lakes ; there was a fort at Fort Pitt, which is now called Pittsburg ; there were forts further south, and the Indians were naturally deeply concerned at seeing the English taking these forts under their control ; they thought that these were points of vantage from which they were going to be attacked ; and so you get this : "and lastly in the most solemn assurances that those forts now ceded to us, by means of which the French really did intend to subvert their liberty, and accomplish these evil designs, which they artfully imputed to Us, shall never be employed but to protect and assist them, and to serve for the better convenience of commerce between the Indians and Us, and the cultivation of friendship and goodwill, between them and the subjects of His Majesty. And should the Indians retain any jealousy or suspicion that the forts situated in the heart of the Indian Country——"

Sir John Simon.

One can only arrive at the conclusion as to what "the Indian country" is, by observing the way in which it is described. It is going to be described by "metes and bounds" in a minute. Your Lordships will find it has nothing to do with Labrador at all. It is an expression which (I am sure I can satisfy your Lordships of this) had at the time a definite connotation, "such as Alabama, Tombegbi and Fort Londoun;" I think they can be pointed out if your Lordships wish ; they are in the Southern part.

Viscount HALDANE : This is a document with regard to the South.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord.

Viscount HALDANE : Was there a document with regard to the North ?

9 Nov., 1926.
Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord, I am coming to that next. Although it goes further North to the Great Lakes and Detroit, there is not the remotest reason, when you examine the documents and the maps, to suggest otherwise. "I make no doubt, but their representation on this head will be most graciously received by the King" and so forth. So far, as my Lord Haldane has just said, we are dealing with the South. My Lords, going back, if I may, to Volume III, which I am sorry to have carried you from, you will observe that we come now to this important Report of the Lords of Trade at page 903.

Viscount HALDANE : Is this the North document ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : No, my Lord, this is the reply of the Lords of Trade to the document I read last from the immediately preceding pages, 899 to 902. May I say, so that we may get the scheme of it right, that, in its turn, your Lordships will notice, is followed by another request to them, and is followed by yet another document on page 919. Would your Lordships indulge me by turning to page 919 at once, in order to see why I am so confident that when we read these things through we shall find out what "the Indian country" is. It is described in the first sentence on page 919, in the fourth line, in these words, "That large tract of country bounded by the Mississippi." It starts, "In Obedience to Your Majesty's Commands," and so on, "that that large tract of Country bounded by the Mississippi and the Limits of the Hudson Bay Company on the one hand and on the other by the Limits of Canada, East and West Florida and his Majesty's ancient Colonies." Now, my Lords, observe, of course, that if we might assume that the Lords of Trade had that map which is now on the stand before them, it is obvious, on an inspection of it, that is describing a particular area, and it is bounded on every side. The ancient Colonies are the thirteen ancient Colonies of the Coast ; the two Floridas turn the corner at the bottom, the Mississippi runs right up the centre (as your Lordships remember it was treated as running up to the Southern boundary of Hudson's Bay), and therefore you get the whole area thus marked round in that description, and you will find that that exactly corresponds with the maps of the time, and exactly corresponds with the Instructions to the Administrator in the South and the Administrator of the North added together, because I am going to give you the Instructions to the Administrator of the North, and it is therefore found, when one reads the documents, really not to refer to this green area at all. That is what I have in mind when I say I am sure I can satisfy you on these documents. Now, if your Lordships would be good enough to turn back to the document on page 913, I will pick out the passages which deal with the Indian question, because, of course, it deals with a great many other things as well. The passages are these : the first passage is on page 906, the second passage is on page 909, and the third passage is on page 910. There are three passages in this document which deal with it : 906 at about line 22 ; 909 at about line 30, and 910, which I at once admit is a more difficult passage accurately to construe, about line 17. Now would your Lordships look at them in order. At page 906 your Lordships see that the Lords of Trade are saying—of course, this has been read before, but I am afraid I must ask leave to read it again— "The next obvious Benefit acquired by the Cessions made to your Majesty is the Fur & Skin Trade of all the Indians in North America," and they treat that as two branches, the fur trade first and the skin trade second. "The first of these articles," that is the fur trade, "before the present Cession, was enjoyed by the French almost entirely ; the only part left in the Hands of Your Majesty's Subjects, being that carried on by the Exclusive Company of Hudson's Bay, and a very inconsiderable Quantity through the Province of New York. This Trade was acquired in virtue of the Possession which they had taken" —that is the French— "(contrary to the Stipulations of the Treaty of Utrecht) of all the Lakes in North America, communicating with the River St. Laurence, tho' the circumjacent Territory avowedly belonged to the six Nations of Indians, Acknowledged by the French to be Your Majesty's Subjects in that Treaty, and by virtue of the Claim which they afterwards set up and were suffered to maintain for a long time of forcibly excluding Your Majesty's Subjects from any Navigation in those Lakes. But this Trade which the French with the utmost Industry had carried to the greatest Extent, by means of numerous well chosen Posts and Forts" (there is the same idea, that they had Forts) "sufficient as well to overawe as to supply all the Indians upon that immense Continent." I am not disputing at all that there were aborigines who, for all I know, may be described as Indians—I do not mind the ethnology of it at all—on this Labrador area, but it could not possibly be supposed, I apprehend, that this passage has any reference to them ; nobody suggests there were any Posts there and nobody suggests that they were supplied or over-awed at all— "is now fallen intirely and exclusively into the Hands of Your Majesty's Subjects and may be secured and communicated to all Your Majesty's Colonies according to the Industry of each, by means of those Posts and Forts with proper regulations for the Trade with the Indians, under the Protection of such a Military Force as may preserve their tranquility, not only against Indian Incursions but be ready for their Defence against any European Attack." Then, my Lords, the second passage, as I pointed out, is to be found on page 909, where again you will find the connotation of the phrase "the Indian Country," quite clearly set out in the lower half of the page. The second passage is this : "We shall defer at present entering into any particulars, as to the number of Troops which it may be necessary to maintain for this purpose. The Number and Situation of the Posts and Forts, and the Regulations proper to be established for a free Trade" —now— "from all Your Majesty's Colonies into the Indian Country ; "that refers, my Lords, to the fact that these ancient Colonies, which were always called" Your Majesty's Colonies"the thirteen of them on the Atlantic Seaboard, were Colonies which had got a hinterland into which the settlers, including George Washington himself, were extremely anxious to penetrate. You see, "from all Your Majesty's Colonies into the Indian Country; 'till by further information from Your Majesty's Commander in Chief of America, and from Your Majesty's Agents for Indian Affairs.'" Lord Haldane will notice that it is "agents" in the plural, because there are two of them, neither more nor less, just two. "We shall be enabled to make a more full and particular Report upon so interesting and important a Subject. And We apprehend that no such Delay can be attended with very material Inconvenience, since, if Your Majesty shall be pleased to adopt the general proposition of leaving a large Tract of Country, round the great Lakes as an Indian Country, open to Trade, but not to Grants and Settlements, the Limits of such Territory will be sufficiently ascertained by the Bounds to be given to the Governors of Canada and Florida on the North and South, and the Mississippi on the West." In this particular passage he does not put in what is really implied : "And Your Majesty's ancient Colonies."

Lord WARRINGTON : But he goes on.

Sir JOHN SIMON : "And by the strict Directions to be given to Your Majesty's several Governors of Your ancient Colonies" —I am much obliged, my Lords, he does— "for preventing their making any new Grants of Lands beyond certain fixed Limits to be laid down in the Instructions for that purpose." That is the second passage, my Lord.

Lord SUMNER : "And we apprehend that in the mean time the Security of this Trade will be sufficiently provided for by the Forts already erected."

Sir JOHN SIMON : "and such Garrisons as Your Commander in Chief may, at his Discretion, think proper to keep in them." My own?

p. 855

eyesight does not serve me at this distance, but I am under the impression that there is a reference to "the Indian country" in the Mitchell Map ; it mentions a series of Indian Nations at any rate. If your Lordships would turn to the Canadian Atlas, it really is quite clear if your Lordships would take the sort of map which is No. 28, you see the thing at once. What is so striking is that this is, your Lordships see, a map of 1763, upon which has been put the indication of some of the adjustments made in that year, and here you will find exactly the boundary which is necessary ; that is to say, you will find that you will have the boundary of the new Province of Quebec, which is in yellow ; you will have the boundary of the ancient Colonies, you will have at the bottom the boundary of the two Floridas, and you will have on the West the boundary of the Mississippi, and you have at the top the boundary of Hudson's Bay ; and without saying that you get there what is an absolutely continuous line, it is quite sufficient to justify the general view that you are dealing with that country which, I will show you in a moment, is described as "The interior country," and the country which cannot be got at in any other way, and the Forts in question are all Forts in this neighbourhood. That is what these gentlemen, I venture to think, are quite plainly talking about. It may be necessary to look at one or two other maps in a moment. The third passage on page 910 is, I quite agree, a little more difficult for me ; I think on any view (I do not know whether my learned friend agrees) it is rather a difficult passage to construe. The suggestion has been made to me, and I think it is an ingenious and it may be a helpful suggestion, that the passage on page 910, when it speaks of a particular area as "beyond the sources of the rivers" is really using the word, as you may say, from the London point of view. In ancient Rome, if you wanted to describe that part of Gaul, which lies about Marseilles, you called it Trans-Alpine Gaul, and if you wanted to describe that part of Gaul which is the Italian Riviera, you called it Cis-Alpine Gaul, and that was because you were speaking from the point of view of Rome ; and I rather think when you are reading this passage on page 910, that really the passage is to be understood as though you were, so to say, in London, and looking across to the Continent of America. So read, it becomes quite intelligible, because what it says at line 10 is : "Canada as possessed and claimed by the French consisted of an immense Tract of Country including as well the whole Lands to the westward indefinitely which was the Subject of their Indian Trade" — to the Westward you notice, the illimitable West, that is going right away— "as all that country from the Southern Bank of the River St. Lawrence where they carried on their Encroachments. It is needless to state with any degree of precision the Bounds and Limits of this extensive Country, for We should humbly propose to Your Majesty that the new Government of Canada should be restricted, so as to leave on the one hand, all the Lands lying about the great Lakes and beyond the Sources of the Rivers which fall into the River St. Lawrence from the North, from Cape Roziere to Lake Champlain, along the Heights where the Sources of the Rivers rise, which fall into the Bay of Fundy and Atlantic

Sir John Simon.

p. 856

Ocean, to be annexed to Nova Scotia" ; your Lordships know there is a rather curious geographical puzzle as to exactly how you fit this phrase into the maps of the time on any view. I do not say it either hurts or helps me ; it is a difficulty. It has been suggested to me by my friend, Mr. Pearson, that really if you consider that they were speaking of this whole country looking at it, as it were, from London, it may very well be that just. as they speak in line 12 of "Lands to the Westward indefinitely," so in the same way the indication, admittedly vague, is an indication that, standing here, you see it beyond the rivers which run into the St. Lawrence. It does not hurt me on any view, it might perhaps bring in my yellow.

Lord SUMNER : If you read the "lands" in line 19 as qualified by two particulars, one, that they lie about the Great Lakes, and the other that they lie beyond the sources of the Rivers which fall into the River St. Lawrence from the North, they may be two categories of lands.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I rather think it is a single description, given by two phrases in combination.

Lord SUMNER : If the lands dealt with are such as can be said only to lie about the Great Lakes, and to lie beyond the sources of the rivers which fall into the St. Lawrence from the North, they at any rate seem to be West of any land of Montagnais and Naskapis ; if, on the other hand, the first refers to land about the Great Lakes, and the second, a separate category, is lands which lie beyond the sources, then you have to deal with this question about "beyond the sources of the Rivers which fall into the River St. Lawrence."

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord, I think that is very just ; and in support of the view that this is a complicated description of a single subject matter, I have the fact that I have already had the subject matter described in the same document at page 906 and in the same document at page 909, and that as soon as I get the reply to the document I get the reply, on page 919, in terms which show that what the Lords of Trade were understood to mean is an area which is a large tract of country bounded by the Mississippi and the limits of the Hudson's Bay Company on the one hand, and on the other by the bounds of Canada, East and West Florida and His Majesty's ancient Colonies ; so that I really have within the four corners of the document, an indication, apart altogether from the supplementary matter I am now going to call attention to, that this, as a matter of fact, means this interior country.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I have some difficulty in accepting this suggestion, if you compare this and the next paragraph.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, I follow, my Lord.

The Lord

- Sir JOHN SIMON : That is quite true, my Lord.

- The LORD CHANCELLOR : Then in the next paragraph you get this as the boundary, "On the North West It will be bounded by a Line drawn South from the River St. John's in Labrador by the heads of those rivers which fall into the River St. Lawrence." If you take those words, "Sources" and "Heads," it rather looks as if it might be not beyond the Rivers themselves, so to speak, but above the sources and heads of the rivers.
- Lord
Warrington.
- Sir JOHN SIMON : It is quite possible.
- Sir John Simon.
- The LORD CHANCELLOR: It may be that one ought to have put some emphasis on the word "Rivers." Of course, if you do that, you really start at the St. John River.
- Sir JOHN SIMON : You do. I have taken the view myself, my Lord Chancellor, and I think what you are putting is the same view (I suggest it for consideration) that on one reading of these words, it might very well be right to bring in what I have sometimes called my yellow. I do not mean the yellow on the big chart, but the yellow on my little hand chart ; whereas on another view, "the Indian country" would not extend even to that, but in neither view, in my respectful submission, is it carried into any area which is material to me.
- 9 Nov., 1926.
Sir John Simon.
- Viscount FINLAY : It is a little obscure for a precise boundary, but does it really much matter for the present purpose ? We do not at all doubt that the Indian country was a sort of definition
- Sir JOHN SIMON : I do not think it matters at all ; and when I ask your Lordships' attention, as I shall have to do quite briefly, both to the way in which this was dealt with as an executive act—at present this is mere advice, but it was followed up by executive action in respect of both the Indian lands in the Southern and the Northern areas—and there are the maps, and really, when you examine the maps, it is not open to question that Labrador has got nothing to do with it at all.

Lord WARRINGTON : It looks rather as if they were dealing not with Labrador at all, because that is referred to on page 909 as being something already done.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord. That is why I thought it was important to call attention to the fact that when they start on this topic, it is regarded as an entirely new topic.

Lord WARRINGTON : They are dealing with something different.

p. 858

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes ; they have got rid of Labrador, and now they are dealing with a totally different subject matter. Your Lordship remembers that at the bottom of that page, 910, you get this further reference : "In order however that Yr Majesty may judge with the greater precision of the Limits of Canada as above described and also of those We shall propose for Florida, and of the Country we think right to be left as Indian Territory, We humbly beg leave to refer to the annex'd Chart in which those Limits are particularly delineated, and of which Your Majesty will have a clearer Conception than can be conveyed by descriptive Words alone."

Viscount FINLAY : Have we got that ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord ; it is No. 27 in the Canadian Atlas, but whether an inspection of it makes it so absolutely clear is another thing.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : What is the actual date of this map ? It is evidently just after 1763.

9 Nov., 1926.

The Lord
Chancellor.

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord. This is, as your Lordship sees, a map by Bowen, but in spite of the note which has been made on the face of it, which you will see just above the word "Atlantic" in "Atlantic Ocean" and which says "The chart which accompanied the report," and so on ; and in spite of the careful enquiry which has been made, which I quite accept in all good faith, I rather wonder whether or not these can be the actual colours of it. If you inspect it, you can see in a sense what the Indian Country is, because you carry your eye up the Mississippi, and you come across something or other, whatever it may be, which is the Hudson's Bay boundary in the present case, rather suggesting that it was this straight line which your Lordships remember occurs in some maps. You get the great lakes, and you get, around them, the names of the tribes, like the Sioux, and the Algonquins—Your Lordships will notice where they are put. They are put round between Lake Superior and Lake Huron. Then the Iroquois are put between Lake Michigan and Lake

The Lord

Sir John Simon.

Huron, and there is a whole series of names further down in the conquered country, and so on. I apprehend that if you looked at this map, you might not unreasonably say : "Without getting a precise boundary, I know that the boundary of the Indian country is the Mississippi, the Southern boundary of Hudson's Bay." And would your Lordships observe that on this map the actual expression is "Southern Boundary" ; the word "Southern" is used. So that when I get a description, I am a little disposed to think that it means some portion of the boundary thus marked ; and I find that that runs very nearly—though, I agree not quite—to the corner of the pink. Then you get the Province of Quebec, and then you get a boundary which is the boundary of the thirteen ancient colonies, and then at the bottom you get Florida.

p. 859

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Again you get the clear distinction between the St. Lawrence River, which is above Anticosti, and the Gulf which is below.

Mr. Macmillan.

Sir JOHN SIMON: You do, my Lord ; and I think your Lordship was justified in saying that my acceptance of the view that the St. Lawrence River runs up as far as the Western end of Anticosti may perhaps, on some of the maps at any rate, have been carrying it a little far. The practice is not consistent ; but I made the concession because I think for the purpose of any point in the case we might take that. It would not hurt me..

Sir John Simon.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : In your Geologist's map it is put higher up. You have a series of them somewhere.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I produced some maps.

Sir John Simon.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Yes ; when you were arguing the Hamilton Inlet point. There is a map of the St. Lawrence River which makes the St. Lawrence cease there.

Mr. Macmillan.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I think you cannot settle it at any moment, and I do not know why you should. When you come to describe the limits of a harbour in the United Kingdom you get all sorts of curious and rather artificial lines, determining, for instance, what is the Thames and what is something else.

But, reading the documents of 1763, it is hardly possible to suppose that a map of this sort, dealing with these very severe anxieties which prevailed in the summer of 1763 in reference to the Illinois and the Federated Nations and the Confederacy, and those forts which were up here in the heart of the United States—it is hardly possible to suppose that they were harking back to a frozen area where there were no forts, and which at that time was not regarded as being of any value to anybody, and where, as far as I know, there was never any systematic relation between the French and these people at all.

Lord Warrington.

Sir John Simon.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I do not know whether your Lordships would allow me to call attention to the use of the phrase "the mouth of the River St. Lawrence" in the Proclamation on page 153 of Volume I, because I think that is very relevant on this particular matter. It is in the same Proclamation, and it is called "the mouth of the River St. Lawrence," and it is "by the west end of the Island of Anticosti." I do not know that it is a concession.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I beg your pardon for calling it a concession. All that I meant was that I was not seeking to dispute it. I will give you another, if you like.

p. 860

Mr. MACMILLAN : As many as you like.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I will give you this one : You will find a passage in which Cape Rosieres is described as being at the mouth of the River St. Lawrence.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I think I had already called attention to that. I cannot regard that as a concession, either. Now, perhaps, you will give me something which is of value.

Sir JOHN SIMON: I can only offer you the truth, and although the truth is valuable, it is not valuable to Canada.

Lord WARRINGTON : Do you say that the rivers which are referred, to there, the rivers falling into the St. Lawrence, mean the Rivers to the west of the River St. John ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : I think so, my Lord.

Lord WARRINGTON : The rivers on the pink part of that map.

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord. There are two views, as my Lord Sumner said just now. One view would be this, and as far as one can take a view apart from being a mere advocate—I do not know whether one can—it seems to me to be rather an attractive view. There is a great deal to be said for the view that the description of this land which was around the great lakes and beyond the sources of the rivers, is really to be regarded as meaning "trans" or "ultra" as opposed to "cis." It is like saying "Trans-alpine Gaul" instead of "Cis-alpine Gaul." It depends upon the point from which you are paragraph immediately above, or two other passages in the same document which do not give rise to this difficulty at all. looking. That is confirmed by the reference to "westward" in the paragraph immediately above, or two other passages in the same document which do not give rise to this difficulty at all. the Viscount FINLAY : I do not see how you apply the Trans-alpine and Cis-alpine analogy to this.

Viscount Finlay. Sir JOHN SIMON : I was endeavouring to explain it, my Lord. The point is this, at line 19 on page 910 in Volume III

Lord. WARRINGTON : They fulfil both the conditions. They lie around the Great Lakes and are limited to this side.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord. I should like Lord Finlay to see it, because I know he takes an interest in these classical analogies. It is only a suggestion, but I think myself that there is a good deal in 35 it. The question, my Lord Finlay, if I may put it in that way, is : What exactly are you to understand, in line 19, by the word "beyond?"

p. 861

Sir John Simon. Viscount FINLAY : Yes.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Now, if you regard yourself as one of the Lords of Trade who is describing this Indian country (which you already have described, you know, as being in the heart of the continent and around the Great Lakes), may it not be that the description here, "all the lands lying about the Great Lakes and beyond the Sources of the Rivers which fall into the River St. Laurence from the north," really means' that if you proceeded from here, you would have to pass those rivers in order to get into the country in question. In that sense it is exactly like the way in which a Roman administrator spoke of Gaul on this side of the Alps or Gaul on the other side of the Alps or beyond the Alps. But it does not very much matter, because, upon any view— I think I have made the point plainly and I will not repeat it—it does not invade my green area at all.

Viscount FINLAY : I do not know what difference it makes, but it seems to me that you are supposed to be going up the rivers which fall into the river St. Lawrence from the north.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Undoubtedly that is true, my Lord, yes.

Viscount FINLAY : Then you would get beyond their sources.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my lord. The whole question is, whether you are to regard yourself as travelling up the river or standing on this side of it.

Viscount FINLAY : Travelling up the river, certainly.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Your Lordship has your view, and I have nothing more to say. It seems to me to be rather doubtful which it is, but it does not matter to my case, I think.

Now, the next document is on page 915, where again you see this interesting conflict of view as to what was the right policy. On page 915 I have now got, in my chronological statement, to July the 14th, 1763. Let me remind the Board, if I may, of what it is that happens. The Lords of Trade have said : "We think that the Province of Quebec should be this lozenge-shaped, slate-coloured province," such as your Lordships remember that I have got there ; and the Secretary of State, taking the name of the King, is saying : "Everything that you have said is very good, and of course I quite agree that we ought to preserve this interior country and not allow it to be the subject of private acquisition or settlement ; but ought you not to throw the interior country, the yellow, inside the boundaries of Quebec ?"

That leads me to repeat what I ventured to say to your Lordships yesterday afternoon, that there is surely a very great fallacy in supposing that you are depriving the natives of any rights that they may have in hunting grounds or the like, merely because.

you extend the boundary of some particular Colonial unit, so that their hunting grounds fall within it. As I think Lord Haldane pointed out the other day, it has always been the case in Canada, that, of course the radical title remaining in the Crown, Indian reserves may well fall within the boundaries of a province, and the Indian enjoyment of the Indian rights in the Indian reserves is not in any way forfeited or taken away because that is so.

Therefore, the question between the Lords of Trade and King George III was not whether you should deprive the Indians of their rights—in fact, it was a fundamental point of British policy to do nothing of the kind, and to assure them that you were never thinking of it—but the question was : would it be wiser to make the boundary of Quebec this limited, lozengeshape, slatecoloured area, so that the area beyond, the interior country, remains unorganised, or would it not be better to throw this interior country into the Province of Quebec, while at the same time you continue to insist upon the policy that there is to be no private appropriation of Indian lands ?

9 Nov., 1926.
Sir John Simon.

That is exactly what Lord Egremont says at the bottom of page 915, in a very instructive passage which is to be found there. He says : "Your Report, dated the 8th of last Month, having been laid before the King, and His Majesty having taken the Same into Consideration ; I am, in Consequence thereof, to acquaint your Lordships, That the King approves the Erecting Three New Governments in North America, under the Denominations your Lordships propose, of Canada, East Florida, and West Florida ; But, with regard to the Limits of these Governments, as described in the Report, and marked out in the Chart thereunto annexed ; Altho' His Majesty entirely concurs in your Lord- ships Idea, of not permitting any Grant of Lands, or New Settlements to be made, for the present, beyond the Bounds proposed by your Lord- ships ; Yet the King thinks, that great Inconveniences might arise, from so large a Tract of Land being left, without being Subject to the Civil Jurisdiction of some Governor, in Virtue of His Majesty's Com- mission, under the Great Seal of Great Britain ; And that, (besides the Difficulties there might be, for Want of such a Civil Jurisdiction, in bringing to Justice Criminals, and Fugitives, who may take Refuge in that Country,) Their not being included within some established Government might, in Time to come, furnish Matter of Dispute, with regard to the Property" —he means the radical title to the property, the Royal Title— "And other Powers, who might hereafter find Means of Access to those Countries, might take Possession thereof, as derelict Lands."

Viscount
Haldane.

Sir John Simon.

Of course, nothing is more certain than that, as long as the Governors of Newfoundland are in the effective charge of the Atlantic coast of Labrador, and the Hudson's Bay Company is in effective charge of the Hudson's Bay side of Labrador, and the Quebec authorities are in effective charge of the north bank of the River St. Lawrence—nothing is more certain than that you will never be able to get any foreigner coming into my green area until somebody invents an aeroplane. So that it can hardly be that they are there saying : "If we do not include some part of the green, it may be that foreigners will find their way in."

p. 863

They are not referring to that at all, but to the interior country, which you would get at by going up the Mississippi, or perhaps from the Rocky Mountains side

Viscount HALDANE : I think the serious point is this, that it deals expressly with solicitude, with not disturbing the Indians or causing suspicion in their minds ; and the general policy, whether it prevails in the appointed territories or not, is the general policy of the King. One must bear that in mind in construing any allocations.

Sir JOHN SIMON : If I may say so, I think that is a very just observation, and I try to do so ; but, of course, at the same time, one has to see what is the actual subject matter that they are dealing with more particularly, my Lord Haldane, because I may fairly claim that here they have passed from a previous subject, Labrador, and have now entered upon a new topic ; or at least that is my submission.

Now just let us see how the King goes on. As you will notice, he says : "It is not that I want to permit anybody to appropriate as private property the lands in the Indian country ; but would it not be better to throw that into Quebec ?" Therefore he says : "And other Powers, who might hereafter find Means of Access to those Countries, might take Possession thereof, as derelict Lands : The King therefore is of Opinion" —Now, my Lords, see what it is that he proposes to do in order to solve this difficulty— "that, in the Commission for the Governor of Canada," —they had not yet decided whether to call it Quebec or Canada. It was the same thing— "all the Lakes, viz., Ontario, Erie, Huron, Michigan, and Superior, should be included, with all the Country, as far North, and West, as the Limits of the Hudsons Bay Company, and the Misissippi."

I will read on in a moment, but you must imagine His Majesty, through his Secretary of State, as having before his eyes the map which your Lordships have just been examining, namely Bowen's map. He looks round, and he sees the five great Lakes ; he sees the names of the Indian tribes all about, the Iroquois, and so on ; and he says : "This is an area which I do not like to leave unorganised, because people can approach it from the south and west," and so he says : "We ought to put that into the Commission," and he goes on, at about line 15, "And also that all Lands whatsoever, ceded by the late Treaty, and which are not already included within the Limits of His Majesty's ancient Colonies, or intended to form the Governments of East and West Florida, as described in your Lordships Report, be assigned to the Government of Canada, unless your Lordships should suggest any other Distribution, which might answer the purpose more effectually."

9 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Now let us see what happens. There is an answer, which you will find on page 919, from the Lords of Trade, in which they, at any rate, are under no misapprehension as to what the Indian country is. They say : "Well, it is all very well to say that you ought to throw this Indian country into the Quebec Commission, but that would seem to be acknowledging that the Indian country was obtained by cession from France, whereas in fact the Indian country was never obtained by cession from France ; it was obtained as a result of treaties and purchases which we had entered into with the Indian tribes." Now that language does not fit the interior of Labrador at all.

My learned friend insisted that, so far as Labrador is concerned, we did get it by cession from France. That is the whole point. Not only that, but it is not true to say, of course, that it ever was acquired by contract or purchase from the Indians. Here is the letter : "May it please Your Majesty. In Obedience to Your Majesty's Commands contained in a Letter from the Earl of Egremont, dated the 14th of July last signifying to Us Your Majesty's Most gracious Approbation of Our Idea, that that large Tract of Country"—marked yellow on my map up there on the screen — "bounded by the Mississippi and the limits of the Hudson Bay Company on the one hand and on the other by the Limits of Canada, East and West Florida and His Majesty's ancient Colonies, should for the present be made subject to no grants of Lands nor to any Settlements, it should be put under some civil Jurisdiction, by a Commission under the Great Seal of Great Britain, so as to prevent any But acquainting us, that it was Your Majesty's Pleasure, that objection, which might be formed, as to the property of it, or its being considered as abandoned or derelict, or it's becoming a refuge for Criminals and Fugitives, and for these Reasons, that the whole of this Territory should be inserted in the Commission of the Governor of Canada"—How can anybody say that the words I have just read, if they are this territory, include my green ? Of course, they cannot— "and assigned to that Government, unless we should suggest to Your Majesty some disposition which would answer these Purposes more effectually and directing us on this Matter. . . ." Then they say : "We have taken it into consideration," and they say " we do not think it is a good plan." Look at their reason : "We are apprehensive that, should this country"—that is the Indian country—"be annexed to the Government of Canada, a Colour might be taken on some future occasion for supposing that Your Majesty's title to it, had taken it's rise, singly from the Cessions made by France, in the late Treaty"—I should like to know, Is it or is it not the case of the Dominion of Canada that the title of His Majesty King George the Third to the green area was obtained by Cession from Canada ? Of course, it is their case, yet it is perfectly obvious the people who wrote this were dealing with an area the title to which was not so derived. They say : "Whereas as to the Sovereignty over the Indian Tribes, particularly of the Six Nations, rests on a more solid and even a more equitable Foundation ; and perhaps nothing is more necessary than that just Impressions on this Subject should be carefully preserved in the Minds of the Indians, Your Majesty's Title to the Lakes and circumjacent territory as well whose Ideas might be blended and confounded if they should be brought to consider themselves as under the Government of Canada." Then, my Lord, most important, on page 920, they go on to say under the third head : "If this great Country should be annexed to the Government of Canada, we are apprehensive, that the Powers of such Government could not be carried properly into execution, either in respect of the Indians or British Traders, unless by means of the Garrisons at the different Posts and Forts in that country, which must contain the greatest part of Your Majesty's American Forces, and consequently the Governor of Canada would become virtually Commander in Chief or constant and inextricable disputes would arise, between him, and the commanding Officers of Your Majesty's Troops." Then they go on to say : "If these Objections should appear of Weight to Your Majesty, we would humbly propose" —this is what was done — "that a Commission under the Great Seal, for the Government of this Country, should be given to the Commander in Chief of Your Majesty's Troops for the time being adapted to the protection of the Indians and the fur trade of Your Majesty's Subjects." Would your Lordships be good enough to turn over to page 923 at line 20, and you will observe that their recommendation is in the next document described as a Commission to the Commander in Chief for the Government of the Interior country. So it is quite clear when you read these documents, granted the geographical description is not minute and precise to a point, that the area in question was an interior country, as indeed it is constantly called in the Instructions to which I will call attention in a moment. My humble submission is, therefore, that when one takes these documents, which I have now reached the end of, that there is no ground in the documents themselves for supposing that there was such an exclusion of any portion of the green as my learned friends have been at pains to suggest.

Haldane.

Sir John Simon.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Do you say, Sir John, I shall find the Commission given to the Commander in Chief for the Government of the Interior country, because I do not find that.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I am going to deal with that. I did not say you would find it, I said you would find the words described as "the Interior of the Country."

Mr. MACMILLAN : Was any such Commission granted ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : I will look for it.

Viscount HALDANE : It may be that they did not deliberately make out any Commission for a Commander in Chief of this country, because it may be they thought : "we have got a Naval Commander in Chief close at hand, there are no enemies, it is enough to be able to give instructions to proceed if necessary to the Interior of Labrador to keep order."

Sir JOHN SIMON : I rather think that is the true view. What is coming now, Lord Haldane, as you have anticipated, as indeed I have observed, is when you examine what was the centre of anxiety, and just consider as I am going to put before the Board shortly, the Pontiac Rebellion, and when you look at the documents for the purpose of crushing that Rebellion and introducing peace in the country, every one of the documents is addressed into the heart of this interior country, so much so that when they draw a chart for the purpose of showing what is the area to which the Indians have been secured, they do not even trouble to include on the chart the piece of ground which is Labrador at all.

Viscount HALDANE : It may be, if the theory is true, they thought it better not to make any civil allocation of territory, but to leave it as it was.

Sir JOHN SIMON: A thing which always seems to me to be a little important on this aspect of the case is this ; of course, there were plenty of areas in the world in the middle of the Eighteenth Century where the grant of all the coasts, interpreted as is suggested it might be interpreted, might conceivably involve travelling back hundreds of miles ; I quite appreciate the good sense of the criticism that you would need extremely strong language to make out such a case. That would be true, for example, if you were to grant all the coasts on the Pacific ; at this stage nobody knew how the land lay at all, or how far back it was. It would be true if you took tropical Africa in the Eighteenth Century, or South America. But the point is, when I come to my Peninsula of Labrador, though, of course, nobody knew what was inside it, they knew pretty well the line of its Atlantic seaboard, they knew very accurately indeed the Hudson's Bay boundary, they knew the width of the Isthmus, therefore they were not adventuring into a void and giving a man an authority which, when it came to be worked out, might conceivably involve millions of square miles, but they were giving him a portion of the whole, the outside boundaries of which were perfectly well known ; when you add to that, the land would be perfectly worthless, it does not seem an extravagant view to take, as your Lordship said just now : Well, the Governor of Newfoundland will deal with that. Now let us turn to the really serious matter, which was the Pontiac Rebellion.

I do not know how I can most conveniently and briefly put my next point, but if your Lordships will allow me, I would venture to do it in this way : I am anxious to remind your Lordships, and I can do it in a very few minutes, of the salient features of this trouble in the Indian country. It is an interesting piece of history ; the authorities for it are well known ; there is an extremely good book which I have had the privilege of reading for the purposes of this case (and I am very glad to have been called upon to do it), which is Mr. Francis Parkman's two volumes on the Conspiracy of Pontiac

Viscount HALDANE : Is it a Canadian Book ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : American, but it was published by Macmillans. Dr. Parkman is admittedly a great author on this period. It contains, incidentally, an extremely interesting map from which you are able to identify nearly all these places. Nobody can read that book through and imagine that Labrador has anything to do with it. I want very briefly to give what I understand to be the historical situation. My friend, Mr. Geoffrion, in his very interesting argument, of course, quite correctly said that what the King was dealing with, especially in the summer of 1763, was the security of our ancient Colonies, that was the real trouble. Then you had these well-established Colonies, 13 of them, along the Atlantic seaboard, and their security was very seriously threatened. The thing that was threatening their security was the Pontiac rebellion—Pontiac was the name of an Indian Chief, the head of it—to which my learned friend, Mr. Geoffrion, also referred as a matter of history in the Shorthand Note at page 664, line 30. It is not for me to appraise Mr. Geoffrion's statement on the subject of Canadian history, naturally he knows a great deal more about it than I know, but, as I understand it, he quite correctly described the Pontiac rebellion in that passage in the Shorthand Notes at page 664 as a rebellion in the west and round the Great Lakes. My friend said in his part of the world it was school history, you can well understand it would be. It was a rebellion which started after the Treaty of Paris and before the Proclamation of October, that is to say, it broke out in the Spring and Summer of 1763. It is quite elaborately and most interestingly dealt with in Dr. Parkman's book, including a most terrible story of a massacre which took place in the last chapter of the first volume, one of the most frightful pieces of reading of a historical kind, outside the story of the Indian mutiny, I have ever heard of—it was a terrible business—and the conspiracy of Pontiac from which it broke out shows it, I think, quite clearly to be a conspiracy which was confined to the area between the ancient colonies and the Mississippi, it had nothing to do with the Labrador Peninsula at all, absolutely nothing.

The story may be put in a few sentences like this, and I have got my learned Mr. Monckton to check me ; he has read the book, and so have I ; I believe I am making an impartial summary or synopsis of what I learn in this and similar authorities.

Viscount HALDANE : Has the book been published in England ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord, it is published by Macmillans. Dr. Parkman, of course, is a very well known Canadian historian—my friend corrects me, it ought to be American historian, but I think you would describe the book as a standard book for students of the period. Your Lordships might be interested perhaps just to handle the volume. (Same handed in.) This is the story in the briefest outline. During the fighting between the French and the English in North America between 1755 and 1760, in the seven years war, there were very important Indian tribes that sided with the British and there were other tribes that sided with the French. The Hurons, the Abenakis, several of the Algonquin tribes supported the French ; the Iroquois, for example, supported the English.

p. 868

Viscount FINLAY : The Six nations were the Iroquois.

Sir JOHN SIMON : They were the Iroquois ; it included six nations. Viscount FINLAY : They were steadily English.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Their names were the Mohawks, the Cayugas, the Senecas, the Onondagas, the Oneidas and the Tuscaroras, those were the six nations ; there was also a confederacy further west. It was a point in the British policy in North America in the Seven Years' War that they should do their utmost to keep these very important and amalgamated Indian tribes in the Indian country friendly to us ; on the other hand, after victory was won, of course, that did not mean you drove everybody with French sympathies out of Canada,, it only meant that French Imperialism in North America came to an end ; you had all over this area French Canadians resentful, as they naturally were, at the defeat of the flag and King, who were engaged in telling the Indians that the British, it is quite true, had won, but the British would betray them, and these tribes who had been dependent upon and associated with the British—I think I am using the language of one of the documents, of the Proclamation indeed—would find that they had been betrayed. That was the story of the French who did everything they could, not unnaturally, to encourage that view. So after the final defeat of the French in 1760 the English began to take possession of the area where the French had had their forts, and, of course, as far as the English advanced into this Indian country and took possession of the forts, the impression was further created in the minds of these Indian tribes in the interior that they were going to lose from the new conqueror what they had been promised. The French had erected their forts, and the most important forts you will see in Dr. Parkman's book were these, they were Fort Presqu' Isle on Lake Erie, Fort Detroit which is between Lake Huron and Lake Erie, of course—they called it Detroit, it meant straits—and there was a fort with a most astonishing name and the scene of a most appalling massacre, Fort Michillimackinac, between Lake Michigan and Lake Huron. The Indians looked with great suspicion on the cession by the French King to the English of this immense area, everything to the east of the Mississippi, because not unnaturally and I should think with some justice the Indians considered the country belonged neither to the French nor to the English, but to themselves. And between 1760 and 1763 an Indian Chief called Pontiac, who was an influential Chief of the Ottawas, prepared a revolt. Two and a half months after the Treaty of Paris was signed—it was signed you see in February—on the 27th of April 763 this Chief Pontiac held a council of the Indians near Fort Detroit, and in May 1763 the rising took place. It was one of the most formidable dangers from which the British Empire ever suffered at the hands of native races. Observe how this chimes in with my chronology. That was in May 1763, the thing had broken out. The influence of Sir

William Johnson—I gave your Lordship his name—who was the Administrator for Indian Affairs in the northern half, prevented five—of the six nations from joining in the revolt, but the sixth nation, the Senecas, did so as well as a great many of the tribes further west. Sir William Johnson conducted his operations from a place which was called Johnson Hall, I think—probably you will find it on that map—which is, as a matter of fact, on the River Mohawk which runs into the River Hudson in New York State. You will find it in Dr. Parkman's book, you will see Johnson Hall on the River Mohawk running into the River Hudson. He had been appointed on the 14th May, 1756, therefore he was just in time to use his influence and he seems to have had great influence. By the end of June, 1763, you can imagine the reason, why King George and his Secretary of State were a little anxious to know what was the right thing to do with the Indian country. Fort Presqu'Isle and Fort Michillimackinac as well as two other important forts, Fort Ouatanon and Fort Miamis which were to the west, had fallen into the hands of the Indians. Fort Detroit and Fort Pitt, which is now Pittsburg further south, were besieged by the Indians, the revolt was still at its height and Fort Detroit was still invested at the time of the Proclamation. Now the question is, that being the situation, that being the news which was coming home here—of course, not as rapidly as it would come to-day, still it was reaching here steadily in a stream from the interior of the British North American continent—what was the position, what was the policy ? Why, of course, their position was this, they said : "We have beaten the French who after all are civilised people and gentlemen ; now we are threatened with a much worse affair than that, we are threatened with a tremendous and overwhelming revolt, we must do everything in our power to stop it."

9 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

I humbly submit that if anybody went to Lord Egremont, or George III, or the Lords of Trade in July, 1763, and said "What are we to do about these pusillanimous aborigines in the interior of Labrador ?" they would have regarded him as talking perfect nonsense. The conclusion is this. The rebellion was not finally crushed until 1765, though the flame had died down, and it was almost over in 1761. You will find in Dr. Packman's book (the first volume, page 176) he points out the thing that most contributed to the growing discontent of these Indians was the intrusion of settlers from these ancient Colonies beyond the mountains and into their lands. And indeed it is quite plain if you look at it, that there was a very sharp conflict of view between the Home Country here, thinking perhaps of Imperial security, and the view taken by many persons of high character in the Dominion itself. I happen to have here—and it has interested me very much—the second volume of the Writings of George Washington. The title is : "The Writings of George Washington," collected and edited by Worthington Chauncy Ford, published by Putnam in America. I read that in 1767 George Washington is writing from Mount Vernon to a correspondent, and he is using this language with reference to the policy of the Home Government, which was trying to prevent the settlers on the Coast Colonies from passing into the Indian country. He says : "The other matter just now hinted at and which I proposed in my last, to join you in attempting to secure some of the most valuable lands in the King's part "—as you might say in the Royaume du Roy, where the radical title is in the King—" which I think may be accomplished after a while, notwithstanding the Proclamation "—he thinks if he waits a bit the Proclamation of the 7th October, 1763, is not likely to be maintained—"hat restrains it at present, and prohibits the settling of them at all; for I can never look upon that Proclamation in any other light (but this I say between ourselves) than as a temporary expedient to quiet the minds of the Indians, and must fall, of course, in a few years, especially when these Indians are consenting to our occupying the lands." That is page 220 of the second volume of this collection of the Writings of George Washington.

Viscount HALDANE : What was the date ?

9 Nov., 1926.

Lord Sumner.

Sir JOHN SIMON : The letter is written on the 21st September, 1767, the Proclamation to which he refers being, of course, the Proclamation of the 7th October, 1763. I could give your Lordships other indications which show that the Colonists in the Ancient Colonies of the King did not at all like this Imperial policy which secured the interior for the natives.

Sir John Simon.

Viscount HALDANE : I think Lord Egremont died in August, 1763, and then Lord Halifax took up ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, that is quite right. If your Lordships will take my new documents, and look at Document No. 19, you will find a sidelight of the same sort. It is a very long and extremely illuminating document. It is the representation of the Lords of Trade to the Principal Secretary of State, and if I may take one example of what it says, I would ask your Lordships to look at page 3 of the document. The Lords of Trade are writing a tremendously long account of what is to be done, and they say at the top of page 3 : "To maintain a good correspondence with the Indians is undoubtedly an object of great importance ; and upon a careful examination into the state of Indian affairs after the conclusion of peace, it appears that the two principal causes of the discontent which still rankled in the minds of the Indians and influenced their conduct, were the encroachments made upon lands which they claimed as their property and the abuses committed by Indian traders and their servants. The necessity, which appeared in the then state of our interests with the Indians of making some immediate provision against these two causes of their discontent induced the Proclamation of October, 1763." That is a very long report made by the Lords of Trade to the Principal Secretary of State in March, 1768. There is a great deal in it which throws light on the subject, and there is a great deal to the same effect as I have read.

p. 871

Lord SUMNER : It is interesting that the arrangements of 1763 were only provisional arrangements adapted to the exigencies of the time.

Sir JOHN SIMON : George Washington was right, my Lord.

Viscount FINLAY : The process of absorption went on all the same.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord. Indeed, as your Lordship remembers, we only have to come to 1774 when my small slate coloured lozenge of Quebec is enlarged to take in the whole of the yellow, when—though I quite see that it is not necessarily contradicting the policy of keeping the new area free for the Indians—there was, as a matter of fact, a steady pressure on these uncivilised people, which ended, as such things always do end, in the survival, I trust, of the fittest, but certainly of those who are best provided with guns and ammunition.

Viscount FINLAY : Unfortunately the measures which the Indians took were rather vile.

Sir JOHN SIMON : They were of the most appalling character. There are passages in Parkman which show the amazing violence and treachery which they displayed. The conclusion I reach, therefore, is this. It is obvious that the reservation, which was recommended by the Lords of Trade, and which is incorporated in the Proclamation, is an attempt to keep "the several nations or tribes of Indians with whom we are connected"—that is the language of the Proclamation — "satisfied that they would not be encroached upon." If your Lordships will look at the first Volume, page 156, and observe the language of the Proclamation, it becomes plain that the "said Indians" is merely a phrase which is intended to go back to a description of the particular Indians that were most immediately affected. On page 156, taking the paragraph beginning at line 22, which had been suggested to be against me, it does not say "Indians," but it says "the said Indians." The paragraph reads : "And we do further declare it to be our Royal will and pleasure, for the present as aforesaid, to reserve under our sovereignty, protection, and dominion, for the use of the said Indians, all the land and territories not included within the limits of our said three new governments," etc. Where do you get the previous reference to "Indians " there ? You get it higher up on the page, at line 5 : "And whereas it is just and reasonable, and essential to our interests and the security of our colonies, that the several nations or tribes of Indians with whom we are connected, and who live under our protection,"—that is a way of describing the forces that had at first been our allies, and had afterwards rebelled— "should not be molested or disturbed in the possession of such parts of our dominions and territories as, not having been ceded to or purchased by us, are reserved to them, or any of them, as their hunting-grounds." My respectful submission is that this historical matter, setting the documents I trust in their true light, makes it reasonably clear that what we have to deal with is the Indian country in that internal sense. I am going to call attention to the instructions which follow, which make it even clearer still that that is so. Then I want to call attention to the appointments of the two Agents for Indian Affairs, and a map which indicates their boundaries. I am glad to have the opportunity of showing this to my friend, and giving him all the time I can for it. Then I have completed this part of the case, and can make my submission upon it

There only remain one or two very short matters, almost isolated matters, and I could dispose of one straight away. Your Lordship was interested by the fact that when one looked at the Bill of 1825 you did not find "fifty-second" inserted in the clause, whereas when you look into the Act you do find it. This is not due to the fact that it was only in the haste of Committee that somebody thought of a suitable number and put it in. It was due to a parliamentary, or at any rate a House of Commons practice, which obtained at that date, and indeed long afterwards, and in a rather different form obtains to this day. Every Bill which was introduced into the House of Commons at that period omitted in the printing of it any numeral or number. Supposing, for instance, you were providing that the penalty for a certain offence should be £5, you printed the Bill in this way : "The penalty for this offence shall be. . . pounds ". If your Lordship would care to look through that little volume which I think my learned friend, Mr. Alexander, procured, you would see in Bill after Bill there is a blank of that sort. Indeed, in principle the thing remains to-day.

Viscount FINLAY : Supposing the penalty were two years imprisonment, was it left blank ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : The number "two" was left out. And if I may say so, it is in a sense the practice to-day, because there is still a rule in the procedure of the House of Commons which provides that you shall not in Committee put to the vote anything which merely fills in a figure. It is actually one of the Standing Orders of the House.

MORNING SESSION.

Sir JOHN SIMON : My Lords, the matter which I mentioned just when the Board was rising the other day, can be verified in a moment, if I may hand to the Board a volume of Public Bills. Your Lordships will see, looking at that volume, which contains the Public Bills of 1825, that on page 177, you get the Bill of 1825 as introduced into the House of Commons. Immediately following it, in the same volume, you will find the Bill as amended in the Committee. The amendments in Committee consisted in putting into the print a whole series of numbers, but it is not by any means limited to the 52nd parallel. If your Lordships, for instance, will look at page 179 and page 180, you will see, as introduced the Bill was "within weeks," which is filled up "within three weeks," and there are instances all over the place.

Viscount HALDANE : It would not require a separate resolution if it was put in in Committee.

12 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON That is what I observed just before the Board rose the other day. I was saying that the practice was in 1825 and for many years afterwards, that a Bill as introduced into the House of Commons omitted every number, and the numbers were then put in and it was a rule of the House—this is what Lord Haldane was referring to—and it is still a rule of the House, that you do not require actually to put the Question and take a Vote for filling in the figures.

Viscount HALDANE : A Bill may be introduced in that form and then filled up in Committee.

Sir JOHN SIMON : It was, there is no doubt.

Viscount HALDANE : If it were amended, it would require a resolution.

Viscount
Haldane.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, there is no question on that. All I wanted to clear up was that it is really not correct to suppose, at any rate at that period, that the fact that the Bill as introduced contained that blank, indicates that the matter was not already deliberated upon, and, so far as the Government was concerned at any rate, determined. It is merely because it was the practice of the House ; and you will find literally hundreds of instances in that volume. Lord Finlay asked me, if, for instance, a penalty was to be imposed, whether the practice was to leave out the figure of the penalty. There are instances there ; I have had some marks put in to show them.

p. 877

Lord WARRINGTON : There is one at the end of that very page.

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : There is. Just to complete it—because it is not worth delaying on a technical point—the Standing Orders of the House of Commons to-day contain, amongst others, Standing Order 37, which is to this effect : " In going through a Bill no question shall be put for the filling up of words already printed in italics and commonly called blanks, unless exception be taken thereto, and if no alterations have been made in the words so printed in italics, the Bill shall be reported without amendments unless other amendments have been made thereto." The old practice was that you physically had a blank, with nothing to tell you what the figure should be. The more modern practice as any of us who are or have been Members of the House of Commons know, is that the Bill does in fact contain the figures, though the theory used to be that they were not there, and that is why they were printed in italics.

12 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Viscount HALDANE : The effect of it is merely the same as underlining the words in italics. They are in the Lords Bill and the Lord Chancellor puts a motion that amendments be made, the effect of which is that the words which are there underlined are put in italics and they are treated not as not there, nor yet as there, and to say that the Bill does not require amendment.

Sir JOHN SIMON : You, so to say, look through the paper and you see behind, in italics, what would be there if at that stage it ought to be there.

Viscount HALDANE : The position is a little ambiguous.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes. The curious thing is that a hundred years ago the House of Commons literally applied this rule and left an absolute blank. Nowadays both Houses in this respect follow the same general rule, that is to say, clauses or phrases which could not constitutionally or according to our practice be there to begin with, are put in italics, and it is not, in that case, until after you have got the resolution of the Committee that they are in.

Viscount FINLAY : Putting them in italics means that they are not there, but merely suggested.

Sir JOHN SIMON : That is so. I merely wanted to show what I think is now clear, that there is no ground for supposing that because in the Bill of 1825 you find a blank, that indicates that " 52 " or " 57 " was inserted per incuriam or without thought. It would all be ready, and then, of course, the practice would be to leave it out. I need not say any more about that.

p. 878

My Lords, there are just two or three matters, I am afraid, which follow on this Indian Country, and I am very anxious not to be tempted to go back on it in the remarks I am going to add this morning, when I hope to conclude. Perhaps I could just refer to the matters which do remain to be dealt with.

My Lords, in addition to the book of Parkman's, which I think Lord Finlay saw, another very interesting account, which I think may be regarded as a safe guide, is to be found in Mr. John Fortescue's well-known " History of the British Army," which is now coming out in volumes. In the third volume of the " History of the British Army," by the Hon. J. W. Fortescue, which deals with the period between 1763 and 1793 (it is a book published by Macmillan) you will find, beginning at page 11, a couple of pages which put the picture of the thing very well indeed, and I think really show the strength of my contention that the Indian Country, the scene of all these disturbances, was nowhere in the neighbourhood that we are discussing to-day. The learned author, Mr. John Fortescue, puts it in this way at the bottom of page 11. He describes how at the end of the war there was the usual agitation for economy (which is apparently a universal phenomenon) and that in the House of Commons at that time all sorts of people, Mr. Edmund Burke and others, were urging that the military establishment in America should be immediately cut down. After describing what happened and quoting Edmund Burke as speaking of the huge increase in the military establishment—there was obviously an economy campaign going on—Mr. Fortescue says this at the bottom of page 11: " Within a month of the voting of the new establishment, a sudden movement in America threw startling light on the -vexed question of Colonial Defence."

12 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Viscount FINLAY : When was this ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : This was in 1763, after the Treaty of Paris had been signed in February. The House of Commons met in the Spring and the subject of reducing the expenditure of the troops in America became very prominent. At the end of the Seven Years' War there had been what in those days was regarded as a tremendous outlay, there was a National Debt, and retrenchment was the order of the day. Mr. Fortescue says : "Within a month of the voting of the new establishment, a sudden movement in America threw startling light on the vexed question of Colonial Defence. It will be remembered that after the fall of Montreal in 1760, Major Rogers, the famous ranger, had been sent with a few troops to enforce the capitulation of the French posts on the Great Lakes and at the back of Canada. During his progress he was met by an Ottawa chief named Pontiac, who asked him what he did there, who being answered that the French had surrendered the entire country to the English, seemed to acquiesce in the new state of affairs. None the less, the whole of the Indian tribes were galled to the quick by the thought that the territory, which they claimed as their own, should have been transferred by one white nation to another, without a word of consultation with them. French traders and French adventurers who had penetrated into these remote regions, where they lived a half-savage life among the native tribes, lost no opportunity of inflaming the resentment of the Indians against the British ; while the British on their side took small pains to conciliate their new subjects. Finally Pontiac, who went near to be a man of genius, planned a great confederation of all the Indian tribes, to attack the whole of the British posts simultaneously, and to drive the hated intruders, as his ignorant followers hoped, into the sea. His emissaries flew far and wide to the various chiefs, northward to the head of Lakes Michigan and Huron, southward to the very mouth of the Mississippi, and by the spring of 1763 the weapon of offence was forged and Pontiac ready to strike. On the British side the chances of parrying such a blow were slender indeed. Amherst's force had been reduced to a mere skeleton." General Amherst was Commander-in-Chief in America and took a very light-hearted view of this trouble ; he ultimately retired from ill health. " Amherst's force had been reduced to a mere skeleton by the costly expeditions to Martinique and to Havana ; thousands of men had died and as many thousands had been rendered unserviceable by sickness. The consequence was that the posts for security of Indian territories were held with ridiculous weakness, though there was hardly one of them within distance to support another. Beginning at Niagara and following the southern shore of Lake Erie, there came in succession Forts Presquile, Le Boeuf and Sandusky ; while Fort Detroit guarded the passage to Lake Huron ; and Michillimackinac, now called by the shorter name of Mackinac, the Strait between Huron and Michigan with a small outpost, Sault St. Marie, a few miles to the northward, in the south-east corner of Lake Michigan on the Wabash, while Fort Miamis on the Maumee preserved communication between Ouatanou and Lake Erie. Finally, there was a chain of posts on the line from Pennsylvania to the Ohio, Forts Cumberland, Bedford, Ligonier and Pitt, all of them familiar to us since the days of Braddock, with Fort Venango north-wards of Fort Pitt, to secure the passage to Presquile and Niagara."

Your Lordships see, therefore, this tells you what these forts were, and, of course, Labrador is a long way off. I forbear to read the next passage, which is detail and very interesting detail. He goes on to describe how on the 7th May, 1763, Pontiac and 65 other chiefs entered Fort Detroit ; and your Lordship will observe the date, it is May, 1763 ; and you may take it that in July, 1763, the people in London were in a state of grievous anxiety; hence those documents that I was reading the other day.

That is what the Indian country is, and the meaning of the Proclamation that was issued. Then the author goes on at pages 13, 14 and 15 to describe in a great deal of detail the events of August and September. He describes how Amherst appealed to the Provinces, to the old Colonies, to produce levies for their defence. It is perhaps interesting to notice that the State of Pennsylvania refused to provide a single soldier—whether because of the convictions of its original founder or not it is a little interesting to speculate. The British soldiers from this island had to do the whole thing ; the Colonials did not help the least bit.

Then there is an account of how various people, including Colonel Bouquet, whom my friend incidentally mentioned—a most gallant and a very famous Officer—did their very best to overthrow this revolt ; and the revolt did end in 1764; but nobody can read that chapter, I think, without being impressed by the fact that the view taken that Labrador was the Indian country or a place where the Indian disturbances were, is what I venture humbly to call unhistoric and fantastic ; it has nothing to do with it.

Viscount HALDANE : What strikes me very much was their reckless and easy way of going on. They were leaving the vast territory of Labrador to be defended by an Admiral ; I think that is very extraordinary.

12 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : That is a consideration which it is very important to bear in mind. Of course, if your Lordships will consider, as a matter of fact Labrador, so far as it was not a perfectly frozen wilderness, was very effectively surrounded on every side by British organisation.

Lord Haldane was asking me the other day about these Commissions to the two Commissioners for Indian Affairs. Your Lordships remember I said there was one for what was called the Southern Area and one for the Northern Area, and if your Lordships would kindly take this additional bundle of new documents which you had the other day, you will find the necessary documents in the additional bundle are Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4 and 7.

Lord WARRINGTON : Johnson was a famous General, was he not ; he took a very active part in the Seven Years' War ?

Sir JOHN SIMON: Yes, he did. He was Sir William Johnson, Baronet, and he lived at a place called Johnson Hall, which was on the River Mohawk, which runs into the Hudson. I am not quite sure whether it is marked on the map or not.

The first of these documents is a document of the 17th February, 1756; it is therefore before the victory of Wolfe. It is the Commission to Johnson, and in it he is described as "Colonel," later on he was called "Agent and Superintendent." This is the first document in the bundle, No. 1. It is a document of 1756, and therefore before the Wolfe victory : "We, reposing especial trust and confidence in your loyalty, courage and good conduct, do by these Presents constitute and appoint you to be Colonel of our faithful

Subjects and Allies the Six United Nations of Indians and their Confederates, and you are to observe and follow such orders and directions from time to time, as you shall receive from our Commander-in-Chief of our Forces in North America now and for the time being or any other your Superior Officer according to the rules and discipline of War." Then he gets a salary. Then at the bottom of the page your Lordships will see in the last three or four lines the corresponding appointment, which was a month or two later, of Edmund Atkin. He was appointed to be " Our Agent for the Superintendent of the Affairs of our faithful Allies the several Nations of Indians inhabiting the Frontiers of our Colonies of Virginia, North and South Carolina and Georgia." That is the southern one. On the next page, Document No. 2, which is the day before the Commission to Mr. Atkin, you see the recommendation by the Lords of Trade, Lord Halifax and others, to the Secretary of State, addressed to Henry Fox : " Sir, It appearing to us to be of great importance in the present conjuncture That a proper person should be appointed by His Majesty to manage and conduct the Affairs of the several Nations of Indians upon the Frontiers of His Majesty's Colonies of Virginia, North and South Carolina and Georgia, by which means his Majesty's interests among the said Nations may be better cultivated and improved, and the said Indians be engaged to join His Majesty's troops in such operations as may be undertaken for the defence and security of His Majesty's Colonies against the common enemy. We beg leave to desire you will move His Majesty that Edmund Atkin, Esq., may be appointed Agent and Superintendent." That is why on the following day Atkin was appointed.

Now that gives you the two Indian Areas, one the Southern Area, which as you see is the Colonies of Virginia, North and South Carolina and Georgia (I will give you the map in a moment which shows where they are), and the other, which is called the Northern Area, which for the moment is only traceable as being the area of the Six United Nations of Indians and their Confederates.

Viscount HALDANE : He is called " Agent and Superintendent."

Sir. JOHN SIMON : At first Sir William Johnson was called " Colonel," but very shortly afterwards he was called " Agent and Superintendent."

Viscount HALDANE : He was a Colonel in the Army, seconded possibly to that position.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord.

Viscount HALDANE : He was primarily an army officer ?

Sir John SIMON : He was undoubtedly. Now will your Lordships just take the third document. Document No. 3 is a document of March, 1761. It really merely illustrates a familiar constitutional fact, that upon the demise of the Crown, it was necessary to appoint people over again, as it was until recent Statutes modified that general rule. George II has died, and so the Lords of Trade are saying this : "Sir William Johnson, baronet, having been appointed by His late Majesty to be Agent for the Affairs of the Six United Nations of Indians and their Confederates in the Northern Parts of America, and appearing to us to be well qualified for that station, We desire you will be pleased to move His Majesty that the said Sir William Johnson may be continued in the said Office by His Majesty's Royal Appointment."

p. 882

Consequently, on the next page, Document No. 4, you get the fresh Commission signed W. Pitt : " George the Third, etc., To Our trusted and well beloved William Johnson, Bart., Greeting. We, reposing especial trust and confidence in your loyalty fidelity and ability, do by these Presents constitute and appoint you to be our sole Agent for and Superintendent of the Affairs of our faithful Subjects and Allies the Six United Nations of Indians and their Confederates in the Northern Parts of North America."

Viscount HALDANE : You observe the Commission is not to the Commander-in-Chief.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord, and that enables me to answer a question which my learned friend, Mr. Macmillan, asked me when the Board last sat. I refer to the fact that there seems at any rate at the time to have been a suggestion that the Commander-in-Chief in North America might take this matter under his control. My friend asked whether there was any Commission, as suggested, to show it. We have checked that. There was a Commission to the Commander-in-Chief in 1759, the ordinary military Commission ; there was another one in 1761, and then when General Amherst withdrew, General Gage took his place in 1764. But in none of these three cases was the scheme carried out which had been suggested of giving to the Commander-in-Chief this special duty.

12 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Viscount HALDANE : They took an Officer in the Army.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord. Then I would like your Lordships to turn to Document No. 7 of this bundle, which is the Commission to John Stuart. John Stuart succeeded Edmund Atkin, in the southern area. This Commission is dated 5th January, 17 62. " We reposing special trust and confidence in your loyalty, fidelity and ability do by these presents constitute and appoint you to be our agent for and superintendent of the Affairs of our faithful allies, the several nations of Indians inhabiting the frontiers of our Colonies of Virginia, North and South Carolina and Georgia."

Lord WARRINGTON: The first man has the Iroquois, the Six Nations, and the other man has the other tribes.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes. Your Lordships will remember that in Mitchell's map, which is the British Museum map of 1755, you find in very big letters " Six Nations or Iroquois." It is over the area to the east of the Mississippi to the south, running up to the Great Lakes, and then on its eastern side coming to the hinterland of t he Ancient Colonies. So that for the moment it is pretty plain the sort of areas that are being dealt with. But it does not stop there. It was thought desirable as a matter of public policy to try and get the same definite understanding with the Indians in question. The gentleman who has helped me so much, Mr. Hardy, who is so familiar with the Record Office, has actually got here in the building a specimen of the treaties made with the Indians. It is a most remarkable document in which their signatures or attestations took the form of totems.

If your Lordships will now turn to the rather long document, No. 19, you will see that the Lords of Trade had a specific recommendation to make about this. I am afraid I must trouble the Board to read several portions of this document. It is a most remarkable document. It is dated 7th March, 1768.

In order to save your Lordships' time, perhaps I might indicate the passages which are material ; it would take a very long time to read it all. Taking document No. 19 would your Lordships please notice the paragraph about the middle of the first page : "Whereupon we humbly beg leave to represent to your Majesty, That the subject matter to which these papers refer, and the Questions arising thereupon, stated to us in the Earl of Shelburne's letter, appear to us to lead to a consideration of no less consequence and importance, than what system it may be now proper for your Majesty to pursue with respect to that vast and extensive country in North America which on account of the Indian War raging within it was made by the Proclamation of the 7th of October, 1763, the object of mere provisional arrangements."

12 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Viscount HALDANE : This is in 1768.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord. This is reviewing it at a later date, but the document contains passages which I think are useful to read. It is an identification of the area dealt with in the Proclamation of the 7th October, 1763, as being the area within which the Indian war was raging. I am going to come to quite a precise map, but I think that is a fair comment to make first of all. At the very bottom of the same page your Lordships will catch this phrase : “and, although the unfavourable impressions left upon the minds of the Indians by the event of the War, and the representations of the French that we meant to extirpate them, did for some time involve us in a war with them, that rendered necessary the continuance of a large military establishment, yet, that war being happily ended, and Treaties of Peace and Friendship, to which all the various Tribes have acceded”—it was quite a definite thing— “having been finally concluded, it is now become of immediate importance to examine, how far the alteration which has thus taken place in the State of your Majesty's Dominion in North America, may require or admit of any proportional alteration in the system by which that part of your Majesty's Service is to be carried on for the future.” Then they say : “The parts of the Service to which we are more immediately called upon by the Earl of Shelburne's letter to give our attention, are, First, the present civil establishments regarding the Indians ; Secondly, the disposition of the troops for Indian purposes ; and lastly the establish- ment of certain new Colonies.” That last branch is an interesting piece of history. There were people at home who thought the best way to deal with this subject at the end of the Indian war was to plant new plantations and colonies in the interior, like the states in the Middle West, for example. It was a policy which was rejected, but it was a view.

On that same page there is a reference to the Superintendents of Indian Affairs just above the middle of the page. “In considering this question it may be proper to observe that the institution of Superintendents for the Affairs of Indians appears to have been a measure originally adopted principally with a view to counteract the designs of the French in 1754”—and so on. I do not think there is anything else on that page which is of importance.

Then on page 3 they say : “To maintain a good correspondence with the Indians is undoubtedly an object of great importance ; and upon a careful examination into the state of Indian affairs after the conclusion of Peace, it appears that the two principal causes of the discontent that still rankled in the minds of the Indians and influenced their conduct, were the encroachments made upon lands which they claimed as their property”—there can be no doubt at all that that is penetration from the Ancient Colonies— “and the abuses committed by Indian Traders and their servants. The necessity, which appeared in the then state of our interests with the Indians of making some immediate provision against these two causes of their discontent induced the Proclamation of October 1763”—that is the Proclamation in Volume I, page 153.

Viscount FINLAY : " Indian Traders and their servants " means persons trading with the Indians ?

Sir JOHN SIMON: I think so. It is just like one says " an East Indian Merchant." One does not mean by that a merchant with a coloured skin, but a man who deals with the East Indies. This is really an exposition of the true meaning of the Proclamation, and it is from the very same persons who recommended the Proclamation. It was induced by these causes. " The necessity, which appeared in the then state of our interests with the Indians of making some immediate provision against these two causes of their discontent induced the Proclamation of October, 1763, which very prudently restrained all persons from trading with the Indians without licence, and forbad, by the strongest prohibitions, all settlement beyond the limits therein described as the Boundary of the Indian hunting ground"—I have already called your Lordships' attention to the fact that the document had given a boundary --" putting both their commerce and property under the protection of officers acting under your Majesty's immediate authority and making their intervention necessary in every transaction with those Indians."

Then I leave out the short paragraph in the middle of the page, and come to this passage : " The giving all possible redress to the complaints of the Indians in respect to encroachments of their lands and a steady and uniform attention to a faithful execution of whatever shall be agreed upon for that salutary purpose"—this document is inspired by the notion of standing by your contract which you have made with the Indian tribes—" is a consideration of very great importance." Then at the bottom of the page there is a reference which I shall have to fill up. "In a plan for the management of Indians affairs prepared by this Board in 1764 the fixing a boundary between the settlements of your Majesty's subjects and the Indian country was proposed to be established by compact with the Indians as essentially necessary to the gaining their good will and affection, and to preserving the tranquility of the colonies." I will refer to that in a moment, if I may. " This plan having been communicated to the superintendents"—that is to say, Sir William Johnson and the southern superintendent—" they have in consequence thereof, made the proposition of such a boundary line an object of their particular attention and of negotiation and discussion with the several tribes of Indians interested therein. In the southern district a boundary line has not only been established by actual treaties with the Creeks, Cherokees and Chactaws, but has also as far as relates to the provinces of North and South Carolina, been marked out by actual surveys and has had the happy effect to restore peace and quiet to these colonies. In the Northern district, the proposition appears to have been received by the Indians with the strongest marks of approbation and satisfaction ; and a line of separation was in 1765 suggested by them, in which Sir William Johnson acquiesced, declaring at the same time that he would not finally ratify it without your Majesty's further directions." A very remarkable passage follows which makes the thing really quite plain. " The Paper (Appendix A) contains a description of the several lines as agreed upon in the negotiations to which we refer ; and to the end, your Majesty may have a more perfect view of them, we have annexed to such description a map (Appendix B) in which we have endeavoured to trace those lines out, with as much accuracy as the general maps of America will admit of." Bound up with this, in the Record Office, is the map. I hand to your Lordships copies of the map. This is the whole map ; it is not an extract, but the whole thing. The first thing that strikes one about the map is this. As this is the whole map it was thought necessary to draw for this purpose, where is Labrador ? The answer is that Labrador is off the map altogether.

[1927lab]

Lord WARRINGTON : There is the boundary shown that goes through Quebec.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Oh yes, my Lord. There is a bit of Quebec, but where is Labrador ? If this part of the world had anything to do with my green area, you would expect to find it included in this map. But it by no means stops there. They trace the line. Reading at the middle of page 4, we have this : “Your Majesty will be pleased to observe that, although on the one hand the settlements in the new established Colonies to the South are confined to very narrow limits”—would your Lordships notice how the yellow line, and to some extent the brown line which runs round some distance from the sea in West Florida and East Florida, leaves a comparatively narrow strip ; they are reserving to the Indians whatever is inside the line ; so that in Florida apparently what is left for settlement is a comparatively narrow strip. Then they go on and say, observing that, “yet, on the other hand, the middle colonies (whose state of population requires a greater extent) have room to spread much beyond what they have hitherto been allowed.” That means he has now drawn this dotted line rather behind the height of land. The red line and the light blue line are really cutting back into the interior to some extent. This is all the result of treaties made with different tribes of Indians, which are executed by the Indian chiefs.

p. 886

Viscount HALDANE : Not necessarily with the whole of the Indians.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Oh, no. Only one at a time. You cannot treat Indian tribes as though they were settled upon a given spot of earth, in the sense in which a modern civilised community of Europe may have settled.

12 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Viscount HALDANE : We know there were numbers away to the north-west.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Oh certainly. I hope your Lordship does not think I am stressing this too much, but it seems to me so important that we should appreciate what the Proclamation of 1763 may fairly deal with. Then he goes on to say : “and that upon the whole one uniform and complete line will be formed between the Indians and those antient colonies, whose limits not being confined to the westward have occasioned that extensive settlement, which, being made without the consent of the Indians and before any line was settled, produced the evil complained of.” Your Lordships remember George Washington's letter which I read the other day. “In comparing the map with the description in writing as taken from the Treaties with the Indians, your Majesty will observe that the boundary line with the six Nations and their allies is made upon the map to terminate at that part of the Ohio where it receives the Connahway River, instead of continuing it down the Ohio to the Cherokee River, and up that river to its source, as described in the Treaty,"—the Treaty is the Treaty with the Six Nations— "the reason for which is, that although the six Nations may have pretensions to the dominion of the country on the south side of the Ohio lower down than the Connahway River ; yet in fact it is more occupied by the Cherokees and other independent tribes, as their hunting ground and, therefore, the making any settlements beyond the Connahway River, or at least beyond a line drawn from the mouth of it to where the Cherokee line now terminates, as marked on the map, would be altogether inconsistent with what has been settled and agreed upon with that nation ; for which reason we think that the line settled with the Southern Indians, and that which remains to be settled with the six Nations ought to be united in the manner we have described."

Then they say : "Upon the whole it does appear to us, that it will be greatly for your Majesty's interest as well as for the peace, security and advantage of the colonies, that this boundary line should, as speedily as possible, be ratified by your Majesty's authority, and that the superintendents should be instructed and impowered to make treaties in your Majesty's name with the Indians for that purpose." And at the bottom of the same page your Lordships will catch the phrase : " all transactions in the Indian country." At the time it was a phrase with a connotation.

On page 6 they are making some observations, and one of the observations marked " Secondly " is worth reading. " Secondly, that the confining trade to certain posts and places, which is the spirit and principle of the present system, however expedient and effectual with respect to the Southern Indians, is of doubtful policy with respect to those Indians more particularly connected with New York and Pennsylvania "—that is what they really meant by the northern area—" and that it is evidently disadvantageous, inconvenient, and even dangerous with respect to the much larger body of Indians, who possess the country to the westward," — there were an immense number of them—" and with whom your Majesty's subjects in Quebec in particular do carry on so extensive a commerce."

Then on the next page, page 7, in the middle of the page, there is what I think is a very striking passage, because it is a passage which has nothing to do with the Montagnais, or Nascopies, or Esquimaux. This is what they say : " With respect to the question, How far the present expence, regarding the disposition of troops for Indian purposes, may with propriety and safety be lessened by reducing most of the posts now subsisting and entrusting others of them to the provinces them-selves, we beg leave in the first place in general to represent it to your Majesty as our humble opinion, that it will be in the highest degree expedient to reduce all such posts in the interior country "—your Lord-ships will find the phrase interior country " is quite frequently used as an alternative for the phrase " the Indian country " as are not immediately subservient to the protection of the Indian commerce, and to the defeating of French and Spanish machinations among the Indians, or which, although in some degree useful for these purposes, cannot be maintained, but at an expense disproportioned to the degree of their utility. But before we apply this observation to the particular posts now subsisting, it may be proper to take a cursory view of the interests and situations of the several tribes or bodies of Indians, whose commerce and connection are the objects of whatever establishments it may be thought necessary to continue."

12 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Without wearying your Lordships with reading it all, you may take it—though your Lordships will, of course, check it if you wish—

p. 888

that there was nothing whatever about the Montagnais or Nascopies or Esquimaux. This is all a different part of America. You get the thing at a point on page 8, in the third paragraph : " In the Northern district the principal Indians form themselves into two great confederacies ; the one composed of the Six Nations and their Allies and Dependents, the other, called the Western Confederacy, composed of a great variety of powerful tribes, occupying that extensive country, which lies about the Lakes Huron, Michigan and Superior, and to the West and North West." There you have the identification. "The commerce and connection with the first of these bodies of Indians"—that is to say, the Six Nations and so on— "was antecedent to the War, confined chiefly to the province of New York, upon the frontiers of which their principal hunting ground lyes; and the trade was carried on at fortified Truck houses upon the Lake Ontario ; since the Peace a large share of this trade is carried on from Pennsylvania by the Channel of the Ohio, and from thence by Venango and Riviere aux Boeufs into Lake Erie. The commerce and connection with those Indians which form the Western confederacy"—that is the other half of the northern area—"were, both from the situation of the country they occupied, and from the plan pursued by France for securing the dominion of it by posts upon the lakes, altogether. confined to the French in Canada, and is now principally carried on from thence by your Majesty's subjects there, through the Channel of the Ottawa River and by the Lakes. In this state, therefore, of the commerce and connection subsisting between your Majesty's subjects and the Indians in the Northern district and of the channels through which the intercourse is carried on, it does appear to us, that the keeping up military establishments at Detroit, Michilimacinac and Niagara, and the having two, or at most three armed vessels on the Lakes Erie, Huron, Michigan and Superior may be necessary for keeping up and preserving that good correspondence with the Indians, which is essential to the safety, improvement and extension of the trade with them. Of these three establishments that at Detroit, which is the great centre of Indian commerce, situated amongst many numerous tribes of Indians, and where a considerable number of French remain under the Faith of the Treaty of Paris, does appear to us to be by far the most important object.”

Sir John Simon.

Then at the bottom of page 9 they discuss the question as to whether it would be a good plan to establish new colonies in the interior parts of America—which was one proposal at the time—and they recommend against it. On page 10 you will find they are discussing, about the second paragraph, the position of forming inland colonies in America. Then at the bottom of page 10 there is a useful passage as showing how “interior country” is constantly used as the analogue of “Indian country”. You will find this passage : “The same motives, though operating in a less degree, and applying to fewer objects, did, as we humbly conceive, induce the forming the colonies of Georgia, East Florida, and West Florida to the South ; and the making those provisional arrangements in the Proclamation of 1763, by which the interior country was left to the possession of the Indians.” They argue, therefore, against that.

I had also picked out a passage on page 12, the third paragraph, which is as follows : " Such, may it please your Majesty, is the present state of the progress making in the settlement of the northern parts of the sea coast of North America in consequence of what appears to have been the policy adopted by this Kingdom." They mean by " the northern parts of the sea coast of North America " the sea coast of Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, and so on, and perhaps even further south than that.

That is the end of it. It is a very long document, but I think it is a most instructive one.

Viscount Finlay.

Viscount HALDANE : I see on page 12, there is a statement as to commercial policy. " The encouraging settlements upon the sea coast of North America is founded in the true principles of Commercial Policy." It shows their attention was called to that.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Your Lordship is right. They are arguing against the idea of internal colonies. It was a very hot dispute, and they give a series of reasons which are very interesting to anyone interested in public affairs to-day. They are arguing, for example, that you will get an area which will consume British manufactures, which after all was one of the eighteenth century objects, if you have colonies on the coast ; but if you plant these people right in the interior, where will Birmingham sell its products ?

Viscount HALDANE : There is another reason, and that is that the garrison in the interior cannot be relieved. In fact there were certain troops kept for very many years in Canada. They were there so that they might be useful in case of war about the frontier line.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Of course, your Lordship knows all about this so very well through the public duty you have discharged. Your Lordship no doubt remembers that the 60th Rifles, a very famous and gallant regiment, were originally called the Royal American Regiment.

Viscount HALDANE : They were somewhere in the west of Canada. When did they come back ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : I am afraid, though I have done my best to study some American history for the purpose, I have not carried it up to quite the time of your Lordship's personal recollection.

Viscount FINLAY : What is the history of the line indicated here, partly a red dotted line, and partly uncoloured ? It runs down some distance from the Atlantic and goes down to Florida.

Sir JOHN SIMON : That is what is referred to in the passage from

[1927lab]

Sir John Simon.

the long document, where you will find, about the middle of page 4, this paragraph : "The Paper (Appendix A) contains a description of the several lines as agreed upon in the negotiations to which we refer ; and to the end, your Majesty may have a more perfect view of them, we have annexed to such description a map (Appendix B) in which we have endeavoured to trace those lines out, with as much accuracy as the general maps of America will admit of." Then following it comes a very important passage, in which the Lords of Trade are saying, to this effect : " If you examine the map, you will notice that this yellow line round by Florida only leaves a comparatively narrow band for British settlement." It cuts very deep, you will see. y But as you pass northerly, when you pass from the yellow to the blue or pink, " You will find," they say, " we have given more elbow room. The middle colonies will be able to push out into the interior, and have a bigger boundary than before."

Viscount FINLAY : By the " middle colonies " I think they mean Carolina ?

12 Nov., 1926.
Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : They mean North Carolina, South Carolina, and Virginia. The map, your Lordship sees, traces this boundary. Your Lordship will have noticed that the boundary does not quite end so as to cut off an area. It ends at a place called Owege. That was subsequently settled in a document which follows in a moment, principally owing to the efforts of Sir William Johnson at Johnson Hall, where he negotiated with the Indians and made a bargain which carried on the boundary—I have had it traced in detail—to Fort Stanwix.

Viscount FINLAY : Where is that ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : It is not marked. Does your Lordship see where " Mohawk River " is written, which runs into the Hudson just to the east of Lake Ontario. Fort Stanwix, your Lordship will take it, is close by the letter " M" in " Mohawk." Johnson Hall, which is the place where Sir William Johnson lived, and where he met these Indians and negotiated with them, is also on the River Mohawk. You may take it as practically being just at the end of the word " Mohawk." There was a subsequent negotiation which just rounded off that corner.

Your Lordships will remember that in this long document I have read, there was at the bottom of page 3 a reference to a plan for the management of Indian affairs, and I promised to give the reference. The reference is in Volume II, page 840.

This is what they referred to as " A plan for the management of Indian affairs prepared by this Board in 1764."

Lord WARRINGTON : The long document was 1768.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes. They are referring to something which had already happened. They say in the plan prepared three years ago various things happened. We have here the plan. In Volume II, on page 840, is a plan which is enclosed in the instructions which were sent to Sir Guy Carleton. Will your Lordship turn back to page 820 ; I think it is convenient to begin at that page. Will you observe the date ? The date is the 3rd January, 1775. The Quebec Act of 1774 had just become law. The boundaries of the Province of Quebec had by that Act, as your Lordship knows, been extended from our original slate coloured lozenge, which is on the map over there, so that it included the whole of the yellow as well as taking in the green and the pink. There being this immensely extended area, Sir Guy Carleton has been given new instructions. I will put it in this way. I am really adopting an observation of Lord Haldane. Sir Guy Carleton, who, down to that moment had been what you might call Governor of Lower Canada, was now, whilst still remaining Governor of Quebec, becoming Governor of Upper Canada.

p. 891

Viscount HALDANE : Right to the west.

12 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : It is important to remember that, because you will find in the instructions sent to Sir Guy Carleton, in 1775, the expressions "the interior country" or "the Indian country," or "the upper country" are used indiscriminately. When they talk about these things they are not talking about the things nearer the Atlantic, but things back the other way. If your Lordship takes page 820, I will pick out three or four instances which show it at once. At line 20, on the page there is an extract from the Canadian Archives : " The Board of Trade submitted to the King the draught of a new Commission for Governor Carleton with such formal changes only, as compared with the last, as were required by the terms of the Quebec Act. On December 22nd "—that is only about ten days before the thing was —ssued—" the Board of Trade laid before the King the draught of the General Instructions for Governor Carleton. " This draught" they say " contains not only such instructions as are usually given to other governors, so far as the same are applicable to this Province under its New Constitution of Government ; but also such other directions for the establishment of Judicature ; the reform and regulation of Ecclesiastical matters ; and the arrangements proper to be made " in respect of two areas, in respect of one, ' the Coast of Labrador,' and two, ' the interior country.' " Your Lordship remembers the passage from Lord North's speech in the House of Commons when he introduced the Quebec Bill in which he said, " some Honourable Members have criticised tin Government because they are making Quebec so big," and he said : "We are adding two new countries."

Viscount HALDANE : The interior country was not the interior of Labrador.

p. 892

Sir JOHN SIMON : He says two new countries, one of them being the Coast of Labrador, which he calls one of two countries, and the other the interior country. It is something which is now the United States of America.

Viscount HALDANE : A great deal.

Sir JOHN SIMON : It makes up to-day something like five and a half of the States of the Union, if you look at a modern map.

Viscount HALDANE : Did Sir Guy Carleton himself become Lord Dorchester, or his son ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : He himself became Lord Dorchester. My impression was that Graves ultimately become a peer, and I was right : he finished up by being an Irish peer.

Viscount HALDANE : Lord Dorchester was not Lord Dorchester of Dorset, but he was Lord Dorchester of Dorchester, Oxon, which afterwards became famous ecclesiastically.

12 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : My learned friend says in 1786 Sir Guy Carleton became Lord Dorchester. If we look at these instructions we have to remember that a man who, down to that moment, had been the Governor administering what might be called Lower Canada, is now getting this immense extension of upper country.

Viscount HALDANE : And away to the south.

Sir JOHN SIMON : And away to the south. I will not trouble about intermediate matters, but will your Lordships turn on to page 832, with that in mind, and see what is the nature of the language used in the instructions to Sir Guy Carleton as soon as Quebec is extended in this way. It is at line 30, at the bottom of the page. "The extension of the limits of the Province of Quebec necessarily calls forth your Attention to a Variety of new Matter and new Objects of Consideration ;

The protection and control of the various Settlements of Canadian Subjects, and the regulation of the Peltry Trade"—observe the language "in the upper or interior country," on the one hand ; that is one of the two ; "upper or interior" are rather striking words— "and the protection of the Fisheries in the Gulph of St. Lawrence, and on the Labrador Coast on the other hand, point to Regulations that require deliberation and despatch."

Viscount HALDANE : This took in a good bit of what afterwards became the Northwest territory.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I think my map there puts it quite fairly. Your Lordship will see what I mean. If you take the different colours I here it is right; the slate colour was the old Province of Quebec in 1763

p. 893

(what I have called inaccurately a lozenge) ; the yellow is the very large extent to the west and south which was involved in the new boundaries. As we know at the same time there was "and also the Coast of Labrador" ; and the question for your Lordships will be whether that did not in the circumstances really mean the green and the pink. At any rate, there is no doubt as to what he means by the upper or interior country, because "upper" means "go up the St. Lawrence" ; it is Upper Canada. I was going to read No. 31 again.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : This has all been read.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I am not stare that the point was made when my learned friend read it. I do not think the point was clearly made ; I did not hear it ; that each one of these posts that is here referred to is right up in the interior country. In the same way—without delaying you —No. 32 deals with the peltry trade of the interior country, and at line 25 speaks of "are fully stated in a plan proposed by our Commissioners." I do not think your Lordship's attention has been called to the plan. The plan is on page 840: " That the Trade and Commerce with the several tribes of Indians in North America under the protection of His Majesty shall be free and open to all His Majesty's subjects, under the several Regulations and Restrictions hereafter mentioned, so as not to interfere with the Charter to the Hudson's Bay Company. That for the better Regulation of this Trade, and the Management of Indian Affairs in general, the British Dominions in North America be divided into two Districts, to comprehend and include the several Tribes of Indians mentioned in the annexed Lists A and B." Then : " That no Trade be allowed with the Indians in the southern District, but within the Towns belonging to the several Trades included in such District ; and that in the Northern District the Trade be fixed at so Many Posts, and in such Situations,

12 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

as shall be thought necessary." 4 and 5 may not matter. No. 6 : " That the Agent or Superintendent for the Northern District shall be allowed three Deputies," and so on ; " the agent and superintendent for the Southern district two deputies." No. 7 is rather interesting : " That there shall be a Commissary, Interpreter, and Smith "—the Smith, I rather fancy is the armourer, perhaps the gentleman who sharpened the arrows —" appointed by His Majesty to reside in the Country of each Tribe in the Southern District and at each Post in the Northern District."

The LORD CHANCELLOR : He might have been for the horses.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I thought of that, my Lord, but I am not quite sure that the natives had any horses. It is obvious that they would want some assistance of a mechanical kind for sharpening all sorts of tools. On page 845 you get paragraph 42 : "That proper Measures be taken, with the Consent and Concurrence of the Indians, to ascertain and define the precise and exact Boundary and Limits of the Lands, which it may be proper to reserve to them, and where no Settlement whatever shall be allowed." That is the thing that was being done so elaborately three years afterwards by this map. That fits the whole thing together. Then, my Lord, on the last page, 846, you get the list of Indian Tribes in the northern and then in the southern districts. The first six under List A are what were sometimes called the Iroquois, the Mohocks, and so on. The rest, my Lord, are what we call the western confederacy. The southern district contains those people who are mentioned more elaborately in the report I have referred to, document No. 19 in my new documents, and your Lordship notices that there are no Esquimaux, Naskopis and Montagnais at all.

p. 894

Lord WARRINGTON : Algonquins are mentioned.

Sir JOHN SIMON : They are certainly mentioned. If your Lordship would like to see what is presumably meant I will take a much later document which has the advantage that it comes from Canadian official sources and is in Volume VIII at page 3731. This is much later, but apparently some census of a general sort was taken, surveying the whole North American continent in 1870. Your Lordship has only been given a small extract. My learned friends have provided us with the map, and when I look at the map I can see what the Algonquins are supposed to be ; they are No. 11.

Viscount HALDANE : It is marked " Census of 1881 " at the bottom of page 3731.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Has your Lordship the map ?

Viscount HALDANE : I have the census, and I have the map in front of me.

Sir JOHN SIMON : If your Lordship would kindly look at the bottom right-hand corner you will see it says : " Accompanies Census of Canada, 1870-71."

Viscount HALDANE : It may be that the census took a long time to make.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : On page 3729 it is headed " Census 1871."

Sir JOHN SIMON : I am not for a moment so much on the date ; I am merely asking your Lordships to observe what at any rate on this map is regarded as the area of the Algonquins. Though it may be perfectly true that as a matter of racial origin or similarity you may regard them as cousins or illustrations of some more widely spread stock (I dare say it is so), the question is whether it is reasonable to suggest that in the list attached to the plan which I have just read the Algonquins are to be regarded as sweeping in every member of the aborigines in the Labrador Peninsula.

[1927lab]

Viscount HALDANE : What do the red lines represent ?

12 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : They are intended to represent boundaries between the different tribes.

Lord Sumner.

Viscount HALDANE : I see the Esquimaux begin at the side of Hudson's Bay. I do not know whether that is the height of land.

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : No. The Esquimaux would be spread over the northern portion of Labrador.

Viscount Finlay.

Viscount HALDANE : That is the northern portion of Labrador ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord. In the middle bit there are people marked Naskopis ; then there are Montagnais. All I am saying is that you will observe those are treated as quite distinct from the tribe called the Algonquins, whom you will find numbered 11.

12 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Viscount HALDANE : I think it is quite likely that there are different Indian tribes there.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I do not doubt that for a moment. I should have expected at any rate at an early stage in the history of the North American continent you would have found Aborigines of some sort all over it. It is nothing to do with any case that I am contending for, to suggest the contrary. I am saying that it is all very well to state the Algonquins race is a race that is spread all over Labrador ; that is a question for science.

Lord SUMNER : I do not think " Algonquins " is the name of a Lord Sumner. tribe at all ; it is the name of a great family of tribes spreading very widely over North America. It is like the Bantu Race in South Africa.

Sir JOHN SIMON : It does not seem very likely when we have these Sir John Simon. lines here. Knowing what we know (possibly I have been too elaborate about it) was the area which was dealt with as being the area of the Northern Commissioner, with lines drawn and all the rest of it, I respect-fully suggest that there is no ground for saying that the Algouquins in this particular connection are intended to sweep in every man in Labrador, which in any event would have to be read with the qualification——

Viscount FINLAY : You observe the line drawn below Esquimaux Viscount Finlay. is printed three times, and it confines the Esquimaux to the proximity of the northern portion.

p. 896

Sir JOHN SIMON : I do, my Lord. I will not delay longer on that. The only other thing which seems to me to matter on this subject—and I will then pass from it, I hope, altogether—is this. If your Lordships will look at my document No. 17 in the new documents, you will see there that consideration is being given to an application by Sir William Johnson for a grant of land, and this is the way, in 1767, that that is dealt with by the Lords of Trade. I want your Lordships to observe the contrast between what happens when Sir William Johnson wants a piece of land in an area which is the Indian country, and what happens when people want a piece of land in what is undoubtedly Labrador. The method adopted is decidedly different. When Johnson applies, the Lords of Committee say they have "taken into consideration the memorial of Sir William Johnson, superintendent of Indian Affairs for the northern district of North America, praying amongst other particulars for a grant of a certain tract of land on the north side of the Mohawk River conceded to him by the Indians of that nation ; and the said report not containing information sufficient to enable the Committee to give any opinion to His Majesty with respect to granting the said lands, their Lordships are hereby pleased to refer the said report back to the Lords Commissioners for Trade and Plantations, in order for them to report their opinion to this Committee upon the authenticity of the said grant made to Sir William Johnson, and to ascertain in the best manner they are able the situation of the land granted, and whether any and what part of the said lands so granted to Sir William Johnson lie within the land reserved to the Indians for hunting ground by the proclamation of the 7th October, 1763." Observe, my Lord, the contrast between that, which is the way in which Sir William Johnson's application is dealt with for what is undoubtedly Indian country, and the way in which the Moravians are dealt with. I will not trouble your Lordships to go back to it. Your Lordship remembers the matter ; it is in Volume III round about page 1321. No such question arises at all. I will give your Lordship a second example. There was a representation to the Lords of Trade asking for mineral rights near Lake Superior. I have the. document here. It is the only additional one that I hope I am going to inflict upon anybody. It is in 1768, which is almost exactly the same time when Agnew was making a similar application for mineral rights in Labrador. This is the way it is dealt with ; and look at the contrast : "Representation of the Lords of Trade to His 12 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Majesty re grant of mines in country adjacent to Lake Superior." Apparently there had been this application in 1768, and the report is : "that copper is an article of great importance in the manufactures and commerce of this Kingdom and as there is great reason to believe from the Reports made of the Country described in the Petition, that it does abound with Mines of Copper Ore of a very rich and valuable quality, we are of the opinion that it will be very advisable to give all reasonable encouragement to the Discovery and Working of such Mines to persons of Substance and Ability under such Restrictions and Regulations as shall be judged expedient for your Majesty's Interest and Advantage ; But as the system adopted by Your 12 Nov. 1926. Majesty's Proclamation of the 7th October, 1763, does pre-clude all Establishment in the interior country adjacent Sir John Simon. to the Great Lakes, and as your Majesty's Interests in that Country do appear, from the Representations given of the present Temper and Disposition of the Indians, to be in a precarious State," and so on. They say full inquiry shall be made. Will you contrast with that the way in which Agnew was dealt with ? I will not trouble to turn to it ; Agnew is in Volume III, page 1080.

Lord SUMNER : Did they ultimately refuse these copper mines ?

Sir. JOHN SIMON : I have not been able to find out that.

Lord SUMNER : They are there now of incalculable value ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : It just shows how very far back it was appreciated. I think there are precious metals as well. Agnew's is an interesting case, because it is almost at exactly the same time, and the application comes before the same people in Volume III, at page 1080. When the application of Agnew comes, the Lords of Trade never say : We must be careful because we may be invading the interior or Indian country. Here in 1773 is the recommendation that Agnew is to have not exceeding 60 miles depth of area in Labrador for the purposes of minerals. Those seem to me to be illustrations, and I must not expand the argument further on this general proposition.

12 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Viscount Finlay.

Viscount HALDANE : Where is the description of the area ?

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : In this representation just where the two words " does preclude " are written in ; " as the system adopted." I am merely contrasting the different way in which the same body at the same time deals with corresponding applications, in the one case which would involve penetrating into Labrador, and in the other case would involve penetrating into what is undoubtedly Indian country.

Viscount HALDANE : And it is done, not by the Governor General, but by the Sovereign.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Never in either case is it done by the Governor of his own right ; always is it done otherwise. That question was asked by one of your Lordships the other day, and I have checked it so far as Newfoundland is concerned. I will give your Lordship one reference in a moment. You may take it that it was about 1825 when you got, in the case of the Governor of Newfoundland, an authority by which he could make grants of land within his jurisdiction ; not limited to the island, but within his jurisdiction.

To sum up, my point is this : I say that if you take the documents which are in Volumes II and III and ask yourself what is meant by the

p. 898

Indian country, you will find, if you fit them together, that that Indian country is a defined area which is not regarded as including anything that is immediately in dispute here, but on the contrary is described and defined as bounded and enclosed within limits which make it this interior country.

Viscount FINLAY : The defined limits are not very exactly traced, but as to the general situation of the Indian country there dealt with there can be, I should think, no doubt.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I do not want to go back, because one tends to go over the same ground, but if your Lordships will forgive me, I have called attention to passages which define the boundaries in most express terms. The passage, which I should regard as most obviously doing that, is the one which your Lordship will remember very well in Volume III. I am conscious that we have had this, but I am merely answering your Lordship's question. The most obvious extract is page 919 at line 8. This is a passage which has become very much trampled over, but there are heaps of instances, and this is as good a one as any. The first sentence on page 919 is a perfectly definite description. Anyone who looks at the map can see it. It is "that large tract of country bounded by the Mississippi and the limits of the Hudson's Bay Company on the one hand, and on the other by the limits of Canada" — that is the lozenge—" East and West Florida, and His Majesty's ancient Colonies." Subject to what I have always conceded, the question about what I call the corridor, that little strip of yellow that runs up between the line on the northern boundary of my old Province of Quebec and the Hudson's Bay territory, there is no doubt at all that that is defining an area by boundaries. There are many other instances. The other instances are these, my Lord, if I may just repeat them in case anybody hereafter cares to look at the note. The Indian country was a defined area within definite boundaries, and that follows from these passages taken together : Volume III, page 919, line 7 ; Volume III, page 920, line 44 ; Volume III, page 923, line 20 ; Volume II, page 820—that is the passage about Carleton and the interior country—Volume II, page 832, line 34 ; Volume II, page 833 ; Volume II, the plan that is referred to on page 840 ; and Volume II, page 846. For those reasons I submit that we really get rid of this which has been a very elaborate and, I am afraid, rather a long-winded analysis. It appears there is no difficulty in my way on that point ; there were no British encroachments on the aborigines in Labrador ; there was no complaint of any encroachment ; there was no rising of the aborigines in Labrador. We must all speak here with hesitation' of historical propositions, but I still submit with some confidence this view : that it is quite unhistorical to regard Labrador as part of the Indian country in the sense in which that phrase was being used in 1760, or thereabouts, and I would observe in conclusion on the point (and it is my excuse for being so long-winded in reply) that in the Canadian Case, the main printed Case, there is not one word to suggest this ; there was not a single document which was exhibited or extracted by the Canadians in their Case, or in connection with their Case which put forward any such proposition. It was not until we had filed our Case and they had filed their Case and each side had had the opportunity of a second shot, so to speak, and you come to their Counter-Case, that they put in a paragraph making this suggestion which I have humbly called " far-fetched," that the Indian country is a country or includes a country in my green, and that this in some sway supports their contention. My respectful submission is that it is not only an after-thought, but it is an after-thought without any historical foundation, as your Lordships will always remember. It really is fallacious, as a matter of argument. Supposing (which I altogether dispute) that you were to regard for some purposes hunting grounds, or the like, as included in Newfoundland Labrador, what would happen then ? The Indians do not lose their hunting grounds any more than the Indians lost their hunting grounds by extending they boundary of Quebec to include all the yellow. If the proposition is that it would be horrifying to treat the documents here in such a way as to deprive the natives of their hunting grounds and that therefore the coast of Labrador given to Newfoundland cannot cover any more, you might just as well argue that it was horrifying in 1774 to extend Quebec so as to cover the whole of this annexed area to the west and south, because that per se would extend to the Indian hunting grounds, which it does not do. I submit on both ways of looking at it, on that point I am well-founded.

Sir John Simon.

p. 899

I have only to deal now with two or three matters which I must just pick up and dispose of. Reference was made to the American census. I could not help but observe that though my learned friend produced it he dropped it rather hastily. As it was referred to I have looked at it. As a matter of fact, this document, which is in the introduction on the very first page of the Eleventh Census of the United States, which deals with natives in the North American Continent, has got a very curious bearing upon the case. It does not show, as my learned friend, Mr. Geoffrion, seemed to think that it did when it was put into his hand, that all over the Continent the number of Indians was exceedingly small ; and, indeed, that is quite contrary to the fact. This is a very interesting document indeed. I did not know it before, but it appears that Thomas Jefferson took a great interest in this subject, and that in the year 1782 he drew up, with the assistance of other people, a sort of table or synopsis giving information upon the aborigines ; and that was based upon three previous reports, namely, reports by George Croghan in 1759, Colonel Bouquet in 1764, and Captain Hutchins in 1768. There are the names of the tribes, a long list of them, covering thirty pages, and in each case it gives, according to these different authorities, both where they reside and the sort of numbers that there are of them. So far as I have inspected it, when I do read it, I certainly do not get the impression that the Indians were a small folk ; but, on the contrary, there are all sorts of views as to how many of them there were. For example, in the year 1822, the report of Jedediah Morse, a special United States Indian Commissioner, stated that there were 471,417 of them. That is a precision in enumeration which is really quite surprising. I really do not think that when one looks at this United States Census, there is anything in it which will help my learned friend.

Then some reference has been made to the Hudson's Bay Committee report or map which immediately followed the Arrowsmith map to which I have made some reference, namely, the Aborigines Map. My learned friend, Mr. Macmillan, urged that there was a strange oversight on my part in having referred to the one without having referred to the next ; but the two documents have very different degrees of authority. I do not know whether my learned friend has traced — he could hardly be supposed to have omitted to have traced—where this map of the aborigines comes from. It is due to the fact that a most praiseworthy society, with which the family of Buxton will always be honourably associated, namely the Aborigines Protection Society, was anxious to take the opportunity in the year 1867, as it is upon all such occasions, to do its best to protect the interest of the Aborigines, a most admirable object. The consequence is that apparently this map was enclosed in a sort of petition or memorandum which was sent to the Committee and printed in the Appendix, from Sir Fowell Buxton and other gentlemen associated with him. They produced this map in order to put forward their view of where the different aborigines were to be found. No doubt it is, from that point of view, ethnologically speaking as well as speaking from the point of view of Christian humanity, a very interesting document ; but it has no further authority than that.

I think the Lord Chancellor has his own copy before him, and if I look at it, it is to be observed that when I look at the list of nations, I find that amongst other things the Esquimaux are called " Indian nations." I find that all around what I think is admittedly my Labrador I have Esquimaux marked ; and, therefore, if the proposition is that whatever is shown on this Aborigines Map is holy ground, which no European Government can safely trench upon, there seems to be no spot of earth in this part of the world upon which any Government of any British Colony could safely stand.

This, of course, is not a picture of land which is reserved as a hunting ground for Indians ; it is a picture of the supposed ethnological distribution of a number of native tribes. No doubt the Algonquins in that sense, as my Lord Sumner stated, are really a great branch of the human race, and they are properly depicted as the exclusive occupants of an area which runs down to the junction of the Ohio and the Mississippi, almost, and runs up to nearly the top of Hudson's Bay. But with great respect it does not prove anything, once it is understood that the map is a humanitarian map, put forward from the ethnological point of view, in which these distinguished gentlemen were urging the Committee in dealing with the Hudson's Bay Company to think of the poor Indian, which is, of course, a very proper thing to do. Other people did so too. Alexander Pope, I think, has an excellent couplet :

p. 901

"Lo, the poor Indian, whose untutored mind Sees God in clouds, or hears Him in the wind."

But I do not apprehend that those considerations decide any subject of any political boundary whatever.

Now, my Lords, I think that the only other point that I want to deal with for a moment is the suggestion that I have not been definite as regards the southern boundary of my green area. My learned friend Mr. Macmillan has kindly said that I have made the matter clear to him as regards the suggested boundary between what might be Hudson's Bay and the green, but he was not quite so clear as to my view about the southern boundary. At any rate, let it be quite clear. Whether it is right or not it is not for me to say, but my submission is this, that if you read the Statute of 1825 you are driven to the conclusion, and there is no way out of it, that that Statute of 1825, which is cutting off that pink, is cutting off a piece of the coast. The side note of the Statute says so ; the language of the Statute says so ; and nobody reading it without the map in front of them could question that that is what it is doing. It is therefore, a rather valuable parliamentary exposition of what " coast " means, because " the coast " at certain places is 120 to 130 miles deep.

12 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

The Lord
Chancellor.

I submit, therefore, that if that is right, I am confirmed in my view that before 1825 the coast of Labrador, which was annexed to Newfoundland, is at any rate a stretch of territory running back from the sea water, which goes as far as an area such as that. My learned friend says, and says quite justly : " Of course, the height of land, the watershed, is not and cannot be a mathematically straight line running for a distance of from 100 miles to 200 miles." Of course, that is quite true. I apprehend that it was arrived at as an approximation, and though I quite agree that the maps are not entirely consistent, I imagine that the people of 1825 who examined them knew that they could not be treated as if they were really as accurate as a portion perhaps of the Survey of the mother country, and they knew that it was done generally. Still I think it is fair to say this : inspect the maps ; inspect the Mitchell map and other maps of authority, and you get very strong indications that if you went up to the 52nd Degree of

Sir John Simon.

North Latitude, you would not at any rate be going over the tops of the mountains, but you would in fact, be going very close to what was then believed to be the head waters.

That being so, I think that this question of the situation of the pink, as such, is only interesting because it throws light upon the original conception ; and I conceive that it shows this, that the parties were dealing—and in this sense accurately dealing—upon this basis, that if you did travel down from the North from Cape Chidley and along the height of land, you would in fact reach a height where you would be looking, as it were, down to the Gulf of St. Lawrence, and they were satisfied that you could continue to travel along the watershed between the waters that run into the Hudson's Bay and the waters that run into the Atlantic, until you would at any rate come upon the 52nd parallel. And you do in fact ; Low's survey shows it. That gives me all that I want. I come down till I hit the 52nd parallel, and then I turn to the East and travel along it to the end.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Of course, the interval which Mr. Macmillan dwelt upon between the 52nd parallel and the height of land, you still claim ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord ; I put forward that claim, and I ask the Board to consider whether it is not right.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : You had both sides of the water- shed there. You had the watershed looking up from the Atlantic and you had the watershed looking up from the Gulf of St. Lawrence.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes. Of course, your Lordships appreciate perfectly well how one arrives at a conclusion logically and argumentatively. It would be reached, of course, in this way. Imagine yourself to be without the pink, for a moment, and ask yourself, upon my view of it, what then would be the coast of Labrador between Cape Chidley and the River St. John. Well, you would then get this dotted line which the Lord Chancellor has just pointed to. Now, what has happened since ? In my submission nothing has happened since except that Parliament, being minded to take a pair of shears and shear out from my coasts of Labrador a portion, has done it by taking shears which first of all chop at Blanc Sablon thirty miles back, and then chop along the 52nd parallel, and finally take out the piece bounded by the River St. John. If that is so, the result would be, as a mere matter of construction, that I should be left with what I think my learned friend referred to as the two humps.

On the other hand, it may be that the true view of the matter is that as soon as ever, in travelling to the West along the 52nd parallel, I impinge upon the height of land, thereafter I am at once put upon that line of rails, rather than the other. That is a matter for your Lordships to determine. I do not recognise anything which is either illogical or obscure in the view which is being presented by the Government of Newfoundland. It seems to me to be quite clear, and I trust that the logic of it is intelligible ; but of course, whether it is right, or not, is a matter which I have not to determine.

Then there was one incidental observation which my learned friend made on the subject of the River St. John. He said : Now, notice, when you read the way in which in the Commission of Governor Graves the coast of Labrador is limited laterally at one end and the other ; the way in which they dealt with the River St. Johns is not to say that it was bounded by the River St. Johns, but to say that it is bounded—this is page 149—by "the River St. Johns, which discharges itself into the sea nearly opposite the west end of the Island of Anticosti." My learned friend Mr. Macmillan said on page 396 of the Shorthand Note :

p. 903

" Now observe, that is indicating a point. It is not indicating a line," he said. " It is indicating a point, namely the point of discharge."

Unfortunately for my learned friend, the real explanation is quite plain the moment that you investigate any map of the period. Mitchell's map will do very well. I do not know how it came about, but there are a great many places called " St. John " in this part of the world. St. John's day, is I think, the 24th of June, and that is the day, so we are told, when Cabot first sighted the Island of Newfoundland, and that is why the Capital of Newfoundland is called St. John's to this day. But if you examined the map, you would find that there was a River St. John's on the same map, which was flowing into the Bay of Fundy, which is just on the other side of the Gulf of St. Lawrence. I think the thing to do in reference to the phrase " the River St. Johns which discharges itself into the sea nearly opposite the west end of the Island of Anticosti " is to make quite certain that we know which River St. John you are talking about. If my learned friend is concerned to rely on the precise language of the Commission, no doubt he will be pleased to notice that the Commission described the River St. John not as flowing into the River St. Lawrence, but as flowing into the sea.

Sir John Simon.

There are many other things upon which one might occupy your Lordships' time, and I am far from thinking that I have dealt with everything. But I have done my best to obey the injunction of my learned friend, Mr. Geoffrion, and not to introduce too large a percentage of irrelevant matter. I hope I have dealt with the main points of the case.

I will not ask leave to repeat the ten propositions which your Lordships have, of course ; but I humbly submit that the case for Newfoundland may still be regarded as standing upon that ground, and it has not really been dislodged.

Now, my Lords, what I would like to say in conclusion is this : this is one of those cases where there is such a mass of detail that it is perhaps not always easy, even for the very best and the most trained minds, to get the essential facts ; and so I am going to try to conclude by stating the essential fact, as we regard it, in as uncontroversial terms as I can.

This, I suggest, is the true conclusion ; the true conclusion I suggest is that 160 years ago, or a little more, the area which is now in dispute, this green area, was on all hands regarded as practically worthless. That is the key to the case : it was regarded as practically worthless by everybody. It was, therefore, quite natural, when annexing a portion of Labrador to Newfoundland—this is my submission—to act with a generous hand. And the only internal physical boundary which was available or which would suggest itself was the height of land, the watershed, the sort of boundary which contemporary maps again and again indicated as the limits of the Hudson's Bay, and which geographers and statesmen in the eighteenth century constantly regarded as the internal limits of a coast.

As against that, this comment is made, and one or two of your Lordships one or twice have pointed it out as a serious consideration, and no doubt it is. It is said : "Well, but surely, to treat the prerogative grant, the executive distribution, as giving you an area that runs back to a watershed, is to contemplate, possibly, an almost illimitable extent of territory." Now, my Lords, I think, and I suggest, that the answer is this : The peninsula of Labrador—I am not speaking of my green territory now, but of the peninsula itself—the peninsula of Labrador was not, so far as its outline was concerned, a terra incognita. It was not like tropical Africa ; it was not like the Far West ; and if you told men that they were to have a jurisdiction which started at the salt water and went back to the watershed you were not, by using such language, giving them a perfectly indefinite and possibly inexhaustible march. The peninsula of Labrador was known at the time. It was known to be bounded on the one side by Hudson's Straits, and surveyors, traders and other people had marked that out by this time very definitely. There is, in fact, an interesting document in this case in which you may read how the coast of Labrador was surveyed by Captain Cook. Captain Cook is the circumnavigator ; and he was present, or at any rate was on the scene, at the time of the Battle of the Plains of Abraham. It was Captain Cook who was in the boat with James Wolfe, together with Mr. Robison, the Glasgow student, whom the history books describe as the Young Lieutenant. Captain Cook was there, and he was interested in this part of the world, and there is a document in the case which shows that Captain Cook was surveying in this part of the world. So you had Hudson's Bay perfectly well marked as a boundary. You had a fringe which was quite well ascertained and known, although not explored in its inner recesses, and you had the other boundary from Belleisle running up from the shore of the St. Lawrence, both from French and English sources.

p. 904

Having got, therefore, a peninsula which turned out to be something like 500,000 square miles in extent, the position was this, that the thickness of the isthmus, 300 miles, was known pretty accurately, because John Mitchell had got all these latitudes and longitudes carefully fixed. Therefore it is not true that they were dealing with a terra incognita. What they were doing was, that they were dealing with a country, the value of the interior of which was believed to be quite negligible, but the boundaries of which were known. And although therefore the value of the interior was never ascertained, and although its actual contours, mountains and hills and so on, were unsurveyed, there was really nothing extravagant or illimitable in allotting the Atlantic coast, in this wide sense, to Newfoundland. And, of course, although this is quite a subordinate consideration, Canada never questioned the allocation until it became worth Canada's while to do so. On the contrary, Canada affirmed it in a series of official maps, Nos. 35 in my atlas, 39 in my atlas, and 41 in my atlas ; and when they were asked about it on an occasion when the Secretary of State for the United States, Mr. Fish, was anxious to know how things stood, the Privy Council expressly so informed Lord Dufferin, and the Colonial Office so agreed ; and right down to the time when it was discovered in the early 'nineties that the forests and water power of this part of Labrador were valuable, there really was not any challenge.

Well, my Lords, what has happened since ? There was this desperate attempt to peg out claims ; first of all to extend the boundary by Quebec legislation and Canadian legislation, all of which is perfectly inoperative, because, of course, if Quebec had already got it she did not want it, and if she had not got it and somebody else had, then she could not get it by legislation.

Viscount
Haldane.

Viscount HALDANE : It is not important from the point of view of your argument, but how many times larger is Labrador than Newfoundland ?

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : The part I am talking about is about twice the size, my Lord. Newfoundland would be about one-third of the whole.

Viscount HALDANE : From the coast to the height of land ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes, my Lord, my green. Roughly speaking, you may say that it is twice the size.

12 Nov., 1926.
Sir John Simon.

Then in the same way you get this to some extent on both sides, but I am much struck with the Canadian ones. I have not spent time in pointing out how very oddly some of them have been procured, but there is a great effort to produce affidavits, and perhaps I may say that that culminates by the presentation by my learned friend, Mr. Geoffrion, on page 744 of the Shorthand Notes of the very striking fact that since 1897 Canada has actually distributed 75 pairs of blankets to some Indians. That was one of the acts of occupation which your Lordships were invited to consider from the Canadian point of view, five years after the dispute arose. The answer is, of course, that naturally both sides want the territory. Newfoundland wants it quite as much as Canada.

Mr. Macmillan.

Your Lordships will perhaps remember, one of the later Latin poets satirised the tendency of Imperial Rome, wherever it found some hidden inlet or some other territory that might perchance produce gold. at once to start a dispute and claim it :

"Si quis sinus abditus ultra, Si qua foret fellus, fulvum quae mitteret aurum, Hostis erat."

There is no danger, of course, of hostile feelings arising between Canada and Newfoundland—

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Who was it who said that ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : It was Petronius Arbiter, my Lord. It is one of the poetical passages.

As I say, there is, of course, no danger of any hostile feelings arising between Canada and Newfoundland. The great Dominion and the ancient Colony are good friends and neighbours under the British Crown, and they will remain such ; but even the friendliest of neighbours sometimes find it necessary to secure an impartial award which will fix

p. 906

the exact boundary between them, and I confidently submit to your Lordships that when you make your report to His Majesty, that report should declare, in answer to the question in this case, as to what is the location and definition of this boundary, that the boundary between Canada and Newfoundland in Labrador is located and defined by a line starting at Cape Chidley, at the entrance to Hudson's Straits, running along the watershed or height of land which divides the waters that flow into the Atlantic from the waters that flow into Ungava Bay or Hudson's Bay, until it reaches the 52nd parallel of latitude ; when it reaches the 52nd parallel of latitude, that the boundary then runs due east along that parallel until it reaches the meridian at Blanc Sablon, and thence it runs down south to the Gulf of St. Lawrence, including Woody Island.

Mr. MACMILLAN : May it please your Lordships, for thirteen days the Board has been engaged in hearing debated here the question of the true interpretation to be placed upon the words " all the coasts of Labrador," as used in certain documents in 1763.

My Lords, it is a tribute to the ambiguity of the English language that an apparently simple phrase such as that should have afforded material for so prolonged and so elaborate a debate. The resources of history, of geology, even of botany, of geography and physiography, and almost all the sciences, have been ransacked in order to assist or impede your Lordships in the decision of this question. But nevertheless, at this late stage of the debate, and notwithstanding the note of confidence—I might even say the note of triumph—with which my learned friend Sir John Simon has concluded his address to your Lordships, I have still the temerity to submit to you that his contention is not a sound one, and that the position of the Dominion of Canada in this matter is supported, and is both historic and accurate.

12 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

The question cannot be dismissed as one which is so abundantly clear as to leave no room for controversy. We should not have been engaged upon it for all these days had it been so clear a question as that. The topic has been discussed and canvassed with many of the papers which are before the Board, and the problem which your Lordships are asked now to solve is very much the same problem as Judge Pinsent puzzled his head over in the year 1867, and which he at that time found was difficult of solution.

In approaching the solution of the problem, I am happy to be able to start from a common ground with my learned friend. On the question of the sound interpretation of these critical words, these five words with which we have had to deal, I have been very much struck throughout by this feature, that my learned friend Sir John Simon has said, and said frequently, not as a matter of concession to me but as a matter not susceptible of argument, and as one of the common grounds in this case—I had better use his own language so as to do him no injustice—" I am not in the least disputing that the purpose and motive and governing consideration in all this business was the use of the margin of the sea in connection with fishing of different kinds."

Now, my Lords, subject only to the qualification that I should read " cod fishing " for " fishing," I am in entire agreement with my learned friend there. But the significance of the statement, coaling from Newfoundland, cannot be overlooked, nor, indeed, I think, can it be over estimated. Notice how far reaching it is: "The purpose, the motive, the governing consideration, in all this business;"—that is to say, this business of allocating some jurisdiction of the mainland of Newfoundland— "was the use of the margin of the sea in connection with fishing."

My learned friend says, and says, of course, quite properly, that that is not 'the question. Quite true; that is not the question. The question is : what does the language used mean ? But when you are in search of a meaning to be paced upon language, I should have thought that the most conclusive guide to its interpretation was to be found in "The purpose, the motive and the governing consideration in all this business."

It is very curious that although my learned friend sought to brush aside the importance of that common ground, he has spent hours before your Lordships in endeavouring to extract from documents what was the purpose of the fixing of the Indian Reservations, in order that your Lordships might thus be aided to interpret the territory which was reserved to the Indians under the Proclamation of 1763; and great industry and much pains has been expended in endeavouring to satisfy your Lordships as to what was the exact purpose and aim of that reservation of Indian territory. It appears to me that there is a slight inconsistency in saying that with regard to the question of what Newfoundland got you are to have no regard to the purpose, the motive or the governing consideration, but that when you come on the other hand to construe another portion of the same document, the document that deals with the territory reserved to the Indians, then it becomes of paramount importance to tell your Lordships all the history, and to put before your Lordships all the documents of the time in order to do what?—to illustrate the intentions of those who were dealing with Indian reservations.

Sir John Simon.

Sir John Simon.

My learned friend cannot have it both ways. If intention is important for the purpose of ascertaining what was the Indian reservation, intention is equally important when you are dealing with the question of what was the nature of the grant to Newfoundland in 1763. Therefore I would emphasise again the emphatic language which my learned friend has used upon to matter, because, after all, what is the position? If language used is susceptible of only one meaning, then, of course, there is no difficulty, and my learned friend should simply have said, "The documents speak for themselves." But no one before your Lordships has confined himself to that simple method, and we have both proceeded from this common starting point, that the language which is used, the language which has to be construed, owing to the very generality of the word "coast" or "coasts," leads to ambiguity, and that therefore it is necessary to find in some intrinsic material the necessary aids to the interpretation of the word as used here. My Lords, if a word of ambiguous content is used, and it is necessary

Mr. Macmillan.

p. 908

to ascertain its content from its context, then again I say that the context which is most predominant and most useful is the context which is to be found either in the document itself, or in the documents of the same period, or in the surrounding circumstances of those who used that language.

It is perhaps to repeat myself to say that the effort always is to ascertain the intention and that when you have, as you have here, an admission as to what was the intention and the governing consideration of the whole matter, your Lordships are absolved from the search for the intention, because it is already before your Lordships. We know what was the intention.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I have never made any admission about intention. I thought that my learned friend gave me a lecture upon the philosophical distinction between motive and intention.

Mr. MACMILLAN : If my learned friend is really making this very fine distinction as to the difference between purpose and intention I am willing to present him with that. His language was : " The purpose, the motive, and the governing consideration."

12 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : And is that inaccurate ?

Mr. MACMILLAN: If my learned friend now says that is inaccurate, I am sorry ; but I do not suppose that he wants to interrupt my speech about that.

That, my Lords, is the keynote of the situation, and, it being common ground that there is ambiguity in the expression under interpretation, my submission is that you there get the best of all possible guides to the meaning of the term which your Lordships now have to construe.

Of course, my Lords, if the word " coast " or the word " coasts "—because the singular and the plural are used indifferently in these documents--if either the word in the singular or the word in the plural had by necessary implication a certain content, then it would be irrelevant for either of us to refer to anything else, because a word which has a definite and precise meaning is not susceptible of interpretation at all. Its content is known. It is only because its content is not known that it is necessary to resort to external and extrinsic aids.

Now we are agreed that the word " coast " here has not by necessary and universal implication the meaning that it includes all land from the shore to the height of land or the watershed. No one has submitted that when I use the expression " coast " I am necessarily referring to a territory which is bounded on the one side by the seashore and on the other side by the nearest watershed. Nobody suggests that that is not the suggestion. The suggestion here is that in the circumstances of this particular case, having regard to the circumstances in which this language was used by those who used it, your Lordships should attribute to the word " coast " here the meaning of a territory which extends from the seashore to the watershed. But that at once gets one into the process of interpretation, and at once calls for resort to these aids to interpretation which are available for the purpose ; and, of course, in this case, the primary aid to interpretation is "the purpose, or intention, or motive, or governing consideration of the whole business," and that governing consideration is " the use of the margin of the sea for fishing purposes."

Now, my Lords, what is the operative effect, now that one can survey the Newfoundland argument ? It is very difficult, in a case of this sort, to observe a due sense of proportion. Topics emerge, and for the time being are treated as of very considerable consequence, but perhaps at the end of the day they may rather fade into insignificance. I personally have found, in endeavouring to bring together at this stage the main considerations, some little difficulty in preserving that due sense of proportion ; but I think I may fairly say that the operative effect of the argument which my learned friend has addressed to your Lordships so attractively and with so much learning, really comes down to this, that on a sound construction of Governor Graves's Commission of the 25th April, 1763, his Majesty thereby annexed to and incorporated with the Government of the Island of Newfoundland a certain mainland territory. I am trying to put it as accurately and as fairly as I possibly can when I say, "A certain mainland territory" and it was a mainland territory which, as it happens, is more than twice the size of the whole of the Island of Newfoundland and considerably larger than the whole of Great Britain. That circumstance may not be so impressive in this region, where we are dealing, so to speak, on a more wholesale scale than we are accustomed to deal with boundary questions in our own domestic tribunals here. It is quite true that we are dealing in a continental area, and so I do not think that that is of itself so important, yet it is at least significant. But the main contention is that on a sound construction of that particular document, that was annexed to, and incorporated with, the government of the Island of Newfoundland, the green area.

Then, my Lords, the next stage of it is that His Majesty did so by an executive act, which His Majesty himself contemporaneously described, in the Proclamation of the same year, as a putting under the care and inspection of the Governor of Newfoundland of a portion of the coast of Labrador between two points on the coast in order that an open and free fishery may be carried on upon that coast. I then carry on to the next stage : that His Majesty did so, not because it was necessary to effectuate the purpose in view, but because he used, advertently or inadvertently, language which, although admittedly ambiguous, must nevertheless in this case be held inherently to imply a much wider grant than was necessary to effectuate the purpose in view ; a grant namely, from the shore up to the watershed ; and finally that His Majesty, by using the language used in Grave's Commission has, on the East side of the Peninsula of Labrador, achieved precisely the same effect as His Majesty achieved in 1670 in the Charter to the Hudson Bay Company, on the interpretation which my learned friend puts upon the Hudson's Bay Charter, and which was put upon it by the Law Officers whose opinions he has printed, that " all the coasts of Labrador " between these two points, that short description, has the same content, and precisely the same content, as the elaborate description of lands and confines and countries, and so on, which you find in the Hudson's Bay Charter of 1670. I hope I do not weary your Lordships by reminding you of the exhaustive enumeration of particulars in the Hudson's Bay title, a title which embraced rivers, coasts and bays, and all the rest of it, a very elaborate enumeration indeed of countries, lands and so on ; but the case now submitted to your Lordships is that by the shorthand use of the words " all the coast of Labrador " there is confided to Newfoundland exactly the same thing upon the East side of the watershed as he had, by his grant of 1670, confided to the Hudson Bay Company on the West side, because if from the height of land in this area to the Eastern shore passes under the description of " the coast of Labrador," so equally, the area to the West, that is to say, from the great sea known as Hudson's Bay up to the watershed from the West, is equally, of course, " coast "—but in that case the Western coast of the Peninsula of Labrador is contrasted with the Eastern coast of Labrador, which it was said was given to Newfoundland ; consequently, you have this remarkable position, that taking the watershed in this vast area of over 500,000 square miles, it is composed entirely of two coasts and two coasts only, a coast confided to the Hudson's Bay Company on one side and a coast confided to Newfoundland on the other side. My Lords, it is surely unlikely that, had His Majesty been minded to confer this large territorial grant upon Newfoundland, he would have chosen to do it in such shorthand language as the words which we have before us, " all the coasts of Labrador," when it was found necessary, in days when people were perhaps even less exact in the use of language, to describe what was given to the Hudson's Bay Company, on the other side of the watershed, by the most careful and full enumeration of territory, which careful and full enumeration of territory now means, according to my learned friends and according to the Law Officers of 1849, a grant of lands up to the watershed.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount HALDANE : Can you give us the mileage of the disputed territory and of the Island of Newfoundland ? I think 111,000 square miles is the disputed territory in Labrador.

Sir JOHN SIMON : We think it is 102,000, my Lord.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I think I can answer his -Lordship. Newfoundland is 40,200 square miles ; the area claimed in the Labrador Peninsula by Newfoundland is 113,000 square miles.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : You say less, Sir John ?

p. 911

Sir JOHN SIMON : That is why I interrupted my learned friend.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Of course, you may correct me, if I am wrong.

Sir JOHN SIMON : We arrived at a figure of 10 2,000, but it is enough to say it is more than twice the size.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Shall we say 100,000 ; we are dealing wholesale here, Sir John ; it is not a retail trade.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Is that a firm offer ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : I daresay you would like it.

Viscount FINLAY : You do not stand on a matter of 10,000 square miles in a matter of this sort.

Viscount HALDANE : Anyhow, it is more than twice as large.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I think it is fair to say, is it not, that we are Mr. Macmillan. dealing here with territories on a very large scale, and it is not so impressive a point for me as it might be in other circumstances.

12 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Sir JOHN SIMON : We are dealing with it on an American, if not on an astronomical scale.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I prefer, where I can, not to make too much of a point which is not really of very great consequence, but it is, of course, significant.

The LORD CHANCELLOR: What proportion does it bear to North America as a whole ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is a very small thing ; but, of course, I contend it is a very large area when you come to the word " coast," but I am glad to say I do not have to rely on a mere ad captandum argument of that sort. That is the operative effect, really, of the argument which has been addressed to your Lordships, and it is now my duty very shortly to combat it to the best of my ability. My Lords, I said that you are here furnished (and it is an unusual position) with an admission as to the purpose of this whole business ; what was intended ; and it is surely rather an odd thing that the grant should be sought to be construed as if it had inadvertently included something more than was necessary to effectuate the purpose. Ordinarily one construes a grant so that it shall be effective. You ask : what was the purpose which it was desired to effect ? We are told that it is common ground that it was to secure a margin of the sea for a fishery. It may be, of course, and my learned friend is entitled to say this, that the person who was minded to secure a margin of the sea for a fishery may have used language which, upon a subsequent interpretation, may be found to be very much larger than the language which was necessary to effectuate the purpose in view, then the grant would be effective and would convey more than was necessary ; but it is not to be lightly inferred that the person setting out with a definite and admitted object in view has inadvertently used language which, although ambiguous, must nevertheless be held, as against the grantor, to be a grant inclusive of something infinitely greater than was necessary to effectuate the purpose in view, which could indeed have no relation to the purpose in view at all. I say again, if such language is used, of course, it must have its effects, but your Lordships are engaged here, are you not, in doing what I am afraid so often falls to the lot of a Court in construction—your Lordships are being asked to impose upon persons more than 100 years ago—may 150 years ago—an intention which very probably they never entertained. It is often one of the most distressing duties of a Court to have to say that a Testator has used certain language, and therefore certain results must follow on the canons of interpretation, although every one is well satisfied that the Testator contemplated no such thing. It is a painful duty, but one from which the Court does not flinch when it is necessary ; and the question often arises in connection with the interpretation of contracts as well : if persons choose to use language which has an accepted connotation, a necessary connotation, even although the Court may be satisfied that that was not the real intention of the parties, nevertheless the Court will attribute to the persons the intention which their language on a proper interpretation bears. My Lords, it is only a branch of the general principle of law ; that people are taken to intend the consequences of their acts ; they are taken to intend the consequences of their words.

12 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount HALDANE : It is only when the words are ambiguous that you are said by the Courts to have to sit yourself down in the Testator's armchair.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, that is the position which the Court adopts at times. It is a very important point to have the grant here, and I think it is really inherent in my learned friend Sir John Simon's argument, he almost went so far as this—I hope this is not a travesty of his submission—he said nobody cared twopence about this place (that is his actual colloquial phrase, I noted it at the time) now it has become of value and now that your Lordships are called upon to scrutinise this grant, you are to infer, or you are to impose upon the authors of this language an intention with regard to that for which they at the time cared nothing—for which they did not care twopence—you are to impose upon them an intention now, not in order that the purpose of the grant should be effectuated, but in order that there should be held to have been a transfer of territory in 1763 unnecessary for the purpose in view, and not contemplated by the persons who were the authors of these documents. That seems to me the most striking feature of this case, and one which is not to be lost sight of when the argument submitted is really

this : that you are to impose upon the authors of these writings an intention which they did not entertain at the time, and could not have entertained at the time, when their minds were concentrated upon one object and one object only, namely, the carrying out of certain articles of the Treaty of Paris and ensuring that this great new asset, the cod fishery on the Labrador coast, should be properly administered. My Lords, it is a feature, I think almost a unique feature, of this case, that you have got to rest on conjecture as to the intention of the whole business. Apart from my learned friend's admission, and he now suggests that his statement was inaccurate, but Sir John is not generally inaccurate at critical parts of the case—apart altogether from the merely ad hominum method of selecting a phrase from one's friend's speech, which may be an unkind way of founding one's argument, and I prefer to rely on what is very much more important : the authors of this phrase now on the table for interpretation—the very authors of this phrase—have at the time they use this phrase told you what was in their minds when they used it, and why they used it. My Lords, the Lords of Trade, who were the active agents in this matter, had no doubt about it ; they speak with no uncertain voice on the subject. On the 8th June 1763, they made a Report and, in Volume 3 at page 909, this is what they said after discussing " the advantages resulting from the Cession made to your Majesty by the late definitive Treaty " —they are there considering the new assets of the British Empire—and they state at the top of page 909, "But as no such regular civil Government is either necessary or indeed can be established here no perpetual Residence or planting is intended ; It will there be sufficient," that is to say in places of that sort : "to provide for the free Trade of all your Majesty's Subjects under such Regulations, and such Administration of Justice as is best suited to that End. Such We apprehend to be the case of Newfoundland, where a temporary Fishery is the only object, and this We suppose has been the reason, which induced your Majesty to annex the coast of Labrador to that Government." Can anyone without sophistication read that passage without having it brought home in the most emphatic fashion that the reason which operated in the annexation of the coast of Labrador to Newfoundland was this : the object of the fostering of the temporary fishing. Now "temporary fishing" is a word of fixed significance ; it is the cod fishery that is the fishery by the people who came out from this country, and it is distinguished from the resident fishery, which was the fishery which was carried on by the people who had to remain on the coast, mostly for seal, but also to some extent for walruses and other animals which came about the shores.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : The sedentary fishery.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Sedentary was the word, but the temporary fishery was the fishery which was the great fishery carried out from the Ports of England, and necessary for seamen for our navy ; and there you have the Lords of Trade, who were the very persons, participants both in the preparation of Graves' Commission and the Proclamation, the persons who were consulted on this matter, telling you, in this very year of Grace 1763, what was the reason of the annexation. The reason of the annexation to Newfoundland was that, as in Newfoundland the temporary fishery was the only object, hence there was apparently annexed, the coast of Labrador. Now, my Lords, that from the Lords of Trade is a significant voice, but my learned friend has said very very little to your Lordships upon the even more emphatic language of His Majesty himself in his Proclamation of the 7th October 1763. I should have thought that this is a matter upon which your Lordships would have expected more assistance from the other side of the Bar, because it is obviously at the very heart of the whole question. It is a passage on page 154, where this very matter—I shall come back on this a little later, but for the moment, I am furnishing your Lordships with the contemporary interpretation by the authors themselves of the language they used—and what is said in that Proclamation is this, " and to the end that the open and free fishery of our subjects may be extended to and carried on upon the coast of Labrador " ; now I pause there just for a moment, my Lords ; of course, there you are dealing with something that can be carried on upon—what is my learned friend's phrase ? —" a margin of the sea " ; " and the adjacent islands we have thought fit, with the advice of our said Privy Council, to put all that coast, from the River St. John's to Hudson's Straights together with " certain islands, " under the care and inspection of our Governor of Newfoundland." Again, my Lords, I ask that passage to be read without sophistication ; any person reading that at the time would say : I see the coast of Labrador is very important for this open and free fishery, and in order that it may be carried on there, the Governor of Newfoundland has been invoked, and we have put the coast of Labrador where that fishery can be carried on, under the care and inspection of our Governor of Newfoundland. My Lords, I do not want to re-open or rediscuss the question which is perhaps of some little importance, as to which is really the ruling document here, whether it is the Proclamation or the Commission. It is not for me to say what my own view on the matter is, but I confess my own feeling about it has veered once or twice from one side to the other. The Proclamation is, of course, a document of a different type from the Commission. The Commission, is addressed to the individual who is entrusted with duties, it is his warrant to carry out duties ; it is therefore an executive instrument of importance ; on the other hand, the Proclamation is the announcement of what His Majesty has been pleased to do ; it is cognate in some sense to a Statute, although it has a different legal status ; but it is an announcement to the world of an executive act of the Sovereign. At one stage of the argument my Lord Warrington was good enough to call attention to the language of it, with a suggestion which I have, of course, studied with all the respect with which one would a suggestion coming from that source, and I do not know quite yet, if I am satisfied with the view which I am going to suggest to your Lordships. If you notice, the whole Proclamation runs in the past tense, but that is a feature which is common mon to Proclamations. It is the announcement of a fait accompli, and if you look at the language which is used with regard to Quebec, His Majesty says on page 153, line 12 " We have thought fit, with the advice of our Privy Council, to issue this our Royal Proclamation, hereby to publish and declare to all our loving subjects, that we have, with the advice of our said Privy Council, granted our letters patent under our Great Seal of Great Britain, to erect within the countries and islands ceded and confirmed to us by the said Treaty, four distinct and separate governments, styled and called by the names of Quebec " and so on. Notwithstanding the form in which that language is used, I think there can be no doubt that the Government of Quebec was created by the Proclamation. There are no Letters Patent under the Great Seal creating this new Government of Quebec. What there is is a Commission issuing to each of the new Governors.

p. 914

Viscount HALDANE : You will notice a material circumstance that the new Governments are created, in the language on page 153, " Within the countries and islands ceded and confirmed to us by the said Treaty."

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord.

Viscount HALDANE : On the next page, when you are dealing with fisheries, they are not referred to, and could not be referred to, as having been ceded or confirmed.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord, but it was appurtenant, of course, to the lands that we got. The French were really ousted from the fishing rights they had, and therefore it came to us in that sense.

Viscount HALDANE : No doubt that was so, but at the same time it is not put there as something which is created ; it is a sort of appendage to the existing island of Newfoundland.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is quite true ; but, for the moment, I was really on what I might call a grammatical question. It has been said that this passage upon page 154, from line 14 onwards, is a recital of something already done by something else, and I confess that I had rather read it that way myself until my Lord Warrington suggested that that might not be accurate.

Viscount
Haldane.

Lord WARRINGTON : I did not know then there was an Order in Council approving of the Commission, so that the Commission was passed on.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : With great respect, I am not sure that that really alters the position. If you take the language, for example, with regard to Quebec, because I want to get what you might call the style of the document, the currency of the document, you will find there that the King erects the Government of Quebec, and although it is true he says that with the advice of the Privy Council that has been settled——

Lord WARRINGTON : He says he has by Letters Patent.

Mr. MACMILLAN : And there are none ; there are just Commissions to Governors.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : What is the date of the first Commission ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : The first Commission would be to Murray ; he was the first Governor.

Viscount FINLAY : It is in the terms recited at about line 12 on page 154.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I asked that that search should be made, and there seems to be no such thing.

12 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount HALDANE : On page 153 he had got the whole of that enormous territory ceded and confirmed by the French King, the title being in the King of England ; that would be in some form of Commission.

Mr. MACMILLAN: The question for the moment was, what this recital means that " we have granted our Letters Patent " ; naturally, one would ordinarily assume that His Majesty had granted Letters Patent, and one was put on search to see whether he had granted any Letters Patent.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : There was a Commission to Murray on the 21st November, 1763.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is the Commission, my Lord ; that is the first Commission to the Governors, but it is after the date of the Proclamation, and therefore historically it is not accurate to say there were Letters Patents which had been granted.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : On page 176, we have that fact mentioned.

Lord

Viscount FINLAY : The letters Patent were merely to erect four distinct and separate Governments in the ceded territory.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : But one was looking to find if there were any such, and there do not appear to be any Letters Patent. It is done

p. 917

through the medium of giving a Commission to the Governor, and it is in that form it goes before the Privy Council.

Mr. Macmillan.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I think there must have been some Letters Patent although they are not now forthcoming.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I can only say I have instructed that a search should be made, they have been looked for, and cannot be found.

Viscount FINLAY : Does it make any difference ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : I do not think it does, my Lord.

Viscount HALDANE : They may have been brought up at the same time.

Mr. MACMILLAN : The point I was on was whether when the Proclamation uses the language in the past tense, " we have done something or other," that is recital or executive action. That is what I was on.

Lord WARRINGTON : It does not really much matter, because you must go back to the Commission to see what he did. You do not get the details without going back to that.

12 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Your Lordship has, I know, done me the credit of seeing that I have always said so with the most complete candour throughout this case.

Lord
Warrington.

Viscount HALDANE : The King at that time intended to make a complete and exhaustive disposition of the whole of the territory he had got, he sets up four governments, and if you like, annexes to Newfoundland, an easement on the coast, whatever that means of Labrador, but it is an independent area outside the bounds of what he has got from succeeding the French King, and it is quite independent of setting up the four Governments.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : My learned friends in their printed Case have stated that this Proclamation is the root of their title and is the foundation of Newfoundland's jurisdiction, and my learned friend has been anxious to get away from the position not unnaturally, because if the Proclamation is the root of his title, it certainly gives a title which is very much less comprehensive in its terms than the language to be found in the Commission ; therefore, one can understand the desirability, from his point of view, of shifting his ground from his pleading, and saying that this was the foundation and the other was not, but at the same time. you cannot leave outside the Commission and I am now going to go to the Commission, and it has been present to my mind, it always struck me that my learned friend referred to this so very little, while harping on the Commission, that I am going to take them both together, which is much sounder.

Lord
Warrington.

Lord WARRINGTON : There must have been some sort of Letters Patent ; look at line 32 on page 154, " We have thought fit to publish and declare by this our Proclamation that we have in the Letters Patent under our Great Seal of Great Britain, by which the said Governments are constituted, given express power and direction to our Governors."

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is the Commission: they are Letters Patent. Would your Lordship, before concluding the matter, just look at page 159 and see how, in 1774, this is described by Parliament, at line 18 "the Province of Quebec as created and established by the said Royal Proclamation of the 7th of October."

Lord
Warrington.

Lord WARRINGTON : Certainly.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Therefore, the Statute says the Province of Quebec was created and established by the Proclamation.

Viscount FINLAY : Is that at page 159 ?.

12 Nov., 1926.

Lord
Warrington.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord, at line 18. I do not want to be controversial on this and to develop it at great length, but I want to show that you cannot do, as my learned friend does, treat this Proclamation as if it were comparatively negligible in the matter of its description of the grant, when it is referred to over and over again, by Parliament and elsewhere, as itself the very source of the rights.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord WARRINGTON: But it is a very curious thing that the Proclamation in that part that you refer to here, states that something has been done, and in other parts it directly gives orders and directions to the person to whom it is addressed.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Far be it from me to try to penetrate these recondite matters; I can only tell your Lordships what I know myself.

Lord WARRINGTON: We have here " we strictly enjoin and require."

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is de futuro, is it not, my Lord ?

Lord WARRINGTON : It is more than that. Then there is another one, "and we do hereby authorise, enjoin and require the Governors and Commanders in Chief of all our Colonies respectively as well those under our immediate Government" and so on, "to grant certain lands" and so on. There are certain parts of it which are direct commands.

p. 919

Mr. MACMILLAN : But the thing, which frankly, was puzzling me, was that certain passages in the Proclamation, seem to be rather in the nature of a recital of acts already done than to be themselves executive acts. I am going to leave the matter with this observation : that apparently Parliament regarded the Proclamation as an executive document, and not merely a reciting document in the matter both of the setting up of the Government of Quebec and also in this very matter of the annexation of the coast of Labrador to Newfoundland. You find that, of course, in the Act of 1809, on page 195, where you will find that the Coast of Labrador was " annexed to the Government of Newfoundland by the said Proclamation of the seventh day of October, one thousand seven hundred and sixty three " ; therefore, in the minds, at any rate, of the people who were framing this legislation, there was present the conception that it was the Proclamation that was the effective instrument that had done it, and therefore the draughtsman of these measures, where the language occurs, would have before him the Proclamation, and in this matter of Labrador, what he would read would be what the Proclamation contained on the subject, and what did it contain on the subject--be it either an explanation or an executive act itself : that a certain coast had been put under the care and inspection of our Government of Newfoundland. My Lords, as I stated, I am not greatly concerned whether my learned friend's first view or his second view is right, because if the Proclamation be the executive act, your Lordships are undoubtedly entitled to resort to the Commission to help to construe it ; if on the other hand the Commission be the executive act, by parity of reasoning, you are entitled to refer to the Proclamation for assistance ; therefore, it does not greatly aid your Lordships to carry on a discussion upon this matter, but I did not wish to leave it in this position : that I accepted the view that the Commission was the sole executive document and that the Proclamation could be treated as lightly as my learned friend had treated it ; now he puts it as something that was a mere recital, and possibly an inaccurate and incomplete recital of what had been done. My Lords, it is a contemporaneous exposition by the very same person; His Majesty who had granted the Commission also made this Proclamation, and he did it by and with the advice of the same persons as the Proclamation was issued, by and with the advice of the Privy Council, with whose advice and consent the Commission and Instructions were equally framed ; therefore, you have here a complete picture of the minds of those persons, and what they thought they were setting about, what their object was, and what they thought they had done, because we have the advantage, first of all, not merely the intention and the purpose disclosed to us, but we have what they did, and then we have the statement that this is what we have done, so that your Lordships are supplied here with an apparatus of interpretation of an exceptional character; you have the very voice of the persons who wrote these words speaking, and speaking in contemporary documents, as to their intention and as to what they thought they had achieved. That is why I say the problem here is considerably facilitated in contrast with problems of interpretation generally, when you have to go in search of the purpose. Here you are told the purpose, and you are told it not by extrinsic documents, you are told it actually by the documents them-selves, which are the foundation of the right claimed. My Lord, I will leave that controversy with that submission, and the position, therefore, is one of very exceptional character in that respect.

Viscount FINLAY : I cannot see what difference it makes?

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, my Lord.

Viscount FINLAY : It comes to the same thing.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Exactly, but it will not do to dissociate the two documents.

Viscount FINLAY : Oh no, that is clear.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is why I say it is so important that we should have their own declaration of what was intended. I shall recur to that a little later on, but I want to take up one point where I differ from my learned friend. He produced a few additional documents, and announced that, in his submission, they evidenced that there had been a very sudden change of policy in reference to the relations between Newfoundland and the mainland. My Lords, the documents, on examination, disclose no such sudden change of policy at all, and I will ask your attention to them for a moment, because it perhaps has a little importance. The suggestion, of course, that lay behind it was this : that whatever may have been the idea of His Majesty originally, in dealing with this matter through his advisers, if it was at first an idea to protect and preserve a fishery, there was some volte face took place, and in consequence of that, it was made a territorial jurisdiction. My Lords, I find, as I say, no sufficient evidence of that in the documents which my learned friend produced, and would your Lordships just consider this for a moment—it is again not a very important topic, but I cannot afford to let it go without my comment on it. You may remember that the Lords of Trade, in Volume II, page 387, had spoken of the coast of Labrador with regard to the fishery " upon the coast of Labrador, it will be impossible to prevent the French

Viscount
Haldane.

continuing to have the full Benefit of their former Commerce with the Indians of that Coast, unless some British Settlement should be made there or sufficient Cruizers stationed with Instructions to the Commanders to seize all french Ships coming within a certain Distance of that Coast." Now it is quite true that there two methods of preventing the French continuing to have the full benefit of their former commerce with the

p. 921

Mr. Macmillan.

Indians of that coast are mentioned. It is equally, I think true to say that neither of the methods was, in the event, adopted—neither. What the Lords of Trade are dealing with is, if I may remind your Lordships, the putting into force of the fifth and sixth Articles of the definitive Treaty relating to the fishery at Newfoundland. Where I do agree with my learned friend is that the matter was taken up first, before they came to the question of Governments at all; but my agreement with him there results in a very great divergence from him the moment after wards. I do agree with him that this topic of the Labrador Coast was dealt with first of all and laid on one side as a completed matter ; but observe what they were dealing with : they were dealing with the question of the fifth and sixth Articles of the definitive Treaty relating to the fishery at Newfoundland, and they were considering the question of what alterations should be made in the Instructions to the Governor of Newfoundland in order to conform them to the above mentioned stipulations of the definitive Treaty. That is what they were considering there. They were considering the question of fishery alone, and the remit to them was to consider how that can best be dealt with, what alterations must be made in the Instructions to the Governor of Newfoundland in order to ensure that these fifth and sixth Articles of the Treaty of Paris, which had just been concluded, relating to the fishery, may be effectively carried out ; and the Lords of Trade, as I say, were concerned with the problem of how that might be done.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount HALDANE : You notice that at this juncture it is either that British settlements may be made there or British cruisers sent, as if it was the same thing.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Well, my Lord, I think there are alternative suggestions there, are there not ?

Viscount HALDANE : They are alternative, but the point is that the settlement and the cruiser is treated as having the same effect.

Mr. MACMILLAN : For the object in view, yes ; you could secure it either by having British settlements or British cruisers ; that is quite true. The next document we are referred to is New Document No. 10, of the 17th March,

1763. Here is Lord Egremont writing to the Lords of Trade that he has the King's Command to acquaint their Lordships that their representation has been taken into consideration, and he says, " I am therefore commanded to signify to Your Lordships His Majesty's pleasure, that you do, without loss of Time, prepare a Draught of Instructions for the Governor of Newfoundland for this Year, with such alterations from or Additions to, the Instructions, which have been formerly given in time of Peace, as your Lordships shall judge necessary or expedient, in order to render them conformable to the Stipulations of the Definitive Treaty, which I have already transmitted to you," he had transmitted to them the fifth and sixth Articles of the Definitive

Treaty. Then, my Lords, on the 21st March there is Document No. 11 which is said to have evoked the change of policy. Would your Lord-ships look at it a little more closely. The Lords of Trade are replying to His Majestys and they say they have obeyed his instructions with regard to the draft.

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : And they forward it.

12 Nov., 1926.
Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN: And they forward it ; then they say this : "It may be proper for us to observe to your Majesty that the Draught of of Instructions does not extend to the islands of Cape Breton or St Johns or to any part of the coasts of Acadia, Canada, or Labradore ; For those Islands and that tract of country having never been included within the limits of the Commission of the Governor of Newfound-land, to which we are confined by the words of the last reference made to us by your Majesty's Secretary of State, We have not thought ourselves at liberty to extend our consideration beyond the words of the Reference itself" ; therefore, what is happening is that these gentlemen having read the words of their reference on page 10, prepare a draft of Instructions for the Governor of Newfoundland for this year, and conceive themselves, rather pedantically as I submit, disabled from putting in anything about Labrador or putting anything in Labrador into the hands of the Governor of Newfoundland, because they were dealing with Instructions which they considered were limited to Newfoundland. My reading is different from my learned friend's. They say they have not felt themselves at liberty to go beyond the words of the Reference, because the Instructions to prepare a Draft of the Instructions to be given to the Governor of Newfoundland and if they had done so in their view would have been to exceed their Reference, so they drew attention to the limitation, and it is then that His Majesty, in Document No. 12, which is also printed in Volume 2 at page 389, tells them that he has judged it proper that all the coast of Labrador should be included in the Government of Newfoundland, whereupon they resume their task and they complete the draft of the Instructions by writing in "the Coast of Labrador " at all the appropriate places.

Sir JOHN SIMON : It is not to interrupt you that I am intervening, I assure you, but you will find that the last letter you referred to which you summarise, said : I want a new Commission to Graves, not only for Newfoundland, but also for the Coast of Labrador. Surely, the explanation is the relation between the Instructions and the Commission ; if the Commission was only going to be for the Island of Newfoundland, the Instructions could not have a bigger ambit, and it is because they want a bigger ambit that they have to alter the Commission. Is not that how it goes ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : I do not think so.

p. 923

Sir JOHN SIMON : You did not read it.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I will read all that is necessary, "It may be proper for us to observe to your Majesty that the Draught of Instructions does not extend to the islands of Cape Breton or St. Johns or to any part of the coasts of Acadia, Canada or Labradore ; For those Islands and that tract of country having never been included within the limits of the Commission of the Governor of Newfoundland, to which we are confined by the words of the last reference made to us by your Majesty's Secretary of State. We have not thought ourselves at liberty to extend our consideration beyond the words of the Reference itself" ; I suggest that these persons having a remit to deal with the Instructions to the Governor of Newfoundland found themselves in this position, that the existing Commission is, of course, a Newfoundland Commission only, and they cannot frame Instructions going beyond Newfoundland for a person whose existing Commission is for Newfoundland unless the Commission is expanded also ; therefore, they are not saying here this ought not to be done, they are simply saying : Within the terms of our remit we cannot do that until we get some Instructions as to what is to be done with regard to Labrador.

12 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount FINLAY : I think that is rather a narrow view.

Mr. MACMILLAN : If your Lordship pleases.

Viscount FINLAY : I am only speaking for myself, of course ; it is my individual impression.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is no doubt a matter of impression. I should have thought what they were in difficulty about was this : how can we prepare Instructions for a Governor whose Commission limits him to Newfoundland which runs in Labrador.

Viscount FINLAY : But since that the Governor of Newfoundland has had imposed on him a certain bit of coast.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Not by this time, my Lord. With great respect, this was all before that was done. The whole point about this is that my learned friend sought to get that emphasis which I thought was not well founded.

Viscount HALDANE : This is written early, this is March.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, the point of it, or at least I assume it was the point, it must have had a point, was to suggest that there had been a reconsideration of the policy with regard to Labrador at some point here, and that if one read these letters, one would find evidence of a change of policy between the Lords of Trade's Report, the first document

p. 924

I have read, and the issue of the Commission. My submission is that there is no such abrupt change of front, or change of policy at all, and there is nothing more here than the question of how is this Labrador matter to be dealt with, and His Majesty says, " Put the coast of Labrador into the hands of the Governor of Newfoundland," and that is the object with which it is to be worked out, and that is what happened, of course—but that there is some startling change of policy in reference to the relation between Newfoundland and the Mainland, is in my humble submission, not supported at all.

(Adjourned for a short time.)

AFTERNOON SESSION.

Viscount
Haldane.

12 Nov., 1926.
—
Viscount Finlay.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : My Lords, it may perhaps be of interest in connection with the authority attaching to the words of the Proclamation, to say I find that Lord Watson, in reference to this very Proclamation, treats it as being tantamount to an enactment and not merely a declaration, in the case that has already been referred to by my learned friend of St. Catherine's Milling and Lumber Co. v. The Queen, in 14 Appeal Cases, at 54, I find that Lord Watson discussing this Royal Proclamation and its effect says, " The Proclamation also enacts that no private person "—and there are other instances of the same sort, where the authority which is attached to a Royal Proclamation of this sort is regarded as practically tantamount to the authority of an enactment.

Viscount
Haldane.

Viscount HALDANE : Does he give any reason for that ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, my Lord.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount HALDANE : There was, of course, the reason that in those days it was the prerogative of the King to deal with boundaries; of course, here it was done in the Act of 1774, but usually it was constitutional to do it by Proclamation.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Certainly, my Lord, it was a public executive act by the Crown.

Viscount FINLAY : I do not think this amounted to an enactment. You may have a Proclamation declaring an Act to be unlawful, and I

The Lord
Chancellor.

think Lord Coke says that aggravates the guilt of disobedience to the Statute, but it was the Statute which had made it illegal, and a Proclamation cannot make it illegal if its not illegal in law.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Certainly not in such a case, because that is merely making clear what the legislature has done, informing the public, so that they may not plead ignorance of it ; but where the executive instrument itself is the Proclamation, then it is the most authoritative document 'you can have ; it is not preceded by an Act of Parliament which is subsequently the subject of a Proclamation, but it has its own inherent force.

Viscount
Haldane.

Viscount HALDANE : But is within the prerogative ; we had a discussion about it in regard to Heligoland ; Lord Salisbury did it by Statute and Mr. Gladstone took great exception to it, and there was a very learned debate as to the prerogative, and in the result the thing was done not by Proclamation but by Statute. Again, in the boundary case of 1884 Lord Selborne asked us how we would wish it done, and we said by the prerogative, but it was said, No, this is 1884, and it is better that it should be done by Statute.

12 Nov., 1926.
Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN: Of course, it removes all possible doubt, but this act was an act within the competency of His Majesty as a proper executive act, and no other authority was needed ; it stood on its own footing as an executive act, therefore it is of the highest importance and of the highest significance—indeed everyone has agreed, I think, that in Canadian history this Proclamation which has been discussed so much before your Lordships is one of the most important and fundamental documents of the whole history of Canada ; therefore, it is not a document which can be lightly dismissed; it is a document whose significance is of the greatest importance in the administration of these newly ceded territories.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I am very far from suggesting that you should curtail anything you desire to say, but, for our convenience, how long do you think you are likely to require to complete your argument ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : I anticipate that I will readily finish on Monday ; in fact, I shall make a point of doing so. I am endeavouring at this late stage to select for treatment some of those topics that seem to be more outstanding, and I was greatly concerned with the question of the approach to this question and the critical materials available to your Lordships in assisting in its proper interpretation.

Viscount HALDANE : What you want to show is that an enormous tract of territory had been conceded to the Crown and the Crown made disposition of it with reservations.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes. May I perhaps add to that, that they proceeded by two stages. The first stage was the stage which I will call the Labrador stage in order to use a neutral term ; the second stage was the governmental stage. The first stage was to put in operation the 5th and 6th Articles of the Treaty—a fishery question. That was what they were dealing with there

; they disposed of it in the manner indicated. How they disposed of it is for your Lordships to judge, but they did dispose of that by itself and then passed on to the governmental areas. That is to my mind another and most significant element in this case, because if my friend is right, they had, in the Labrador part of this administrative programme, wittingly or unwittingly, dealt with a great governmental question ; because the result of what they did was to subject this green area to the Newfoundland Government just as effectually as any part of the Province of Quebec is subject to the administration of Quebec.

Lord Sumner.

12 Nov., 1926.

Therefore they did in effect in 1763, by virtue of the Commission and Proclamation, on my learned friend's construction, deal, not with the mere fishery question but with a delimitation of frontiers of the governmental area and expanded the Government of Newfoundland so as to embrace every bit of the green area and submit it to its jurisdiction, in exactly the same way and to the same extent as any part of the Province of Quebec is subject to the jurisdiction of the Government of Quebec at this moment. That is their contention : that they have the govern-mental disposition of this area in exactly the same way as the Government of Quebec has the surveillance of its territory, and that therefore the first stage was not truly a stage of dealing with a fishery matter, but was a stage of dealing with a governmental area ; my learned friends have to bring it up to that.

Lord Sumner.

Viscount FINLAY : You have not read what Lord Watson said yet.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord ; I said that he had used the word " enacting " of this Proclamation ; that is all.

Viscount FINLAY : Is that all you say on that ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord.

Viscount FINLAY : Where is the reference ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is in 14 Appeal Cases at page 54. It may be said to be a small point, but it is the language used by a very exact lawyer when he is describing the effect of this Proclamation.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : The expression has found its way into the headnote, too.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord SUMNER : I think one might say that there is nothing which is in the nature of a grant, in words, but the Governor is to exercise his authority in that territory. The land is not granted.

Mr. MACMILLAN: It merely defines, does it not, the area within which he is to operate ?

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord SUMNER : It tells him within what area he is to operate ; it is not actual annexation of the territory. Personally I should have expected to find it in the Proclamation, not in the Commission, but if you read them together the operative words are the same ; it is only for the attendant expression that you want to rely on one or the other.

Lord
Warrington

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Constitutionally the Order in Council is the authority.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, no doubt the Order in Council approving the Proclamation.

Sir JOHN SIMON : The Order in Council approving the Commission.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I am not sure that this Proclamation was approved by Order in Council.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, it was, my Lord. I never myself saw the reason for the importance that my friend attached to it. The Commission came, and so did the instructions, before the Privy Council.

12 Nov., 1926.

Lord
Warrington.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount HALDANE : This was a military officer ; it directed him to exercise care and inspection over the Coast of Labrador. Strictly speaking, one would have expected that would have been done by the Lord High Admiral, but here the Lords of Trade do it, and apparently they communicate with the Admiralty and attach a Commission drawn up by them ; it was done in both cases.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes ; the only importance of it is the approach to the problem. Is the document for construction, the document which we find in the Proclamation at page 154, to be interpreted with the aid of the Commission and the other documents, or is the document to be interpreted the Commission, which is to be interpreted by the aid of the Proclamation ?

The Lord
Chancellor.

Lord WARRINGTON : The Proclamation by itself really does nothing at all, because there is no appointment of the Governor. The appointment of the Governor of Newfoundland and the Coast of Labrador is the essential feature in the administrative action.

Mr. MACMILLAN : In order to carry it into effect.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord WARRINGTON : This appointment of the Governor comes first, and by the time the Governor was appointed, he was appointed both of Newfoundland the Coast of Labrador, whatever it means, before

p. 928

the Proclamation. He had been there six months performing his functions as Governor.

Mr. MACMILLAN : If the Proclamation was the document that effected the annexation, then the carrying out of that annexation through the medium of Commissions and so on, was merely executory of the announced decision of His Majesty. It must not be overlooked, I think, that the Legislature's view of it was that it had been done by the Proclamation. The only point about it is this ; it is not a very large point, but it is important, I think, to consider where you start in this case. Do you start with the Proclamation and use the Commission 10 to help you to interpret it, or do you begin with the Commission and use the Proclamation to help you to interpret it ? Whichever way you start, you have to consider them both.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I do not remember the Order in Council approving the Proclamation. It is not in Sir John Simon's Calendar.

Mr. MACMILLAN : You get it in the narrative : " We have thought fit, with the advice of our Privy Council, to issue this our Royal Proclamation." The whole of them were before the Privy Council.

My Lords, I was just pursuing to some extent the same line as my learned friend. He said there had been a very sudden change of policy. My submission is that there was no very sudden change of policy ; that there was merely a further consideration of how to carry out this conception of carrying into effect the 5th and 6th Articles of the Treaty. His Majesty says : " You must put all the Coast of Labrador into these instruments." Whereupon, through the documents which have been recovered by my learned friend, we see the draughtsman at work. He has done just what you would expect. He takes his red ink pen and at every place where he comes to " Newfoundland, " he puts in " the Coast of Labrador " and all the rest of it—exactly what one would expect the draughtsman to do. In the Commission that is naturally inserted at several places. I think my learned friend said that the word " rivers " had been put in also. I remember he thought that was of importance.

Viscount HALDANE : I think he laid more stress on the words " care and inspection."

Mr. MACMILLAN : I am going to lay a good deal of stress on those words in a moment; I am merely leading up to it on the question of the material available. Therefore when you look at the Commission before and after the alteration, it is simply that the coasts of Labrador have been put in, as they necessarily had to be put in, in the circumstances ; and in the instructions you find the same thing done.

[1927lab]

I think my learned friend said he found the word " rivers " was added and he thought that was of some materiality.

12 Nov., 1926.

—
Mr. Macmillan.

Sir JOHN SIMON: " Territories " was the word I mentioned.

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, it was " river " I was thinking of.

Viscount
Haldane.

Sir JOHN, SIMON : I did mention both ; it was quite a small point.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount HALDANE : In those days there was a Privy Council, and what corresponded to the Cabinet of to-day was a Committee of the Privy Council, selected very loosely ; sometimes the Lord Chief Justice sat on it and sometimes he did not. At any rate the King is beginning a Cabinet or semi-Cabinet ; he appointed his own Cabinet.

12 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : There is no doubt that constitutionally everything was correctly done according to the forms of the day. The question is, what was done. Then the two documents having passed through the draughtsman's hands are issued, and then there is a warrant for the new Commission which was authorised by the Privy Council on the 30th March, 1763. What effect that has, I do not follow. It was very proper that it should be authorised by the Privy Council, and it was issued to him.

Then one point my learned friend thought was of much consequence was the fact that there is a letter in the 8th Volume, at page 4110, from which he derived much satisfaction. That really comes into a later part of my address, but as it is brought in at this stage before the Commission was issued, it is perhaps important to look at it.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : That is a letter from the Hudson's Bay Company.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is a letter from the Hudson's Bay Company's Secretary to the Earl of Egremont. It was the most natural thing in the world for those who were considering at this time the placing of the coast of Labrador under the Government of Newfoundland to enquire : "Where do the Hudson Bay rights on the coast terminate, lest we inadvertently subject to the Government of Newfoundland a part of the coast which is already in the hands of the Hudson's Bay Company, who have their own independent jurisdiction." Therefore, the question was a very natural one indeed, and here is how the matter is put : "Having this Evening received from Mr. Rivers a letter signifying Your Lordships desire to know as soon as possible what are the Limits upon the Coast between the Hudsons Bay Company and the Coasts of Labrador, I have laid the same before Sir Win. Baker as Governor of the said Company, who has directed me to present his Compliments and acquaint your Lordship, he will wait on You thereupon to Morrow Morning or at any other more convenient Time that shall be appointed."

If your Lordships will reconstruct the situation : Assuming that the Executive was minded to place part of the coast of Labrador under the Governor of Newfoundland, it was essential for them to ascertain whether they might not be giving way a part of the coast of Labrador that was already in the Hudson's Bay territory, and the language is most significant, they asked : What are the limits upon the coast between the Hudson's Bay Company and the coast of Labrador ? " In that case I think one may say that the word coast " plainly has the meaning of the seaward margin. In many places I quite admit it has the larger connotation, but here I should submit, without doubt it means upon the coast in the sense of the seaward margin. Then we shall assume as my learned friend did, that the information was obtained, that they were told that the Charter of the Hudson's Bay Company gives the Hudson's Bay Company, as you remember, the land within the Straits of Hudson Bay. What happens, therefore, is this. The person concerned in fixing what are called the limits of the coast to be confided to Newfoundland, selects, without necessarily knowing precisely where it is geographically, the term which is used of the Hudson Bay boundary, namely, that it is the entrance to Hudson Straits, and says : " Now all the coast from that point down to St. John's River we shall give to Newfoundland and if we give that part of the coast to Newfoundland we shall plainly not be infringing any rights of the Hudson's Bay Company." They were not concerned to say where the precise entrance to Hudson Straits was. They took the definition of the Hudson's Bay Company's territory, and then they say : " Anything that is not within the Hudson Bay portion of the coast we shall confide to the Governor of Newfoundland."

12 Nov., 1926.

Lord
Warrington.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord
Warrington.

Mr. Macmillan.

Therefore this letter, I submit, so far from being hostile to my submission, on the contrary supports me very much, because it shows a person who is dealing with the coast and who says : "But there is somebody already on this coast ; now tell me, upon the coast, where do the Hudson Bay people end ?"—"Oh, their limit is the entrance to Hudson Straits."—"Well, if I give the coast from the Hudson Straits down to St. John's River I shall not invade any portion of the Hudson Bay territory." That was the source of the words, but, if I may say so, it is a tremendous leap to take from the fact that on the coast the Governor of Newfoundland has, as one of his limits, the entrance to Hudson Straits—it is a tremendous leap to jump from that fact, which is, of course, true, to this : that the territory confided to the Governor of Newfoundland was coterminous with the Hudson Bay boundary right down into the interior. Because the inference drawn from it is this ; that if you find out where the Hudson's Bay Company is up there and then you are told that the coast from there right down to the River St. John's is to be given to the Governor of Newfoundland, in some way you are assuming that that brings in along with it the whole of the interior of the Hudson Bay territory.

p. 931

Viscount Finlay.

Lord WARRINGTON : The materiality of it, so far as it strikes me, is this : that it shows that the Hudson's Bay Company did not claim over the watershed. They exclude Hudson Bay from the Atlantic watershed.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Will your Lordship pardon me if I venture to traverse for a moment that suggestion ? It is very striking that you do not find Cape Chidley mentioned at all ; they simply use the expression ' the entrance to Hudson Straits.

Lord WARRINGTON : They did not give the whole coast. If the Hudson Bay were claiming that proposed line of 1713 then they, would have been claiming a bit of the actual selvedge of the sea as part of their territory ; but they were not claiming that.

12 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Your Lordship, I am afraid, has assumed rather against me that at the time they were speaking of this they had completely made up their minds as to where the entrance to Hudson Straits was. Now I rather agree with my learned friend, Sir John Simon, in that matter. He said that in the rather imperfect maps of those days it was not very clear where the entrance was. Therefore, instead of taking a very fine point or Cape Chidley they said the entrance to Hudson Straits. Then that language was imported into the Commission for the purpose of defining the portion of the coast that was to be confided to the Governor of Newfoundland ; but as to where precisely the Straits begin is a different question altogether. It is comparatively easy to look at the map as you see it now and say you have got an exact apex here which is very easy to see. That is the threshold of Hudson Bay, but if your Lordships look at some of the earlier maps you will see that so far from it being a definite point like that ; it was very dubious where it was.

Viscount FINLAY : The real materiality to my mind is that attention is concentrated on the coast. It obviously means the line of water in that connection.

Mr. MACMILLAN : In that connection undoubtedly it does. I hope I make clear my point, that the mere fact that the two, so to speak, meet upon the coast, does not mean that they keep company down to the watershed. Now that puts my position in a sentence.

Viscount FINLAY : In fact, it implies rather the contrary.

Viscount Finlay. Mr. MACMILLAN : It may well do so, but I think I could not put it more clearly than that. The mere fact that they meet here does not necessarily mean that they both go down to the watershed together in company, hand in hand ; and I say that meeting as they do at the entrance to Hudson's Straits, the coast really is understood. I am

p. 932

Mr. Macmillan.

going to submit a little later on that the Hudson Bay people did not know where they could go at that time, but even if they did, their line was down at the Watershed and they parted company there. My learned friend said that when one gets them starting from the same point, for some reason or other they would both go down the watershed together. It is there that you have such a hiatus in my learned friend's submission. Therefore so far from the Egremont letter being one of the considered documents in this case, if anything it rather supports me, as it indicates that what they were concerned with was to see where the Hudson Bay territory ended upon the coast, in order that they might give no Hudson Bay coast to the Newfoundland Governor.

Viscount Finlay. The LORD CHANCELLOR : I do not know whether you would agree : is the word " Coast " used in two different senses in that letter ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : I think Sir John might maintain with some show of reason that " the Coast of Labrador," in line 3, was one of those cases where it might be said to have the larger meaning.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : It looks a little odd, otherwise ; the frame of the sentence rather points to that.

12 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes.

Viscount FINLAY : I should have read that in this way : What are the limits upon the coast between the Hudson's Bay Company and the Coast of Labrador ? The Coast of Labrador is a thing the care and protection of which was handed over to the Governor of Newfoundland.

Viscount Haldane.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I should like at once to assent, my Lord, but the Lord Chancellor put it to me that you are considering there two 2 territories, the Hudson Bay territory and the

Mr. Macmillan.

Labrador territory, and the Labrador territory is described as " the Coast of Labrador." That is the suggestion. Then you are asked, what are the limits upon the Coast ? Now I think I will have your Lordships' assent to this : that it is plainly upon the littoral. These two things are referred to : Hudson's Bay Company and the Coast of Labrador, and it would be quite a tenable position to say that that is two territories meeting on the Coast.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : It is : Where upon the Coast do those two territories meet ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, that is how it would be put.

Viscount FINLAY : It struck me that the " Coast of Labrador " is used as being the territory of which the care and protection was confided to the Governor of Newfoundland.

Lord
Warrington.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That, of course, is quite true. I do not know whether it is much more than verbal ; it is after all only a letter, which is not a considered document to which one would attach the same importance. There are many other instances of the same sort of thing and your Lordships will not hear from me the suggestion that the word "Coast" is not frequently used in the sense of territory.

p. 933

Viscount HALDANE : There is no reference here to the Coast of Hudson Bay ; it is the limits between Hudson Bay and the Coast of Labrador.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, I quite appreciate the point. There is a point there for my learned friend and there is a point for me, and there-fore we may perhaps call quits ; on the whole I think I have perhaps the best of the point. Your Lordships do notice throughout that the area confided to the Governor of Newfoundland is always spoken of as between certain limits. Those words are rather striking. It is always "between the said limits." Now the only limits which are mentioned are the entry to Hudson Straits on the north and the River St Johns on the south. These are the only limits and the coast is always referred to as the coast within these limits. They are the only indications of boundary which we get. We have no interior boundary at all ; we have something that is to be found between two limits, two fixed points upon the coast, associated with appointments and so related to the fishery question, which is to be put under the care and inspection of the. Governor.

Lord WARRINGTON : Is that quite true of the Proclamation ? First of all, the River St. John is first mentioned in the description of the boundaries of Quebec : "The Government of Quebec, bounded on the Labrador Coast by the River St. John, and from thence by a line drawn from one head of that river" and so on. Now quite clearly there the line of the river is the line of the boundary of Quebec, not some point.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Quite, because it is drawn from the head of it.

Lord WARRINGTON : It is drawn from the head of it. Then you go back to where the Proclamation refers to the Coast of Labrador and you get the words "all that Coast, from the River St. John's to Hudson's Streights." Now surely that means all the coast from the boundary of Quebec.

Mr. MACMILLAN : As your Lordship appreciates Newfoundland was disposed of before the Quebec boundaries were thought of.

Lord WARRINGTON : I know, but they may have fixed the boundary of Quebec by the boundary of Newfoundland.

Mr. MACMILLAN : And moreover, here, instead of saying "from

[1927lab]

12 Nov., 1926.
Mr. Macmillan.

the River St. John and the head thereof," as they have said in the Quebec boundary, it is simply "from the River St. John." So much for the famous letter of the 23rd March, 1768. The alterations, as I say, in the Commission and Instructions, merely consist in putting in " Labrador coast," and nothing much turns upon that except that I may just call attention to this. No revisal takes place with regard to the clause about religion, no alteration is made upon the instructions, so that a large number of Catholics were going to be subjected to the Governor of Newfoundland on my learned friend's submission. The Governor of Newfoundland had still to extend tolerance to everybody except Papists. It is rather interesting to note that in the alterations in the instructions this question of religion is apparently quite present to the mind of the draughtsman, because you will find in the red ink matter upon the instructions they direct a query to the Governor of Newfoundland : What number of Irish Catholics is there in all the towns of Newfoundland, and what proportion do they bear to the Protestants ? That was put in at that time in red ink. They did not authorise him to relax in any way the religious tolerance in favour of those who practised the Catholic religion.

12 Nov., 1926.
Mr. Macmillan.

Now the act which was disposed of first of all was in conformity with the instructions given to the Lords of Trade, the putting into force of the fifth and sixth articles of the Treaty of Paris through the medium of a new arrangement which had to be devised, which was devised, and which is contained in the Commission to the Governor, That is the way in which it was to be done. It was done by putting all the coasts of Labrador within the limits specified under the Governor of Newfoundland.

Now I would ask for a little attention to what, after all, are the important words we have to deal with here. Before we go outside the ambit of the material documents themselves it is necessary to scrutinise these documents in order to see whether they really raise a doubt or difficulty at all. It is only if a doubt or difficulty emerges from the language used in the constituent documents that it is necessary to resort to all the other apparatus which has been collected here. Taking the Commission first of all, the material words are : "All the coasts of Labrador from the entrance of Hudsons Streights to the River Saint Johns which discharges itself into the Sea nearly opposite the West End of the Island of Anticosti." It is true that my learned friend can produce instances—there are quite a number—where territorial areas are described as a coast, e.g., Coast of Guinea, Slave Coast, Niger Coast, and so on ; but when you are using that word in that sense I do not think you use it in the plural. When you talk of the coasts of a place I do not think that that is ever used as a territorial designation in the way in which the Coast of Virginia was used. My learned friend had a very good example of the word in the "Coast of Virginia."

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Is there not a scriptural instance where the word is used in the plural ?

p. 935

Viscount FINLAY: Oh, yes, there is the "Coasts of Caesarea Philippi."

Mr. MACMILLAN : But I was meaning was there any case where you can get a geographical term like "Coast of Virginia," "Gold Coast," "Coromandel Coast," and a host of other examples, with the word used in the plural? I cannot recall any place which is called "So-and-So Coasts" as a geographical term. I know of plenty of instances of the word "Coast" in the singular.

Viscount FINLAY : Take the case of the " Coasts of Caesarea Philippi." That denotes a certain territory.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I thought I saw it quoted somewhere in one of the cases.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Well, my Lord, some of your Lordships thought that the word " coast " in the singular was more indicative of a littoral, and some that the word " coasts " in the plural was more indicative of a littoral. In those circumstances I think perhaps, I had better leave the question. Words have their own significance. The fortune of a word is in the ear that hears it. The impression on my ear of the word " coasts " in the plural rather suggested a littoral area than " coast " in the singular. But here, of course, both are used. The area which is confided to the Governor of Newfoundland—both the " coasts of Labrador " and the " coast of Labrador " because both terms are used indifferently with regard to it—as I say, whatever it is, must be something which is bounded by two points on the coast. " The entrance to Hudsons Streights " is undoubtedly a coastal point. It is some place on the sea-shore. The entrance to a bay is on the sea-shore. The River St. John is also, in my submission, here used as indicating a point on the shore. When you want to use the river along its whole length as a boundary you have an example of how that is done in the boundary of Quebec, where it says that you go up to the top of the St. John, and then from the head-waters of the St. John carry your line. Here the boundary is from one place plainly on the coast, namely the entrance to Hudsons Strait, to another place. And you naturally assume that if one of those places is upon the coast, the other place will also be on the coast. There can be no dubiety that the entrance to Hudson's Strait is on the littoral. You are therefore embarked upon a perambulation of the coast in the sense of being on the shore, and you naturally terminate on the shore ; and where you terminate is at the River St. John being a point on the coast, and you have no instruction thereafter to follow up the River St. John to its head. You have arrived at your destination when you have arrived at that point on the coast.

It is striking that no depth whatever inland is mentioned. No depth whatever inland was necessary to be mentioned, having regard to the purpose of the whole undertaking, what was called the governing consideration of the whole matter, namely the securing the margin of the sea for fishery purposes.

p. 936

Beyond that there is nothing as it humbly seems to me, of importance in this case for my learned friend excepting the use of the word " territories," which occurs two or three times in the course of the Commission. That word has been much underlined by my learned friend. It is the appropriate word to use of any area of jurisdiction. And as the Governor of Newfoundland was entrusted with a territorial jurisdiction on the shore of Labrador it is difficult to conceive what other word could have been used, for " territory " is the appropriate word to use for any jurisdiction over any area. But it does not carry you any length as to the depth inland of the territory over which the jurisdiction is constituted. It is the appropriate word to use for what was entrusted to the Governor of Newfoundland, which was, as we concede, a territorial jurisdiction. How else it could have been described is a little difficult to imagine. Therefore that word in itself is not very material, as I submit. It is perhaps important to notice that the Commission expressly enjoins this Governor that he is not to do " anything by virtue of the Commission or the powers hereby granted contrary or oppugnant to the Act for Encouraging the Trade to Newfoundland." That is the Act of 1699, which I shall have a little to say about later when I come to the open and free fishery question. This Governor is expressly directed that he is not to do anything contrary to that Act for Encouraging the Trade to Newfoundland. The Trade to Newfoundland, as I will show shortly, was the cod fishery and nothing else. That was to control all his actings. He was in no way to infringe that Statute relating to the cod fishery of Newfoundland, which was extended in its operation to the new coast.

The contrast, when you pass from this matter of the regulation of the fishery through this particular arrangement, to the setting up of the new Governments, is an exceedingly important one. I am going to ask your Lordships to be good enough to reconstitute the position with me for a moment if your Lordships would kindly do so. The sketch map which we have always found useful in this case, which is contained in the pocket of the red book, is apt, if I may say so, to confuse the issue to some extent. It presents the problem in an attractive form, but it does not present it by stages. I would ask your Lordships to consider for a moment what I think is an exceedingly important consideration. If you take the little hand-map and obliterate all the colour upon it, that is the position upon which the executive Acts of 1763 supervened.

In this area ceded to us there had been the French settlements, and a certain amount of French trading going on, and some fishing ; but apart from the Hudson's Bay area, whatever that was, the whole of it was at the disposition of the British crown. Pray note what is suggested, my Lord. It is suggested that the first thing that was achieved was the carving out of this territory of the green area as we now see it, plus the pink area. If you can conceive that map with everything else deleted, and the first stage of the trans-action pictorially represented on the map, what would be the result of the Commission ? Take the Commission by itself first, without the Proclamation. What would have happened ? According to my learned friend you would have drawn upon that map a large territory the boundaries of which, as I am going to show your Lordships in a moment would be very difficult of ascertainment at certain points, and you would have dedicated the whole of that to Newfoundland and submitted the whole of that to Newfoundland for all time as effectively as the Quebec territory was submitted to Quebec. And therefore when the Government proceeded to the next stage of setting up the Governments in the ceded territory, they had already passed and completed a delimitation of one governmental area.

If you take in your hand the map without any colouring, and then take in your hand the instruction to the Governor " All the Coast of Labrador " between these points, and then proceed to try and draw a boundary, might I suggest your Lordships would see how it could be done. Let us assume that my learned friend is right, and that at that time the watershed was the known eastern boundary of the Hudson's Bay territory. You would start then from the entrance to Hudson's Strait. He would ask, let us say, a Hudson's Bay man, to accompany him down the watershed. Observe that his destination is the St. John's River. I submit he would never have reached the St. John's River on that route. He would have gone down the watershed, and when he had got a certain length his Hudson Bay companion would desert him because his Hudson's Bay companion would bear away to the west and leave him. How does he get to St. John's River, and what right has he to create a boundary there of any sort whatever ? He has followed the Hudson's Bay boundary down the watershed, but his destination is St. John's River. How does he get to the St. John's River point on the shore ? My Lord, it is not a possible proposition. He has no directions to do it. He is not going to follow the height of land, because if he followed the height of land he would never reach St. John's. The best way to look as it is to look at my learned friend's map without any colouring upon it at all. You see what happens. According to him he had both the green and the pink given to him definitely by the Commission. Suppose he is going down the watershed in company with the Hudson's Bay man — I suggest he would not have gone down that line at all at that time, but I want to concede as much as I can to test it—how does he get from there to the mouth of the River St. John at all ? What are his sailing directions between these two points ? As long as he is working round the coast he will come to his destination, but if he embarks inland and walks down the watershed it is certainly not the Hudson's Bay watershed which will conduct him to St. John's, because the Hudson's Bay watershed is miles away from there. The only thing he could do would be to come down—taking my friend's lines as if they were accurate for the moment—to the point where the Hudson's Bay man would go to the west. He might say " I encounter the height of land. It is not the Hudson's Bay watershed, but another watershed this time, a watershed of rivers going down to the St. Lawrence." He might say, "I propose to walk along that." But if he walks along that I ask him in the first place what is his authority, because this time it cannot mean that he is to be bounded by Hudson's Bay territory. It must be because he likes being on watersheds, and therefore proposes to walk along a watershed whenever he meets one. He could then walk along that, I suppose, in search of the upper waters of the St. John's River, and then if he ever met it up there he would, I suppose, walk down that to the coast. But what sanction is to be found in the language of this grant— " all the Coasts of Labrador" between these two points—for drawing upon this map an area which must now be supposed to be then as definite as . your Lordships are asked to declare it to be now, and for colouring it, and saying, now that is disposed of we shall proceed to deal with the Quebec area.

Mr. Macmillan.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I want you to develop this point. May not this be suggested ? This part of Labrador had an Atlantic coast and a St. Lawrence coast. Now for the purpose of defining the Atlantic coast he takes all the rivers that run into the Atlantic, and carries his coast up to the watershed of those rivers. For that purpose he would, when he had left his Hudson's Bay friend, go on round the watershed of the rivers running into the Atlantic ; he would go perhaps theoretically down to Cape Charles, over these bumps that you have marked. But then he has still got the St. Lawrence coast of Labrador to deal with up to St. John's River. For that purpose he would travel back along his watershed until he found the River St. John. In that way that would give him some kind of warrant.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Some kind of warrant, true, but is not that a very complicated inference to draw out of a dedication to Newfoundland of all the coasts of Labrador ?

The LORD CHANCELLOR : It may be so, but you were looking for an answer to the question.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I still have some difficulty in seeing exactly how he would do it. It would mean this. Wherever you have a coast it connotes a watershed. I suppose physically that is so. Therefore, if you get a coast which fronts upon two seas you will in each case take the watershed which drains to the sea-board as your boundary. But then, unfortunately, he does not do it on his map before your Lordships. He now claims along the 52nd degree of latitude.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : He cuts across this watershed.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, he cuts across the watershed. I am anxious for the moment to constitute the position upon which the Proclamation operates. Your Lordship follows my point. You see the importance of it, because it suggest that there was constituted a governmental area which is as important, and has all the attributes of a closed area then and there delimited, upon which all the functions of the Governor of Newfoundland, whatever those might come to be, are to operate, and which is now as much Newfoundland as any part of Quebec is Quebec, and that that was done by the use of the language I have quoted. On the other hand, my suggestion to your Lordship is that I meet the whole language quite naturally and simply by saying : Well, if you want to get from one point on the coast of Labrador to the other you naturally go round the coast until you come to the other place. How are you to ascertain the precise point of confluence of those two water-sheds in the great rolling plateau ? It must be scientifically ascertainable ; it must exist. Where you have an interior country you must have a watershed. To suggest that it was in the minds, or must be inserted in the minds of those who framed these documents, that they had in contemplation these two watersheds away in the interior, one of which was Hudson's Bay country and the other of which was not, but which was utilised for this purpose, and to suggest that that is to be elicited from the use of the words " coast of Labrador," I suggest is an exceedingly difficult inference to draw. The contrast between what was done when they were dealing with Governmental areas and when they were dealing with coast for fishing purposes is so conspicuous in the Proclamation of 1763 that it is worth looking at for a moment. Having passed from the question of Labrador, having passed from the question of how the Treaty of Paris was best to be carried out in its fishing articles, then, says my learned friend, they pass to another and very important subject. I drew the same contrast as he did between the two stages and I quite agree with him that it is a very important transition, and that the transition is marked by the most distinct change of language. I ask your Lordships to note the contrast between the precision with which the limits of a Governmental area are defined in the proclamation, with the vague and general language employed in the commission, by which it is said that the area in question was annexed to Newfoundland. My Lord, the proclamation on page 153 proceeds upon a preamble of " the extensive and valuable acquisitions in America secured to our Crown by the late definitive treaty of peace concluded at Paris the tenth day of February last." That includes the whole of this Labrador Peninsula in so far as it is not Hudson Bay territory. He has taken that into his consideration and then : "being desirous that all our loving subjects," and so on "may avail themselves with all convenient speed of the great benefits and advantages which must accrue therefrom to their commerce, manufactures, and navigation ; we have thought fit, with the advice of our Privy Council, to issue this our Royal Proclamation"—I am omitting the intervening words— "to erect . . . four distinct and separate governments styled and called" so and so. My Lords, did His Majesty overlook the fact that he had already created a distinct and separate government in part of the extensive and valuable acquisitions in America which he is setting out to partition ? I should have thought the preamble would then have run : "Whereas we have taken into our Royal consideration the extensive and valuable acquisitions in America, secured to our Crown, by the late definitive treaty of peace, and whereas by our commission of date (so and so) we have assigned to Newfoundland a large territory of 110,000 square miles of the ceded territory, and whereas we have still to dispose of the remaining ceded territories, therefore we propose to set up these further governments." Not so. What he sets out to do is to dispose of these extensive and valuable acquisitions in America, and then he does so with precision, and when His Majesty is minded to set up a Governmental area he does so in each instance in precise language by metes and bounds. First of all he sets up the Government of Quebec, the lozenge as my learned friend calls it, and he tells you exactly how it is bounded. He gives you directions how you are to go : "Bounded on the Labrador Coast by the River St. John and from thence"—whence, I ask ? From the Labrador coast—"and from thence by a line drawn from the head of that river through the Lake St. John to the south and of the Lake Nipissing."

Lord WARRINGTON : Thence from the River St. John, by a line drawn from the head of that river.

12 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I should not have so read it, but no doubt it must be susceptible of that reading. "Bounded on the Labrador Coast by the River St. John and from thence by a line drawn from the head of that river." You have to go up the river to the top of it ; then you take your point of departure. However, it does not matter. The point is this : whatever it be, they are precise limitations. You know exactly where to go, until you get a completely enclosed territory, and that is to be the Government of Quebec. Then you find East Florida and West Florida dealt with in the same way, and the Province of Grenada is dealt with by the enumeration of islands. That is the way His Majesty set about the fixing of territorial jurisdiction, and yet all the time, apparently unwittingly, possibly intentionally—my learned friend I think must say "intentionally"—he has already constituted an important mainland jurisdiction in the ceded territories which he is pro-posing to distribute and allocate, and upon his map there should already be shown a coloured area which is so extensive as to include the whole of the Labrador Peninsula other than what the Hudson's Bay Company have. My Lord, if my learned friend is right, what His Majesty had to consider at the second and important stage was not how much territory he could give to Quebec, because so far as that is concerned he had already found that Newfoundland was in possession, he had already given up to Newfoundland a very large area, and therefore in considering his boundaries of Quebec the matter had already been determined so far, at any rate, as the eastern boundary was concerned, and he could not go north any further with Quebec because he would be right into the territory already given to Newfoundland. It is upon that state of matters that the proclamation was to operate in carving out the Government, and there is not a word or suggestion that His Majesty had already carved a large area out of this ceded territory and had dedicated it to another Government.

p. 941

On the contrary ; having set out the four governmental areas, he then uses this very striking language. Seeing that of course I have had to deal with the fishery question, and that that is a question affecting this area, and that I have disposed of that area already, this is how I have done it : " And to the end that the open and free fishery of our subjects may be extended to and carried on upon the coast of Labrador, and the adjacent islands, we have thought fit, with the advice of our said Privy Council, to put all that coast, from the River St. John's to Hudson's Streights, together with the islands of Anticosti and the Madelaine, and all other smaller islands lying upon the said coast, under the care and inspection of our Governor of Newfoundland." He is rounding off the position there. He said : Here are my new Governments ; here is Quebec set up and established under this proclamation. I do not over-look the fact that I have put under the care and inspection of my Governor of Newfoundland for a specific purpose the coast of Labrador in order that the open and free fishery may be carried on thereon I have not overlooked that I have done that, and I recite that as a thing to be remembered as part of my distribution of this area. Yet this language here used at the time is apparently, in my learned friend's mind, sufficient to connote a dedication of this area to the Government of Newfoundland ; as important in its effect and as final and definitive as the dedication to the Government of Quebec of the territory which was included in Quebec, because the effect is exactly the same. At the present moment the claim made by Newfoundland over the green territory is just the same claim as the Dominion of Canada makes over any other part of Canada. Yet the recital of what had been done at that time is that certain coast between two points on the coast had been placed under the care and inspection of our Governor of Newfoundland. Why should one be, so to speak, attracted by the contrary interpretation ; more by token when it is said by my learned friend that it was not at all worth bothering about at the time, that it was not the main consideration, the governing consideration in their minds at all. In those circumstances I should have thought one would have selected the interpretation which was consonant with the object in view, which presents no difficulties of interpretation at all, is consonant with the ordinary use of language and is also consonant with the intention and purposes expressed at the time by those who were conversant with the whole matter. The word " coast " I do not think I need discuss at much greater length, but I do want to remind your Lordship of what was said with regard to the French shore when the question came up there. I have already dealt with it, but I would like just to remind your Lordship of that, because it is a very useful comment on the use of the word " coast " in the mouths of persons who were not considering this particular case that we are concerned with at all. Will your Lordship look first of all at the Treaty of Paris itself ? The translation is in Volume I at page 334. I refer to it for the rights of fishing that are alluded to in Article 5, one of the Articles remitted to the Lords of trade for consideration in order to alter the commission to Governor Graves : "The subjects of France shall have the liberty of fishing and drying on apart of the coasts of the Island of Newfoundland." I pause there for a moment. There is no doubt whatever that there, in the Treaty of Paris, the coasts of the Island of Newfoundland alluded to are sea coasts, and the place where they are to have the liberty of fishing and drying is a margin of the sea. They are to fish in the sea and to have the use of the margin of the coast for the purpose of drying. There you have, in connection with this very topic of fishing (and, if you please, drying the produce of fishing) a reference to part of the coasts of the Island of Newfoundland such as is specified in the 13th Article of the Treaty of Utrecht. Nobody seems, when drafting that Treaty Article, to have felt embarrassment because they were not defining the inward depth of it, the thing regulated itself by the purpose, and although this was an inter-national matter, much more a grave matter than a matter between two friendly parts of the Empire such as ours, yet they were content to give the right to the subjects of France, or to retain for the subjects of France, a right of resort to a part of the coasts of the Island of Newfoundland without any definition of depth whatever. It did become important later on to consider, just as it has become important to consider now what is the depth appropriate for a fishing shore, and in Volume V, on page 2181, you find first of all the necessary extracts from the Treaty of Utrecht ; then you find the Treaty of Paris which I have just read, the fifth article, and important material is there collected. Then you come to the official correspondence which arose, and it is very interesting to notice page 2185, my Lord.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord WARRINGTON : The 13th article of the Treaty of Utrecht is printed on that page 2181 ; it is referred to in the fifth article.

Mr. MACMILLAN : The fifth article of the treaty of Paris.

Lord WARRINGTON : All that the subjects of France were allowed there was the right of catching fish and using such part of the land, and that only, as was required for drying and so forth.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I thought I had made that abundantly clear.

Lord WARRINGTON : That is mere servitude.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I thought I had said so several times, my Lord. The point, however, is this : you might just as well have a war about the extent of a servitude as you might have a war about the extent of property. The purpose for which I cited this was that there was there given and taken, as between two nations, a servitude right upon the shore, the extent of which was left to be determined by the purpose for which the servitude was granted.

possible by the consent of the high contracting parties, and very possibly they did not manage to agree, and it could not be carried any further ;whether it contained the seeds of future war or not, they had to leave it there. Here is a case where His Majesty's advisers might recommend any boundary that they thought fit, and it was in his power to adopt it with a stroke of the pen, so that in the present case you have either to content yourself with saying : " Is coast " big enough to go all that way inland ? No. There is an end of it. Or to say : Let us look at all the circumstances and see whether it did go in all that distance. One of the circumstances would be that your contention has to impute to the English administration a desire to have an immense interior in Labrador unassigned to anybody, useless to England, a burden, not an advantage, and which might involve the security of a fishing coast if it was not provided with some manner of administration.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I think if that were my case I would have very little difficulty in deciding it against myself.

Lord SUMNER : Your theory of one mile and then the length inside does leave the length undistributed ; as Sir John called it, an undistributed area.

Mr. MACMILLAN : My submission is going to be quite the contrary, and has been already throughout the case. I am afraid I must have failed lamentably to make it clear. Our submission is that the hinter-land was reserved for the Indians.

Lord SUMNER : Reserved for the Indians ; I quite appreciate that ; but not granted to anybody, not administered by anybody, left unappropriated, for the Indians to make peace and war and scalp and smoke the pipe of peace in freedom.

Viscount HALDANE : The statesmen of those days might have thought the time would come (and it has come) when it would become an important question, and it would be better not to prejudice it.

Lord SUMNER : That is your best answer, I think, Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : If I may answer myself, my answer is this : that the hunting grounds of the Indians, being just virgin territory of that sort, were the very places that were intended to be preserved for them intact at this time. Will your Lordship look at the language a little later on ? The view, apparently, of the Governor of New found-land himself was that there was a no-man's-land in there. That is probably inaccurate ; I do not think there was a no-man's-land in there, or a hiatus, the expression used by one of the others.

Lord SUMNER : None of these metaphors help one ; but the fact remains that it was territory unassigned to any Governor appointed by His Majesty and remained vested in the Sovereign although he was content that the use of it should be in the Indians.

12 Nov., 1926.

—
Lord Sumner.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Indian reservations, my Lord.

Lord SUMNER : Yes; well, that may be a sufficient explanation to get over the difficulty of leaving this idle territory with no one to look after it, but it is a different case from the one that you are putting about the French coast, the fishing coast.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord ; it is different. If it had been the same, of course, that would have been a most valuable precedent for me. It is only an indication of how these matters were dealt with in boundary delimitation questions. Whether it was in the stress of, negotiation or otherwise, they chose to leave it in that position, and I say that this was left also, and that it was a fishery right, with a position on the shore which was necessary for prosecuting that industry.

12 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount Haldane.

That was the position in which the French found themselves on the coast of Newfoundland, and when the matter came up for consideration, as it did later on in 1853, you find on page 2186 a very sound statement, where it says : "The term coast (the literal meaning of which is the shore or margin of the sea) being vague and open to contradictory interpretation, it is proposed to determine its signification with reference to the fishery rights in question, as follows" : Then they go to make a suggestion. It is true that it was a matter for negotiation, but they go on to suggest what would be a reasonable delimitation, now that it had become necessary to delimit the fishing coast, or what would be a reasonable way of going about it,

It was in consequence of that, that discussions took place as to whether it should be half a mile or a quarter of a mile, and the convention was ultimately made, on pages 2188 and 2189, which was not, however, ratified, but which represents what the Plenipotentiaries had come to as a proper decision on the matter.

Mr. Macmillan.

It says this on page 2189: " The strand reserved for French exclusive use for fishery purposes shall extend to one third of an English mile inland from high water mark. from Rock Point to Bonne Bay, inclusive, and at the four reserved harbours south of Bonne Bay ; and from Bonne Bay to Cape St. John, to half an English mile inland from high water mark." That was the conclusion that they came to as to what stretch of littoral it would be necessary to reserve for the exclusive use of the French for fishery purposes in order to make effectual the reserve of the rights on the coast of Newfoundland.

At this time it was not necessary, in Labrador, to define with precision the extent inland of the Governor's jurisdiction, and therefore it was left to be determined by the purpose of the grant.

As regards the hinterland, which my Learned friend himself has suggested as being—I think his general expression is—"The frozen regions of Labrador," I do not think he would have been so appalled at the prospect that that was being left without administration; but on the other hand, those lands were appropriately left to the Indians who hunted over them.

p. 945

Viscount HALDANE : There was great difficulty in making definite reservations in the Constitution of Canada. The lands reserved to the Indians were put to be under the jurisdiction of the Dominion, but they were within the Province, territorially, and the result was that when the Indians came to deal with them, there arose a series of complicated litigations as to what the rights were.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord.

Viscount HALDANE : And it was not until this Board had given several decisions that these things were settled. I do not anticipate that it can be taken that in those old days they foresaw that, but they were very sensible people, and they did not commit themselves too definitely.

12 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I think, my Lord, that when one really looks at the language of this Proclamation, instead of looking at a lot of other history books dealing with the position generally, the position is quite clear as far as the Indians are concerned. But that may be because I prefer to keep my eye on the terms of the Proclamation.

Now, my Lords, I want to point out this, that when this question as to what is the meaning of the word " coast " in this context, came before a number of people—people, if you please, of adverse interest to Canada—it was recognised by all of them that it would not, in its natural connotation, include this large green area. It is rather striking, I think. People approaching it without the assistance of Counsel, or the impediment of Counsel, and looking at it just as business men or administrators, at once recognised that the expression " Coasts of Labrador " could not possibly mean all the territory up to the height of land.

May I give one or two examples of that. There is a letter from Lord Knutsford in Volume II, on page 356, which is interesting. That is the one with which the Pinsent incident closes. Your Lordships will remember Mr. Justice Pinsent, who was puzzled about the Boundary. Lord Knutsford, through Mr. Herbert, says this, in January, 1890: "I am directed by Lord Knutsford to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 11th instant, respecting the boundary between Canada and Newfoundland, on the Labrador coast. Lord Knutsford desires me to observe that the effect of the Acts 14 George 3, Chapter 83 and 43, George 3, Chapter 148, 'was to give Canadian Courts jurisdiction over the whole of the dominions of the Crown in North America not forming any part of the provinces.' The Act of 1809, only re-annexed to Newfoundland part of the coast of Labrador and the subsequent acts and instruments all speak of the coast only as belonging to Newfoundland, What may be the exact extent inland of the coast appertaining to Newfoundland, may be a question, but the most liberal interpretation of the term "coast" could hardly, in Lord Knutsford's opinion include all the part coloured yellow in Mr. Johnston's sketch." Your Lordships will see that the part coloured yellow in Mr. Johnston's sketch is, roughly speaking the height of land line. His sketch is on page 318a.

Then you find the Governor's view, on page 344, in the same volume, and it is rather interesting to see what he has to say about it himself. On page 344, writing in 1889 to Lord Knutsford, Mr. T. O'Brien says : "My Lord, I have the honour to forward herewith copy of a letter from Mr. Justice Pinsent, relative to the boundaries of this Colony and of Canada in Labrador. The frontier laid down by the Dominion Government, which line is quite acceptable to Newfoundland," —That was their interpretation of the white area, corresponding roughly to the green area, which they assumed to be Canada's idea of Labrador— "does not correspond, as your Lordship will observe, with that laid down in my instructions" —he has been reading his instructions, which give him the coast of Labrador between two points— "thus leaving a large tract between the two lines which is under no-one ; hence a question of jurisdiction might at any moment arise, which might lead to a miscarriage of justice or other complication."

Sir John Simon.

12 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

That is the Governor. He has got his Commission in front of him, and he has got a map rather like this green map ; and he says : "Well, if that is really, what Newfoundland has got on the mainland, it does not correspond in the least with my Commission, because my Commission would leave a large tract under no one.

Then Judge Pinsent is also of the same mind in 1889. He is a judicial person, and he writes to Mr. T. O'Brien on this topic, and then he refers to this map on which the territory was shown in white." On page 345 he says : "The former has defined its line in official maps, and with that there is no fault to be found on the part of Newfoundland. The difficulty lies in the imperfect and insufficient description of that part of Labrador annexed to this colony, causing an apparent hiatus between Newfoundland Labrador and Canadian Labrador."

Lord WARRINGTON : He had not had the benefit of the argument that we have had.

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, my Lord. His mind, in short, was not obscured by Counsel's arguments.

Lord WARRINGTON : I hope not " obscured."

Sir JOHN SIMON : Let us do the memory of Mr. Pinsent justice. He writes on page 354 after some reflection, and he says : "It appears to me that the presumptions are all in favour of the entire yellow as well as pink part being the dependency of Newfoundland, and for the following reasons." So that it looks as though he had arrived at the truth without the argument.

p. 947

Mr. MACMILLAN : Now will your Lordship look at page 341.

Sir JOHN SIMON : That is going back.

Mr. MACMILLAN : May I not go back if I wish ? On page 341 I desire to draw attention to a passage which I think is instructive. It is the inception of this whole matter, and it arose in consequence of a difficulty about jurisdiction.

At the foot of page 341 Mr. Justice Pinsent says this : " For the purpose of illustrating the matter clearly, I enclose portion of a map of the dominion of Canada, published by Canadian official authority, in which all that part of the peninsula of Labrador coloured white is, as it were, allowed to belong to this government,"—That, again, is roughly the green area—" but if that area is compared with the description taken from the royal letters patents constituting the office of governor and commander-in-chief of the island of Newfoundland and its dependencies, it will be seen that the territorial extent of (Newfound-land) Labrador represents a vast deal more than would be ordinarily intended by the term ' coast,' and, moreover, extends inland and west of the line drawn due north and south from Anse Sablon eight to nine degrees." Then on the same page he goes on : " This Canadian topography is, I think, quite correct so far as the limits of the Dominion territory are concerned, and the remainder of the coast of Labrador would thus quite naturally belong to this government, but they are not so described and defined in the letters patent or commission of the Governor of the Colony, and indeed the description falls very short of covering the whole ground, and when questions of jurisdiction arise the court has to determine in every case whether the particular locality is upon the coast of Labrador or not." Then he refers to Hamilton Inlet, and 150 miles inland from the sea coast, and he says how desirable it would be.

Then I see that he uses the expression " no man's land." He says : " The publication by Canadian official authority of the map in question or some such other may be useful as a definition of the rights of the Dominion of Canada, but it would not have the effect of conveying to Newfoundland British territory not included in its own, and which might, from not being by imperial authority embraced in either, be of the sort of ' no man's land,' over which neither of the colonies could exercise government nor their courts jurisdiction."

Viscount HALDANE : It was only a no-man's-land so far as the two Colonies were concerned.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord.

Viscount HALDANE : There was the Crown with its troops.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is a figurative language, of course, my Lord ; but the interesting thing is that there you find the Governor, a Judge,

Mr. Macmillan.

p. 948

the Colonial Secretary, and all these people who have read the Commission and read the description of the coast of Labrador in that Commission, all saying : " Well, if Newfoundland really is to go away up into this large area in the interior, it is certainly going to some place where the Commission will not carry it." That is what I say is the reading of these people who were looking at it, without, I agree, the apparatus which has been provided before your Lordships for the purpose of looking at it.

Viscount HALDANE : Without bias, of any kind.

Sir JOHN SIMON : Forgive me, Mr. Macmillan, but you are always so frank and so fair that I am sure you will allow me to say this. You are representing to the Board, as the considered opinion of Mr. Justice Pinsent, something which Mr. Justice Pinsent, slightly later on, in a quite elaborate treatise, repudiated. You are entitled to say that that does not matter, but you are not entitled—

Viscount FINLAY : Where is that ?

Sir JOHN SIMON My learned friend said that he could go back if he liked. I agree, he can go back ; he can go anywhere ; but I know that he would wish the Board to be aware of the fact that Mr. Justice Pinsent, a little later on, in fact came to a contrary conclusion.

Mr. MACMILLAN : What Mr. Justice Pinsent said has been read already.

Sir JOHN SIMON : As long as you do not think that you are misleading anybody as to Judge Pinsent's considered view, I do not mind.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I did not read it just now, for the reason that I only wanted to show that a number of people who had read this, have read it as I would read it. A great many people decided differently at the end of the day, that is true ; and if you please, Mr. Justice Pinsent took another view later on. I am sorry that I omitted to say that, but I wanted to show that a number of people, reading this document had taken the view, when reading it for the first time, that it did not correspond with the language of the Commission.

Sir JOHN SIMON : That is quite fair.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Now, my Lords, were not these people right when they so read the word " coast " ? Were they not right when they read it as confined to the narrow strip of the coast, and in so reading it, were they not reading it in consonance with the grant and with the interpretation placed upon it at the time in the Proclamation ?

Now, my Lords, I should like to address myself next to an aspect of the case which has been much elaborated, and perhaps even more elaborated by my learned friend than by myself, namely, two questions of the Hudson's Bay boundary and the Indian territory.

[1927tab]

Mr. Macmillan.

I am not quite sure where those two questions ought to be placed as regards their importance. In one aspect of the case they may be very important ; in another aspect of the case they may be less important. I take it that their importance, the importance of those two topics which have become so very prominent, and, if I may say so, so very controversial, in this case, is because of their bearing upon the disposition of the hinter-land of Labrador at this time.

12 Nov., 1926.
Mr. Macmillan.

As my learned friend said, if I can prove that the Proclamation dealt with land in the interior and reserved it for the Indians, I have presented at any rate a serious difficulty in his way, because in that case I would have explained how part of this territory had been disposed of by the Proclamation, and I would have made it much more difficult for him to maintain that he had a complete stretch right up to the watershed. On the other hand, the Hudson's Bay boundary seems to be in a slightly different position. I rather apprehended that it was used by my learned friend chiefly for the purpose first of all of showing that it was a watershed boundary, and that, being a watershed boundary, it was a natural and proper boundary ; and then, secondly, that if you had a recognised watershed boundary, therefore the presumption was that when you were disposing of Labrador territory on the other side, the west side, you would naturally give the whole of the land up to that same boundary. I hope that I do not do any injustice to the submission ; but it seemed to me to be generally upon those lines, and therefore it becomes a matter of some importance to examine them more closely.

First of all I should like to say this that as regards the Hudson's Bay Company's boundary of course one does not need the Hudson's Bay Company or any other company to shew that a watershed is a natural physical boundary. When you are on the look-out for a boundary you naturally take a physical feature. The sea is one of the best boundaries of all. The salt, unchanging sea gives you a limit of territory. Rivers also are often selected as boundaries. A watershed is equally a well-known physical feature, and is therefore a feature which will be naturally enough, selected when you are in search of boundaries. But it does not require any very great research or any very great argument to convince anyone, or even to convince me—if my learned friend is interested in convincing me—that a watershed is a natural boundary. It is a profound and impressive truth, no doubt, but at the same time it is not one which one would be prepared to admit instantly.

But, my Lords, what is its bearing upon our present problem ? I am unrepentant, my Lords. I agree that it is an unfortunate position to be in ; but notwithstanding the learning that has been lavished by my learned friend upon this topic, I am still maintaining at your Lord-ships' Bar that, at least as regards the lands with which we are concerned here, there was no claim by the Hudson's Bay Company to a height of land line there at all. I shall have to make that good. Indeed, I think I might with accuracy go a little further. I have tried to get down to the facts of the matter. No doubt I have not, perhaps, so efficient an equipment as my learned friend, but so far as I can find out, there is no document of claim by the Hudson's Bay Company claiming that their boundary is the height of land boundary, at any part of their boundary.

p. 950

Sir JOHN SIMON : At any time ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : I cannot find it, and I should like very much if you could refer me to one.

Sir JOHN SIMON: At any time ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, before 1763, but, of course, that is the material point. Now, just to show that I am really trying to be fair—

Sir JOHN SIMON : I am quite sure about that.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Let me say that what you do find is that in a number of maps there is a line which is undoubtedly a height of land line. Whether that line was claimed by the Hudson's Bay Company, of course, is quite a different thing, because what one has got to remember is this, that many of these lines that were drawn on the map represented contentions and desires rather than ascertained boundaries. The early maps were often more tendencious than modern maps, and often the wish was father to the thought, and lines were drawn rather as persons would wish to have them, than as they were entitled to draw them. But nothing is more extraordinary than the history of the boundaries, the supposed boundaries, the suggested boundaries, the proposed boundaries of Hudson's Bay. We have put in a map at the end of our Atlas which has been there all the time, in which all the different suggestions of the Hudson's Bay boundaries are shown. It is like an arterial system ; there are any number of lines drawn all over the place, and the thing fluctuated. Indeed, that is my learned friend's own case, and he said that the boundary receded or progressed with the fortunes of war. The maps to which my learned friend referred were the maps of de L'Isle and Bellin, chiefly, before 1763, because I am bearing in mind that we must concentrate upon that time. De L'Isle and Bellin were French map-makers who were concerned to crib, cabin and confine Hudson's Bay as closely as they could. On the other hand, it is equally true that the effort of the Hudson's Bay Company was always to get as large an interpretation as they could. Indeed—I hope I am going to state this accurately—when the Treaty of Utrecht was signed, there was undoubtedly laid down subsequently upon a map, a line of authority, that being the map which has been put up by my learned friend. It is not the King's map, not the one from the Royal Library, but it was the one which was used in the Royal Library, and used for putting down all the things that subsequently happened.

Mr. Macmillan.

If you look at that map you will see upon it an undulating line.

p. 951

I do not know quite how to describe it, but it runs along the northern part of the map there. That line is described as "Bounds of Hudson's Bay by the Treaty of Utrecht." Then again it is described as "Bounds of Hudson's Bay," and then at two places in this map the words "The land's height" are repeated. Neither of those legends of land's height, as far as I can make out, are actually placed upon the line, although the one to the left might be said to be upon the line. They certainly do not represent the ordinary watershed line, but because of the conformation of the line, my own impression is that the author of that line did mean to draw a watershed line. I think that must be what he was trying to draw, although he has not been very fortunate in doing it ; and, of course, the important thing, from my learned friend's point of view and from my point of view as well, is that he was trying to draw a water-shed line, whether he succeeded or not, because that would show what his purpose was.

But when you come to the area with which we are concerned, the striking thing is that in that area you do not find the height of land line. The inset map is a map which continues the boundaries, and if you look at the inset map, on the same map, if you care to look at the original one, this is the line that is on the original map of 1755. You will see marked there a perfectly straight line running from Grimmington Island and marked " Proposed limits of Hudson's Bay." So that, even if the geographer, Mr. Mitchell, who in 1755 compiled this map, had the view that the Hudson's Bay people were limited by the height of land line in this region, that is to say the region which is dealt with in the main map, the same gentleman perfectly plainly shows there that in Labrador there was no height of land line, but there was a perfectly straight line drawn through Lake Mistassini to Grimmington Island, and that line is engraved upon the original map of 1755.

12 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Sir JOHN SIMON : It is " proposed boundary ?"

Mr. MACMILLAN : " Proposed boundary," yes. This line which, I agree, looks like a watershed line, is not continued up into the small map at all.

Sir JOHN SIMON : And it is not labelled " proposed boundary," but it is labelled " boundary."

Mr. MACMILLAN : So that it is not possible for my learned friend to say that this map of 1755 shows, in Labrador, a watershed boundary claimed by the Hudson's Bay Company. What it shows is a straight line drawn to Grimmington Island. But what is of more consequence is this, that if you take the King's map—my learned friend for some reason preferred to remove the King's map which was here, and he placed the 1755 map before your Lordships. I shall not be guilty of any such lese majeste, and I propose to put the King's map back again.

Sir JOHN SIMON : The only difficulty is that that is after 1763.

p. 952

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is not.

Sir JOHN SIMON : The marks upon it are. Mr. MACMILLAN : How do you know ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : Because some of them were by Mr. Oswald.

Mr. MACMILLAN : " Some of them " is quite a different thing, The purpose of the King's map is very interesting. The purpose of it was to show, for His Majesty's information from time to time, the progress of events in His Majesty's dominions, and when you come to this map it is very striking to notice that upon this map there is drawn the line which your Lordships remember.

Viscount FINLAY : Where is Grimmington ?

12 Nov., 1926.
Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is up here, my Lord (indicating on the map). There is drawn a perfectly straight line across, which goes off, as your Lordship remembers, at an angle. We pick up the angle again in the inset map, and it is continued, and what you have therefore is 1 this as a boundary, and that is lettered upon the King's map, " Boundary between the lands granted to the Hudson's Bay Company and the Province of Quebec."

Now, my Lords, here is an authoritative map showing the deliberations of parties, and intended to record decisions. It is quite true that it introduces this difficulty, that you have the upper wavy line, which is also called "Boundary of Hudson's Bay by the Treaty," but you have this lower line superimposed upon it, and therefore obviously showing a later view of the matter of the "boundary between lands granted to Hudson's Bay Company and the Province of Quebec."

Then it is interesting to take, along with that, the Newfoundland map, which I may just ask my Lords to look at, because it is a very interesting map. It is No. 14, and if your Lordships will be good enough just to look at it for a moment, it will complete all that I have to say this afternoon. This is a map of the year 1763. Now we are just at the critical time, and it is rather interesting for that reason. It is produced by my learned friends, and they think, as their note shows on the left hand side of it, that this map was compiled between the drafting of the Treaty in February—that is the Treaty of Paris—and that of the Proclamation in October. I do not know that that can have been so, because the boundaries of Quebec are shown upon it, and they were not created in the Proclamation.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I think that is very just.

Mr. MACMILLAN: I think that is so.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I quite agree.

p. 953

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is 1763.

Sir JOHN SIMON : It is after the Proclamation.

Mr. MACMILLAN : The date of this is 1763, and it is a map by John Gibson, who I think is the same gentleman who was associated with Mr. Bowen in the Bowen and Gibson map, and who was introduced as being a rather important geographer.

Now will your Lordships kindly look at what is the southern boundary of the Hudson's Bay Company's territory there ? "Southern boundary of Hudson's Bay Company territory as settled." It is very small type, unfortunately. All my learned friend's maps are in such small type that it is difficult to read them—"As settled by the commissaries after the Treaty of Utrecht."

Now, of course, the commissaries did not settle it, as your Lordships will remember, but that line which goes right across the map there is practically the same line as you find going across the King's map, subject to this, that towards the right hand side it takes a little bulge to the south, and begins after that to go more or less irregularly. But the part against which are written the words "Southern boundary of Hudson's Bay Company territory " is practically coincident with the Treaty line on the King's map, which will be put up before Monday morning for your Lordship's inspection.

I think, therefore that I am well entitled to say this, that so far as the Labrador Peninsular is concerned and the map material available at that time, nobody had a map before them which showed the height of land boundary of the Hudson's Bay Company as a line to be reckoned with at that time. Its point of departure was known to be the entrance of Hudson's Straits, but where precisely that was nobody quite knew, and as to whether it was a height of land line or a watershed line, no decision whatever had been come to at that time, and any contemporary maps that may have been in the hands of those who were advising about this matter, would not have shown a height of land line in the Labrador Peninsula.

MORNING SESSION.

Viscount Finlay.

Mr. MACMILLAN : If your Lordship pleases, I was dealing, your Lordships will recollect, with the question of what was known as the Hudson's Bay boundary in Labrador at the material date of 1763. May I say that I quite recognise that it is not essential to my learned friend, Sir John Simon, to establish that part of the case.

It is fair to remind your Lordships that he has quite an independent argument, independent of the ascertainment of the Hudson's Bay boundary. As I appreciated that argument it was this : That in the circumstances of this case a grant of " all the coasts of Labrador " inherently implied a watershed as the interior boundary ; that is to say, by the force of the term itself, having regard to the circumstances, the expression implied inherently that a watershed was the natural boundary. On the other hand, he appreciated, and I appreciated, the importance of ascertaining whether there was, in fact, known at that period a watershed boundary, because I think it would facilitate his argument if he were able to say not only is that inherent in the words of the Grant that a watershed is implied as the landward boundary, but also there was to hand a known watershed boundary at this time which might fairly be considered as having been in the minds of those who issued the Commission and Proclamation, and, therefore, my Lords, the Hudson's Bay question, important as it is, as I recognise, is not essential to my learned friend's argument.

15 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount FINLAY : Very far from it, I should think.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I should have thought so.

Viscount FINLAY : Because what was settled there, whatever it was, was the boundary of the Hudson's Bay Territory.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes.

Viscount FINLAY : And whether what was beyond that was left for disposition by the King ultimately or was to go into Newfoundland is a totally different question.

Mr. MACMILLAN : If your Lordship pleases.

Viscount FINLAY : That is how it strikes me.

Mr. MACMILLAN : If I may say so with great respect, that is exactly how I had noted it to put it to your Lordships. I was going to indicate he was indeed specially concerned to show the existence of a recognised Hudson's Bay Boundary in Labrador at this time, but that even if he established a notorious height of land boundary in Labrador for Hudson's Bay that would still leave him to bridge the gulf between the Grant to the Governor of Newfoundland and that boundary, because it is so striking that although the use of the Hudson's Bay boundary as a boundary was apparently familiar to those who were dealing with this matter at this time : Witness, for example, the Act of 1774 where extended Quebec is described as being bounded by the Southern Boundary of the Hudson's Bay Company territory, there is no such language here, and it would have been easy for those concerned in this matter had they intended that the boundary of the Hudson's Bay Territory upon the east should be the boundary of the coast of Labrador upon the west to have said so in so many words as they did in 1774, but they defined the boundary of Quebec by the express mention of the Hudson's Bay boundary.

p. 957

My point was this, that the mere selection by description of the point at which the Hudson's Bay territory began on the coast does not carry one any length to the decision that not only was this to be your starting point upon the coast but you were to pursue the internal boundary of the Hudson's Bay Company right down to the height of land as being the implied internal boundary of the coast of Labrador.

My Lords, I asserted, I hope not too definitely, but as the result of my studies, that there is no evidence to show that in 1763 when the coast of Labrador was placed under the care and inspection of the Governor of Newfoundland, and when the new Province of Quebec was carved out, at that time those responsible for these arrangements had before them, or had in mind the Hudson's Bay boundary in Labrador as a boundary following the watershed. Even if they had, they avoided making the watershed the boundary of Newfoundland, they chose a point on the shore as the limit and not Cape Chidley, may I remind your Lordships, but they chose a point on the shore with the reference to the language of the Hudson's Bay Charter. They took the expression "The entrance to Hudson's Straits." My Lord, at that time I think I am fairly entitled to say that the precise point at which the entrance to Hudson's Straits actually and physically lay was not clear, and I rather agree with the suggestion that my learned friend threw out that some of these varying lines which were put forward at different times on behalf of the Hudson's Bay Company, and perhaps most prominently the Grimington line were the outcome of a view that the entrance to Hudson's Straits was not at Cape Chidley, but was further along the coast.

15 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Looking at the present-day maps, it would be difficult to appreciate that view, but looking at the earlier maps there are one or two examples in the Atlas to which I shall not refer at the moment; it is much more easy to assume that the entrance to Hudson's Straits was not necessarily at Cape Chidley in view of the fact that the lie of the coast of Labrador at that time had not been ascertained and those earlier maps show it.

p. 958

lying in a rather different direction. That suggestion of Sir John's may well have some foundation; at any rate what was put forward at this time was not Cape Chidley, but the entrance to Hudson's Straits where ever that is, because undoubtedly from that point the jurisdiction on the coast of the Hudson's Bay Company commenced.

My Lords, as I say I have found no document or map prior to 1763, or at or about 1763 showing in the Labrador Peninsula a watershed, an internal watershed boundary as the boundary of the Hudson's Bay Company's territory.

The question of claims made in respect of territory may be a 10 different matter, but, first of all, my learned friend is good enough to accord me at least this foothold, that in the most emphatic way Lord Selborne in the course of the Manitoba-Ontario case said—

Sir John Simon.

Viscount FINLAY: Would you please give me the reference ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is Volume V, page 2145.

Viscount HALDANE : There was no judgment.

Mr. MACMILLAN : There was no judgment, there was merely a finding such as your Lordship, would pronounce here ; Lord Selborne no doubt incidentally but touching upon a matter which was in that case of vital concern dismissed the strong argument that had been put forward, 20 that the boundary of the Hudson's Bay Territory was the watershed. In that case the topic was of great materiality.

15 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Was that an interlocutory observation ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : That was an Interlocutory observation, yes, 2 following upon the argument. As my learned friend said, I am entitled to whatever advantage that gave me.

Sir JOHN SIMON : On the last point I know you would not fail to take a map if you thought it was against you ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Surely not.

Sir JOHN SIMON : If you are making a statement that there was no map which indicates the height of land shortly before 1763 have not you omitted Bellin ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : As the boundary of the Hudson's Bay Territory ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes ; it shows it in the plainest way in 1755. It is Map No. 12.

p. 959

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is the yellow and blue line.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I do not want to go back, but I thought I had better mention that.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I will correct myself to this extent ; I thought I had used precise language that there was no claim by the Hudson's Bay Company.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I thought you said there were no maps.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I think I did say there were no maps, and I must take that back ; I should say there were no maps which were in evidence before the people dealing with this subject matter. I really tried to get the phrase in as accurate a form as I could, and I am much obliged for the correction.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I thought you had not intended to omit it.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I was perhaps rather obsessed with the idea that this was a French map, and represented the French view rather than the British view.

Viscount HALDANE : When you say there were no maps, do you mean in the 1884 reference ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, my Lord, I mean at the material date, 1763 ; that is, of course, the material date for our purpose. I was just saying that I could, at least, invoke the authority of Lord Selborne on the matter of the location of the Hudson's Bay boundary. It was in the Ontario-Manitoba case a most critical point in the case, as one at least of your Lordships will recall, because the question was whether Ontario went North of the height of land line shown for the Southern boundary of Hudson's Bay. My Lords will recall that the Northern boundary of Upper Canada was the Southern boundary of Hudson's Bay ; therefore, it became a point of very considerable importance. The only comment I would make on that is this, that my learned friend suggested that Lord Selborne's dismissal of that argument proceeded upon, shall I say, a less complete knowledge of the situation than is available to my Lords now. An investigation of the papers laid before the board in the Manitoba-Ontario case (here, again, I am in the recollection of at least one of your Lordships) shows that they contained a most ample collection of material upon this topic ; and a great many of the documents, Opinions and so on, which we have been resorting to in this case, are actually printed in that case ; therefore, the matter was investigated then as a material point, and the suggestion that the height of land at that part was the acknowledged Southern boundary of the Hudson's Bay Company followed ; and in the decision (of course, there were other elements in the decision naturally) that line was not taken as the Northern line of Ontario.

15 Nov., 1926.
—
Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount HALDANE : Was that affected by the decision ? If the river was the Northern boundary of Ontario, that was decided in that case, how far to the North East did the river run ?

Viscount
Haldane.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That river ran into St. James' Bay ; it ran from the Lake in the Woods, and the counter argument for Ontario there was : " Oh, but we have a line on the West which runs up to the Lake in the Woods, and we have a line to the East which was a line of demarkation described as ending at St. James' Bay " ; and it was said by Ontario that the intermediate territory, the height of land line, ran behind that ; the height of land was Canada's contention in that case, the roles were reversed ; they contended that the height of land was the limit upwards of Ontario. No, said your Lordships in deciding the matter, the other material here enables us to disregard that ; and in any event the principle of the height of land was not accepted at that time. But again, if I may say so, the view expressed at that late date, even by so authoritative a body, is not so material for our purpose as what was the state of knowledge in 1763. The endeavour of both of us has been to reconstruct the position. One can do so in the simplest form. A question arose as to how this great new territory placed in the hands of the British Sovereign was to be allocated. The map material available must, of course, have been before those persons who were dealing with the question, and I am going in a moment to ask attention to one or two of the maps. Before, however, I leave the subsequent matter, which I recognise is of less importance, I think it is at least desirable that your Lordships should have not merely the opinions of Sir Samuel Romilly and the Law Officers which my learned friend gave you, but I ask your Lordships' acceptance also of a paper which I communicated last week to my learned friends, which completes the matter by giving you Chief Justice Draper's letters and papers and the Opinion of Sir Richard Bethel and the Solicitor-General in 1857.

15 Nov., 1926.
Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount FINLAY : Will you give me the references to all these?

Mr. MACMILLAN : These will be handed in, my Lord.

Sir JOHN SIMON : They are in the Hudson's Bay Report, are not they ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : They are all in the Hudson's Bay Report, and it is merely for convenience that I have had them extracted in order that your Lordships may see the whole story.

Viscount FINLAY : What do you call them ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : "Documents for the Dominion of Canada,"

p. 961

Documents 2 to 6 ; Document 1 is in a different category. I told my learned friend last week that we desired to complete the papers by putting these in. You now have all the documents which my learned wishes to put forward and which I wish to put forward. These documents, Nos. 2 to 6, carry the matter to its completion, and show the state of knowledge of the House of Commons Committee in 1857, when they passed upon this question generally ; and I do draw some attention, my Lords, to what the Chief Justice of Canada, Chief Justice Draper, stated in the papers I have handed in. I am not going to read them, your Lordships will prefer, no doubt, to look at them a little more at leisure.

Viscount FINLAY : I think you had better just refer to the point you are making.

Mr. MACMILLAN : What I was going to do was this—I will run through them rapidly, that will be the most convenient way. First of all, there is the passage which I have already read from the evidence of the Chief Justice before that Committee, and that passage is set out in the second of my documents. It is to show your Lordships that this Judge went into the matter with great care and with every effort to be impartial. " Taking the points in the order in which you have mentioned them ; first of all, with regard to the question of the limits of the province of Canada, are there any statements which you wish to lay before the Committee on that head ?— I should say with regard to that point that the view which is taken, be it sound or unsound, is this : at present it is understood by us that the Hudson's Bay Company claim as a legal right all the land which is drained by any streams, no matter how remote their sources may be, which flow into either the Hudson's Bay Straits, or Hudson's Bay. We consider that that is an ill-founded claim, principally upon this ground, that it is a claim of which we can find no trace until a very modern period, and is quite inconsistent with the claims advanced by that Company for nearly a century and a half. To save time I have prepared extracts from various documents, emanating from the Company themselves, with some few other documents, it is a paper which it would save a great deal of time to put in, because I can give every place where the extracts are taken from, and therefore reference to the original documents can always be had. I would also desire to say that in every extract which I have made, I have made it a complete extract of all that is stated on the question, and if it involves anything favourable to the Hudson's Bay Company, it will be found in those portions of which I have made the extract." So that this learned gentleman, at least, was desirous of putting the position impartially ; whether he succeeded or not is a different matter. The papers that follow he put at the disposal of the Committee ; in document 3 you will find the Memorandum in which he sets out the Charter, it is a very convenient grouping of the whole of this controversy. Then he sets out the whole history of it and what were the different

15 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

p. 962

claims that they have been made at different times, and then he supplemented that with another paper, delivered in by Chief Justice Draper on the 28th May 1857, which is document No. 4, again on the question of boundary ; and in that pair of papers your Lordships will get, I humbly submit, an admirable conspectus of this whole question ; and the result of it is that the boundary was not an ascertained boundary, that the Hudson's Bay Company did not put forward the claim in any definite form to the height of land until after 1814, and that what they were claiming in 1750— if I might read just a sentence from the third paragraph on page 8 of these documents : " Even in October 1750, they entertained the same views, while at that time they were pushing their pretensions, both to the Northward and Westward, to the utmost limits. They state that the limits of the land and countries lying round the bay, comprised, as they conceived within their grant, were as follows : All the land lying on the East side or coast of the said bay, eastward to the Atlantic Ocean and Davis' Straits, and the line hereafter mentioned as the East and south-eastward boundaries of the said Company's territories." Now that is so late as 1750. My Lords, that examination, no doubt made at a later date, so late a date as 1857 again is open to the observation that it is not a contemporary exposition ; on the other hand, it is an effort to gather together impartially all the material from the beginning of this controversy, My Lords, it is noticeable now, when you turn to the maps of the period, of the period of the Commission and the Proclamation, that you find on what I venture to regard as one of the most important maps, namely, the Mitchell Map of 1755, the map upon which both of us have been relying, that in that map the line drawn across Labrador, as representing the division between the Hudson's Bay Company's territory and the remainder of Labrador, is an angle almost of 45 degrees, which reaches the Atlantic Coast at Grimington Island. I think we cannot over-estimate the importance of that, because that map, the Mitchell map, is a contemporary record

15 Nov., 1926.

Sir John Simon.

Mr. Macmillan.

of the most unusual significance. It was first prepared in 1755 by Mr. Mitchell, and it was used at that time and thenceforth as a document of record. The King's Map, which is now upon the cartoon, is that map of 1755 with a considerable number of additions of later date. It therefore comes before your Lordships as what I may call a working map. It is the map upon which people concerned with this matter at that time were laying down lines indicative of arrangements made or contemplated ; and it is therefore placed before your Lordships now as this kind of evidence; this was a deliberative matter, a matter of policy ; it was a matter which must have been considered in the light of maps, because the territory was to a large extent unknown, and we are in the fortunate position here of having a map upon which the progress of these very questions is delineated for us, as it was delineated then for the person concerned, namely, His Most Gracious Majesty, who was then disposing of the great accessions which had been made to his Empire.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Will you give me the date of that map?

Sir John Simon.

p. 963

Mr. MACMILLAN : 1755.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I am told not, that there has been substituted on that screen for the map which I put, the map on which my learned friend now relies. Mr. De Villiers of the British Museum is here, and I have made enquiries about it. The map I put on the screen was a map of 1755, and this map he tells me is a map of 1775. I quite appreciate my learned friend's point that subsequently to that there has been other lines put on it, but the map itself is a publication of 1775 I am told.

The Lord
Chancellor.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That may well be.

Sir JOHN SIMON : But you said 1755.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I thought it was the 1755 map used as a basis on which other lines might be drawn at a subsequent date. Those lines are subsequently embodied.

15 Nov., 1926.

Sir JOHN SIMON : But Mr. De Villiers tells me the map I put on the screen is 1755 and this is 1775.

Lord Sumner.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Is that cross line on the inset ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : I think it is on both, but the other line is not.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : That is marked, if I remember rightly, " proposed boundary."

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes.

Viscount HALDANE : Who was Mitchell, does anybody know ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : I did give some information to the Board about him, some little time ago. Mitchell was a very distinguished man who was a Scotsman ; his actual interest, or his principal interest, was the interest of botany, but he lived, in the middle part of his life, in Virginia, and one of the things he did was, he concerned himself in making what was the most accurate map of that part of the world.

Sir John Simon.

Viscount FINLAY : Virginia ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : Yes. You will find all about him in the Dictionary of National Biography.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I could never understand how Grimington Island could be said to be at the entrance to Hudson's Straits.

p. 964

Mr. MACMILLAN : If you look at one of the maps, you will get a little light on it, you will see this coast is slewed round to the North.

Lord SUMNER : Let us get this cleared up ; I have understood all along that the map on which the Union Jack painting was put was the map of 1755. You are now instructed that it was put on a map of 1775.

Mr. MACMILLAN : So my learned friend says.

Lord SUMNER : There is nothing on this except a statement signed by John Pownall, to show that this is 1755, "This map was undertaken with the approbation and at the request of the Lord's Commissioners for Trade and Plantations, And is chiefly compiled from draft charts and actual surveys on different parts of His Majesty's Colonies and Plantations in America, great parts of which have been lately taken under their Lordships order and transmitted to this office by the Governors of the said Colonies and others." I cannot find 1775 on it, and by 1775 I should have thought the Treaties of Ryswick and Utrecht were ceasing to interest statesmen.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I have Mr. De Villiers here, and I am merely repeating what he states to me. He is in charge of the Map Department of the British Museum, and he tells me that the original map of Mitchell was a map of 1755, and it was the one which was on the screen the other day, the map with the pink colour. That plate was used for subsequent editions of the map. The British Museum has the contemporary catalogue which shows that this edition, which is now on the screen, is an edition produced in 1775, using the old plate but adding some other material. That is what I think I conveyed to the Board, and that is what Mr. De Villiers tells me.

Viscount FINLAY : 1775 is 1755 plus some additions ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : It is, my Lord. The catalogue can be got.

Viscount FINLAY : What is the nature of those additions?

Sir JOHN SIMON : One of the additions, your Lordship appreciates, is this, that the straight line that is drawn along the particular parallel of latitude there, which Lord Warrington is now pointing to, is added. That is not on the 1755 map, and your Lordships will remember you had it before your eyes for some days when I was addressing the Board——

The LORD CHANCELLOR : If that is not there, how comes the diagonal line to be there ?

Sir JOHN SIMON : One can only say that it is on both.

[1927lab]

Lord WARRINGTON : That red line going through Lake Erie and Lake Ontario was not on the original map of 1755?

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, I do not think so.

15 Nov., 1926.

Lord SUMNER : The 1755 map was uncoloured except that large tracts were tinted.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes.

Sir John Simon.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I have the 1755 one here, of course.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : We need not go into any controversy about that. The point I was making at the moment was this : your Lordship said it was difficult to understand how this line to Grimington Bay was taken as the possible entrance to Hudson's Bay, but on Map 24A it does not look quite so difficult ; there, instead of the coast going down like that, it is slewed round in this way. (Describing.) They sailed to Grimington Island when they were making their course from this side ; that was one of the things which would account for it ; this was the land to which they set forth, and they laid their course to the Grimington Island when they were making their way to Hudson's Straights. That may account for it. This is a Hudson's Bay map, of course, and it contains this which is written on it—the legend which is written on it is : " The French not to come Westward of this line, the English not to come Eastward of this line," and that is the line to Grimington Island.

15 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

The Lord
Chancellor.

Mr. Macmillan.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I do not think there can be any doubt about how it arose, if you would allow me to suggest it. This case has lasted so long that it is difficult to keep it all in mind ; but my Lords will remember in 1712 and 1713 the Hudson's Bay Company addressed to the British Government a series of Memoranda urging that they should get a line to Grimington Island ; there can be no doubt about that.

Lord WARRINGTON : That is why it is called " proposed boundary."

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord, but the point I am concerned with at the moment must not be complicated with these considerations. The point I am concerned with at this moment is : Was there upon any map which was before, or likely to be before, those who were dealing with this matter in 1763, a height of land boundary shown in Labrador as between Hudson's Bay and the other territory ? and upon that, my Lords, I am entitled to say—and this, I think, must be non-controversial—that there is no evidence of any map having been before those who in 1763 were concerned with this problem, here in official circles, which shows a line running down the watershed as the claimed or the recognised or the proposed boundary of Hudson's Bay in Labrador.

p. 966

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I think it is true, even of Bellin's map to which Sir John Simon referred, that although they show the height of land boundary as the South Hudson's Bay boundary that line is not carried to Cape Chidley.

Mr. MACMILLAN : But I think my learned friend is entitled to say this, is not he (I am very anxious to put it at the lowest) that there was what he called his horse-shoe of Hudson's Bay territory, although it is quite true the terminus on the North was a point which he would now maintain was a point further to the West, I think it would be pressing the matter against him perhaps a little hard to say that that was not intended to be a watershed line; I am not sure. That was the impression left on my mind; that the person who was drawing that line very probably intended to draw the rough watershed line, because he was anxious, of course, to keep the Hudson's Bay people in as close as possible. These were French maps, and were to that extent tendentious, no doubt. I think my learned friend would be entitled to say that, and that is why' I at once accepted his emendation of my general observation. But the real point, when one strips it of all these complications, is this : what was the map knowledge which was presumably before those persons who in 1763 were dealing with this matter, and I do submit with confidence on that that my learned friend cannot show that there was before the official persons dealing with this matter in 1763 a map showing the boundary of Hudson's Bay as a watershed boundary in Labrador. On the contrary, on the map, the 1755 map, which we are told now was, although originally prepared in that year, brought down to date and re-issued in 1775, the important thing is this, that in 1755, the undoubtedly original edition from the British Museum which was on that cartoon stand last week, the only line shown athwart Labrador is that line, labelled, no doubt, "proposed boundary," but that is the only line which would be in the eyes of those people who were considering this very question : Now where shall we make the coast of Labrador ? Is it to be suggested that with that map before them, with that line drawn upon it in 1755, they nevertheless must be taken to have employed as the boundary of the coast of Labrador, which they were then assigning to the Government of Newfoundland, not that line, but a height of land line ? That is my submission, 'made with confidence upon that; but I can carry the matter, I think, perhaps a little further. Would your Lordships note upon that map, what I was just about to draw attention to as giving it its special authority, and let me take the 1755 apart altogether from the added matter, it bears this legend--

Viscount FINLAY : Which map bears the legend ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : The 1755 one, and this one also.

p. 967

Viscount FINLAY : The 1755.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, both of them bear it. My Lord Sumner was good enough to draw attention to it, and I was just going to quote it : " This map was undertaken with the approbation and at the request of the Lords Commissioners for Trade and Plantations and is chiefly compiled from draft charts and actual surveys of different parts of His Majesty's Colonies and Plantations in America, great parts of which have been lately taken under their Lordships' order and transmitted to this office by the Governors of the said Colonies and others. John Pownall, Secretary Plantation Office, February 13th 1755." Now this map, therefore, comes before you with the highest possible imprimatur. It is the map of the Lords of Trade prepared for the use of the Lords of Trade, and, presumably, therefore, the map upon which they proceeded. It is for that reason that I lay so much stress upon it, and I am fortunately in the position, as to the locus in quo in Labrador, of being able to rely on a line which is not complicated by any of those questions of subsequent colouration, because, engraved upon the 1755 Map, is a line which is not the watershed line, but a line to Cape Grimington ; therefore, my learned friend cannot suggest, I think, that in the official map of the Lords of Trade of that period, there was a watershed line that must be taken to have been present to the minds of those issuing executive documents on the subject, and adopted by them, and now to be affirmed by your Lordships, as the original intention of those officials at the time. My Lords, I wish to make another observation upon this map. while it is before your Lordships. It really comes at a rather later point, but it might be convenient just to dispose of it while the map is before your Lordships. As I say, this is a progressive map, progressive in the sense that it records the progress of events in the disposition of His Majesty's new territory. It contains many lines of great significance ; but I would draw attention to one or two features on it for a moment. It is only the upper portion my Lords need trouble with. First of all, your Lordships will notice that the boundary of Quebec as fixed by the Royal Proclamation is indicated upon that map by a faint ghostly line, which is still there, but which has obviously been subsequently washed out, but the track of the line is still quite clearly available. It follows, therefore, that after 1763, after the Proclamation, this map has had shown upon it the boundaries of Quebec as fixed by the Proclamation. My Lords, is it not striking, that if it was the intention of those who were dealing with this matter, to place this vast territory of Labrador now claimed by Newfoundland under the Governor of Newfoundland, that you do not find any indications upon that map of a dedication to Newfoundland of the territory not comprised within the Quebec limits ? There is no evidence of any line of Newfoundland territory having been drawn upon that map, and when you come to look at it, in its relation to the 1774 Act, you have this important guidance, what they did then was to wash out the lozenge and to lay down upon this map (I am endeavouring to reconstruct what must have happened) a line which is in red and blue and marked "boundary between the land granted to the Hudson's Bay Company and the Province of Quebec." Now, my Lords, that, of course, is not the Province of Quebec as constituted by the Proclamation of 1763. That is the Province of Quebec, embracing everything that was not Hudson's Bay, embracing what Newfoundland had got as well.

15 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

p. 968

Viscount HALDANE : You are quoting from the 1774 Act ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord, and this line, therefore, which proceeds North East and is continued through Labrador, shows that in the minds of those at the time what happened was this : that the comparatively restricted boundaries of the lozenge of 1763 were then washed out, and there was included in Quebec the whole of the original Quebec plus the territory then added, bounded by what ?—because it is bounded by the Hudson's Bay boundary—bounded by that diagonal line which runs to Grimington Island.

Now that was the mind of those who were desirous of representing pictorially what had happened in 1774. They did not represent Quebec as going up to Cape Chidley or along a watershed line, which must be the implication of my learned friend's argument, because he says that, ab initio, Newfoundland got up to the watershed, and what was given to Quebec in 1774 was all that Newfoundland had got ; Ergo, it got all up to the watershed line. But if you look at the original map of the time, you see that instead of getting up to a watershed line, Quebec got, in 1774, up to a line drawn to Grimington Island, and not to the north point, Cape Chidley.

Then there is another matter which your Lordships might take notice of in passing, and that is that the River St. John, as shown there, passes, of course, beyond the 52 degree. My Lord Sumner pointed out that at an early stage of the case. But there is another and significant thing to be noticed, which 15 Nov., 1926.

Lord
Warrington.

will come into my point upon the Indians. Your Lordships will notice that above the word " Labrador," at the top of the map, there is a printed word showing that the Nascopies were lying to the north of the sources of the river falling into the St. Lawrence. You have, therefore, the Nascopies shown as an Indian tribe lying to the north of the old Quebec. There are a number of other Indian tribes who are shown on this map as lying to the north of this part, and for my own convenience I have underlined them. There is one tribe of Indians ; here is another ; here is another ; and here is another. (Indicating on the map.) Therefore the north part is shown as being in the occupation of quite a number of Indian tribes at that time. Now, my Lords, the only other map that I think one ought to look at is the Bowen & Gibson map.

Lord WARRINGTON : I should like to ask you just one question about this map, if I may.

p. 969

Mr. MACMILLAN : I wish your Lordship would be so good.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord WARRINGTON: Do you know, or can you say, when that red and green line, which is apparently a height of land line, was placed on the map ?

Lord
Warrington.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That was on the original map of 1755.

Lord WARRINGTON : Was it ?

Mr. MACMILLAN . Yes, my Lord ; it is not coloured, but it is shown.

Sir JOHN SIMON: Your Lordship remembers that when this map was on the screen, it was found there.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Surely my statement is good enough, is it not ? I say that it was.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I only wanted to identify it.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I do not think it is coloured on the map, but it is engraved on the map.

Lord WARRINGTON : Cape Chidley, on this map, is rather indicated as being the entrance of Hudson's Straits. If you look at the inset map you will see that Cape Chidley is immediately to the south of the " S " in Hudson's Straights, and besides that, if you draw the entrance up here, Cape Chidley is the entrance to Hudson's Straits.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It may be, my Lord ; but it is not the terminus of the boundary.

Lord SUMNER : If you look at the line describing Cape Grimington, it looks like an explanation why it was chosen.

Mr. MACMILLAN : On the 1755 map, the height of land line is shown drawn with a hatched line together with a band of brownish colour along it.

Lord WARRINGTON : That is right. Unfortunately, the top of the peninsula of Labrador is not shown excepting in the inset map, and in the inset map the continuation of that watershed line is not shown.

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, my Lord, it is not.

Lord WARRINGTON : One has to assume that this watershed line runs up somewhere. We do not know where, but it runs up somewhere along that northern part.

[1927lab]

- Mr.MACMILLAN : Why should one assume that, if it was not drawn by the geographer ? The geographer draws the line that is of importance for him.
- 15 Nov., 1926.
—
Mr. Macmillan.

Lord
Warrington.
- Lord WARRINGTON : So far as he makes the map, yes.
- Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord, and, of course, he was making it for the Lords of Plantation, who, apparently, were not interested in the watershed in Labrador, but in the line shown on the map.
- Mr. Macmillan.

The Lord
Chancellor.
- Lord WARRINGTON : He obviously knew very little of the conformation of the northern promontory, because the inset map is unlike anything that we know now.
- Mr. Macmillan.

The Lord
Chancellor.
- Mr. MACMILLAN : But, my Lord, is the question a question of the reliability or unreliability of the map, so much as what it indicated to those who were dealing with the matter at the time. That is my submission.
- 15 Nov., 1926.
- Viscount FINLAY : The line stops abruptly.
- Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord.
- Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount FINLAY : It runs north east, and then there is nothing more.
- Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord.
- The LORD CHANCELLOR : It is plain, is it not, that the grant to Newfoundland of 1763 went beyond that line and up to Cape Chidley ?
- Mr. MACMILLAN : In 1763 you may remember that they did not define it by Cape Chidley, but by the entrance to Hudson's Straits.
- The LORD CHANCELLOR : Yes, but Lord Warrington has just pointed out that on this map Cape Chidley is plainly shown as being on one side of the entrance to Hudson's Straits.
- Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord, no doubt that is so ; but the point is that they advisedly did not say, "Cape Chidley," but they advisedly said, " the entrance to Hudson's Straits," wherever that may be.
- Lord
Warrington.
- The LORD CHANCELLOR : If they were using this map for ono purpose, one must assume that it was before them for all purposes, and this map seems to show quite plainly Cape Chidley at the entrance.

p. 971

Mr. MACMILLAN : I should certainly say that it was the portal of the Bay.

Lord WARRINGTON : It was one of the two gateposts on the eastern line.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord, but the point is this : that may be manifest to one's eye, but if at that time the Hudson's Bay Company were claiming down to Grimington Island, the concern of those who were dealing with the Newfoundland matter was to say: "We do not define where in truth the Hudson's Bay line begins or ends, but if we say : 'At the entrance to Hudson's Straits,' which is the boundary, we shall be safe, and we shall not be prejudging any claims made by the Hudson's Bay Company to anything beyond Cape Chidley."

Lord WARRINGTON : There is another remark to be made about the green and red line which is also on the map of 1755.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord.

15 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord WARRINGTON : If it shows nothing else, it does show this, that there was a watershed line in the eyes of the geographer, which did extend somewhere up that promontory. It is quite true that it is not shown beyond what he delineates, and it does not take in the promontory, but it shows the watershed line going that way.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord, I think so ; but it is not continued, although for what reason we do not know.

Lord WARRINGTON : And he does not continue the map up there. The inset map does not show it.

Mr. MACMILLAN : He continues one of the lines in the inset map but not the other line.

Lord WARRINGTON : He continues the line which was not a natural line, but which represented a proposed boundary.

Mr. MACMILLAN : And, my Lord, am I not entitled, having placed that material before you, to invoke the fact that this is the view of Newfoundland itself, because in the original case of Newfoundland, on page 8 of Volume I, they say : " It is indeed probable that those responsible for the Royal Proclamation of the 7th October, 1763, accepted as the Southern Boundary of the Hudson's Bay Company's territories the line shown on the small map inset in Mitchell's Map (1755) of the British Colonies in North America, which represents the British proposal after the Treaty of Utrecht." I come into Court, therefore, so to speak, with that as their statement of what they themselves assumed. It is also what we assumed ; and the effort of my learned friend has now been to get rid of their first assumption and to substitute for it a different assumption, although their original assumption and ours correspond.

Then the other map which is of importance at this period is, of course, the Bowen & Gibson series. There are two maps to which I ask the attention of your Lordships, and they are No. 27 in the Canada Atlas and No. 13 in the Newfoundland Atlas. This Map No. 27 of Canada is also of considerable interest, but it should be taken along with the Map No. 13 of Newfoundland.

Now first of all, turning to Map No. 13 of Newfoundland, this is a map which professes to be "An accurate map of North America. Describing and distinguishing the British, Spanish and French dominions of this great Continent ; According to the Definitive Treaty concluded at Paris, 10th February, 1763. Also all the West India Islands belonging to and possessed by the several European Princes and States. The whole laid down according to the latest and most authentick Improvements, By Eman Bowen, Geographer to His Majesty, and John Gibson, Engraver."

The geographer, in compiling this map, has adopted the expedient of printing upon the face of the map itself the articles of the Definitive Treaty, and he has not only done that, but he has also, under the heading of " The Province of Quebec," printed this paragraph, which I should like to read to your Lordships. Do your Lordships see, just up underneath Newfoundland on the map, some printing which is headed " The Province of Quebec " ? It is almost illegible, but may I read it. It says this : " The Province of Quebec is bounded on the Labrador coast by the River St. John and from thence by a line drawn from the head of that River through the Lake of St. John to the South end of the Lake St. John from whence the said line, crossing the River St. Lawrence and the Lake Champlain in 45 Degrees of North Latitude, passes by the high Lands which divide the Rivers that empty themselves into the said River St. Lawrence from those which fall into the Sea and also along the North Coast of the Baye des Chaleur and the Coast of the Gulph of St. Lawrence to Cape Rosieres and from thence crossing the Mouth of the River St. Lawrence by the West End of the Island of Anticosti terminates at the aforesaid River of St. John." That is the Province of Quebec. Then it goes on to say this, and this is an interesting contemporary record : " All the Coast of Labrador from the River St. John to Hudson's Streights, together with the Islands of Anticosti and Madelaine, and all other smaller Islands upon the said Coast, are under the care and Inspection of the Governor of Newfound-land. St. John's Island, with that of Cape Breton and the lesser Islands adjacent thereto, are annexed to the Government of Nova Scotia."

Lord WARRINGTON : That is taken from the Proclamation, that last statement.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord.

Lord WARRINGTON : It is almost word for word.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Almost word for word, my Lord. That is his record.

Viscount FINLAY : Is all that you have just read contained in this very small print on the map ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord. It is like printing the Lord's Prayer on a sixpence. It is very small.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : It is really all taken from the Proclamation.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord, and he has put that down on his map. Now will your Lordships kindly look at Map 27, which is another copy of the same map, but this time a coloured one.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Before you leave that map, I see : "Southern Boundary of Labrador" marked, just underneath the words "Terra de Labrador."

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : I suppose that it is the 52nd parallel, is it not.

Lord
Sumner.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Not quite, my Lord, but very nearly. Of Mr. Macmillan. course, we have both rather disregarded that line, and for this reason, that it would not suit what was done, because undoubtedly Newfound-land got, under the name of " Coasts of Labrador," territory which was to the south of that boundary line. Otherwise, if that was the southern boundary of Labrador, the coast of Labrador would run from the point at which that line meets the Atlantic, but, of course, Newfoundland got more than that. It got along the north coast of the St. Lawrence.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord SUMNER : May I ask you this : this is evidently a map after the end of the year 1763.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is so, my Lord,

Lord SUMNER : It is after the Proclamation ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes.

Lord SUMNER : Then apparently the most that this does is for this gentlemen to get together the material documents, print them,

p. 974

and then draw his notion of a plan which will show, as on a chart, what is the effect of those documents ?.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I think so, my Lord.

Lord SUMNER : That is all, is it not ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord, I think so.

Lord SUMNER : Then how is that, as you say, a contemporary exposition ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : I had not completed my observation, my Lord. I was asking your Lordships to refer to Map No. 27, taking it along with this, because it is by the same people. They had that material before them, and in the Map No. 27, you will see a rather remarkable thing. This is fortunately a coloured map.

Viscount FINLAY : It is the lower part of Map 27.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Map 27, my Lord, and it is a map by the same people. It is known as Gibson's Map, and it is coloured. We have 15 placed upon it this inscription, which is not on the original map : " This map is the chart which accompanied the report from the Lords of Trade and Plantations to the King dated 8th June 1763." That is printed in square type.

Viscount FINLAY : Where is it ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Just above the word "Atlantic" of "Atlantic Ocean."

Viscount FINLAY : Yes, I see it.

Mr. MACMILLAN : We wrote that upon it ; that is ours. This was a copy of the map as recovered from the original records. This 25 map is a little different, but it is the coloration of it which is so significant. These geographers who were preparing this map, and who had before them, as I have shown your Lordships, the precise language of, the Proclamation, which they printed upon ,the Newfoundland Map No. 13, have not reproduced that legend upon this map ; but what they 30 have done is this : they have sought to show the new Quebec in red, and then, to the east of that, your Lordships will notice a significant difference, namely, that instead of colouring the whole of the territory to the east of that as Newfoundland territory (which according to my learned friend's view it was, because the whole of that was just 35 as much Newfoundland as the red was intended to be Quebec), they have shown a tinting along the sea margin, the same colouring as Newfoundland, not extending up the River St. John, but representing pictorially our very case, namely, that the coast of Labrador was to be under Newfoundland. If the contemporary interpretation had been that the whole of this area to the east of the pink Quebec had been intended to become Newfoundland for all purposes, as my learned friend submits, then is it not odd that the contemporary representation of this is a coloured strip along the coast, indicative of what had been annexed to Newfoundland, at least in the mind of the King's geographer.

Lord SUMNER : As coloured there, I should think the yellow goes fifty or a hundred miles into the interior, whereas in the other part they have indicated the actual coast line with the deeper pink. Therefore it was not that they took a broad brush to indicate the coast line. The geographer is taking it into the interior somewhere.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord, but the point is that, unlike his treatment of Quebec, where he colours the whole area confided to the new Government, he does not colour it solid at all, but he colours it along the coast. The depth is a different question.

Lord SUMNER : I am afraid I do not follow that.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I am sorry if my point is not clear to your Lordship. If you look at Anticosti, which was annexed to Newfoundland, the whole of that was coloured yellow.

Lord SUMNER : I appreciate what you are saying. As far as it goes, I can understand what the boundaries of Quebec are, but I am not sure what the boundaries of Labrador are.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I am content to leave that, because your Lordships are now settling it ; but the suggestion against me is that, on the contrary, there was in the minds of those people at that time quite a different thing, namely that right up to the height of land, the whole of that green territory and pink together had been transferred to Newfoundland as an entity.

Lord SUMNER : So far, I follow your point.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That is all that I really want, my Lord ; but the important thing is that these are contemporary maps. Now there is one other point to be looked at here, and it again comes in with regard to the Indians. If I might trouble your Lordships just to look at the map for a moment, upon a different aspect of it, you will observe that the geographer does show a height of land to the north west of Quebec. Do your Lordships see the words " Land's height " running along at a considerable distance from the boundary of Quebec as shown there ?

p. 976

Viscount FINLAY : Which boundary is that ? I do not follow you.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is only a dotted line, but it is labelled "Land's height".

Viscount FINLAY : Whereabouts is it ? Is it on Map 27 ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord. Does your Lordship see Quebec, the part coloured pink ?

Viscount FINLAY : Yes.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Then if your Lordship will carry your eye about half an inch to the north-west from practically any part of that pink line, you will see the word "Mistassine," and below that you will see " Great Mistassines," which is an Indian tribe ; and then you will see the words "Land's height" running along.

15 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount FINLAY : Yes.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Now will your Lordships bear that in mind, that there is a "land's height" there shown which is considerably to the 15 north west of the proposed Quebec boundary. This boundary, which is shown on Map No. 27, is not, of course, an accurate boundary of Quebec, because the accurate boundary of Quebec was a straight line drawn from the headwaters of the St. John to the lake St. John, and therefore this representation of the north boundary of Quebec as a wavy line is not the boundary as ultimately fixed ; but it shows that it was not fixed in relation to the height of land, because there is intervening between the boundary of Quebec on the north west, and the height of land, almost as much territory again as there is between the north west boundary of Quebec.

Viscount FINLAY : Yes, I have that. That is plain.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord. The bearing of that will appear when I come to read, a little later on, the definition of the land thrown into Indian country.

Viscount FINLAY : The definition given where ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : In the Proclamation, my Lord, when I come to that. I only wanted to save your Lordships from having to turn to that map again.

My submission therefore is this, that there is not a watershed line running down the peninsula of Labrador known and recognised in the maps which were before the persons dealing with these matters at the time. Also, there is, upon these contemporary maps, no indication purporting to show that the result of the arrangement of 1763 was to assign to Newfoundland, in the same sense as Quebec had assigned to it its territory, a territory upon the mainland ascertained by metes and bounds. Of course, even if there had been, as I say, it is a long step to take from that fact, the existence of Hudson's Bay boundary there, to say that it was intended to be the boundary of Newfoundland on the mainland.

In any event, it is only a boundary which would meet my learned friend's case upon the western side of the Labrador coast. If he went inland from the Atlantic coast, as he claims, until he encountered this watershed, he has still to invoke the watershed again, and this time without the aid of the Hudson's Bay recognised or supposed boundary, when he comes to the south. For the south portion of his boundary he has to maintain that irrespective of any aid to be got from the Hudson's Bay contentions or suggestions (which I submit have not been established) he has independently got, inherent in the Newfoundland grant, the conception of a height of land ; and therefore he has to resort to a composite watershed in order to arrive at his complete rounding off of his territory. Of course, in point of fact, when the pink was taken in, it was not truly a territory bounded by a watershed, because, with the pink added to the green, you might have the Hudson's Bay watershed as a boundary no doubt upon the west, but upon the south you have the coast of Labrador, and the boundary line, a watershed, a St. Lawrence watershed, was, of course, disregarded there altogether, and he has to pick it up at the top of the River St. John, in order to give you guidance, round to the point where he re-encounters the Hudson's Bay boundary of the watershed.

All these difficulties which are attendant upon my learned friend's view seem to me, if I may say so respectfully, to destroy the conception I that there was inherent in this grant an acceptance of what I submit was a non-existent Hudson's Bay boundary at one part, and a watershed line at another part. on the south.

The next matter to which I address myself is the question of the Indian reservations. I gather from the elaboration with which my learned friend treated that topic that he regarded it as of very great importance, and it is of very great importance, because it also, if I am in a condition to satisfy your Lordships that his view is unsound, destroys his access to the watershed.

15 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

We approach this matter from different points of view. I hope very shortly to satisfy your Lordships that our original contention upon this matter is still unaffected by anything that my learned friend has said. Will your Lordships be good enough to take it in this chronological order : before either the Commission or the Proclamation was issued, this matter of the Indians in this district, the green district, the Labrador district, was brought expressly to the notice of the Lords of Trade. In Volume III, at page 893, Governor Murray sent in a report on the state of the government of Quebec in Canada. He is transmitting an account of His Majesty's Government of Quebec and the dependencies thereof, and he is writing on the 5th June, 1762, the year before the critical year.

p. 978

Now, my Lords, at this time the new boundaries of Quebec had not been fixed at all, and therefore when he is speaking of his Majesty's Government of Quebec and the dependencies thereof, he is speaking of a wider area than the ultimately delimited Quebec of 1763. The sixth of the topics with which he deals on that page, as you will see, is " Indian Nations."

On page 894 and the following pages he gives a full description of the Indian nations residing within the Government, and at the bottom of page 894 he says : "In order to discuss this point more clearly, I shall first take notice of the Savages on the North shore of the River St. Laurence from the Ocean upwards, and then of such as inhabit the South side of the same River, as far as the present limits of the Government extend on either side of it."

Then he takes the savages on the North shore, and he deals with the Esquimaux and tells us all about them. Then in the second paragraph on page 895 he says : "The Montagnais or Monsonies inhabit a vast tract of Country from Labrador to the Saguenay ; they are again distinguished into those who live in the inland parts called Nascapies, and the inhabitants of the water side, for this reason stilled Chuchouxlapishouets. They take as many different names as they have Villages but are all the same people, and speak the same language. As in the interior parts of the Country there are many Lakes and Rivers which communicate with Hudson's bay, the former often trade on that side, which the latter also would have been obliged to do, if the 26 interruption caused by the War, had continued for any time, tho' from the more convenient situation, they would have ever reverted to those who were Masters of the River St. Lawrence, those are the mildest and most tractable of all Savages and never enter into War. Tho' their country is extensive their number is inconsiderable ; From Labrador to Mingan the Traders do not reckon more than from Eighty to one Hundred Families, and of those who resort to the King's Posts, there may be about 220 Families in all, but as their habitations are easily moved they are ever changing and shifting from one place to another. A Jesuit Missionary meets them at Tadousac when they come there for the trade and he resides in the neighbourhood all the Year."

Now, my Lord, there we have these Indians who are being reported upon in connection with the Government of Quebec and its dependencies. Then you have an admirable description of them most accurately set out in the Newfoundland Case itself at page 9 of the red volume. I do not know that these Montagnais lived actually in the green area. "The aboriginal inhabitants of the Labrador Peninsula have altered very little, either in numbers or otherwise, since 1763. They may be roughly divided into three tribes : first, the Esquimaux, to be found along the coast, particularly north of the Straits of Belle Isle (there are now no Esquimaux south of the Hamilton Inlet) ; next, the Mountaineers, living further inland than the Esquimaux, and principally south of the Hamilton River, with their main hunting grounds near the North West River, though they hunted on both sides of the height of land"—

p. 979

this is my opponent's description that I am reading — "and, thirdly, the Nascopies, occupying the central portion of the area south of the Hudson's Straits. The number of these native inhabitants varied probably between two thousand and four thousand in all. These Indians (apart from the Esquimaux who depended principally upon fishing) lived by hunting and trafficking in furs. The Mountaineers and Nascopies (particularly the latter who had a large admixture of Red Indian blood) had had but little connection with white men." That is the state of matters as alleged by my learned friend. May I just take one other point. I think it must have been an oversight. My learned friend referred to a map accompanying the census of 1871 in Volume VIII, page 3729. Would your Lordship look at that for just a moment ? For the purposes of his argument he asked your Lordships to look at this little map which accompanied the census. It faces 3730. My learned friend said if you look at that map you will see the Algonquins are a long way away from the part of the territory we are interested in. Does your Lordship see a little compartment marked II. On the other hand you see two compartments numbered 2 and 3, Nascopies and Montagnais, corresponding generally to the distribution of these people as we have heard it. He suggested, therefore, that we did not get in this region the Algonquin Indians. Would your Lordship, however, look at the letterpress upon page 3730. Your Lordship will notice there the Naskapis and Montagnais. The Naskapis inhabit the "interior of Labrador, southeast watersheds of Labrador, Rupert's Land to the east of Hudson's Bay, and the Mistassin Country." Then just below the Montagnais inhabit "the North shore of the Gulf and mouth of the St. Lawrence valley of the Saguenay River." My learned friend must have omitted to notice under the words "Naskopis" and "Montagnais" there appears "Al." If you turn to the next page, page 3731, you will see at line 11 : "Al. for the Algonquin race," so that I think I am entitled to say that the Montagnais and the Naskopis are regarded, and were regarded in 1871, as a branch of the Algonquin Indians inhabiting this interior of Labrador. One other very useful and neutral description of this matter is in Volume VI, at pages 2829 and 2830. These are papers from the Bureau of American Ethnology describing the Montagnais and Naskapi Indians. I will not delay over them, but I may say that this American writer describes the Montagnais as related to the Algonquins also, and he gives a description of them and the missionary work among them, and so on. This, of course, is modern, it is Washington 1907. It comes from quite a neutral source and tells us about these two groups of Indians, where they are, and about their religion, and all the rest of it, their hunting, and so on. I have given these references not because I need dwell upon them very much, because I think it is now agreed that there is not in the interior of this country merely a few Esquimaux, but well established Indians with hunting grounds known to the people of Quebec, and who resorted annually either to the Hudson's Bay or to the East, or came down to the St. Lawrence to trade in the peltries which they had got in their hunting grounds. That is the first stage I desire to make ; and the next step is this : that the document of Governor Murray was expressly transmitted by Lord Egremont to the Lords of Trade when they were entering upon this question of framing the proclamation and fixing the new Government areas. At page 902 of Volume III you will find a list of the enclosures accompanying Lord Egremont's letter with his instructions to the Lords of Trade as they are about to enter upon the next important object. The fourth document which was transmitted was General Murray's account. It was in that state of matters that the Lords of Trade proceeded to deal with it. Would your Lordship now look at page 910 of Volume III ?

Viscount HALDANE : We have been through this rather care-fully.

15 Nov., 1926.
Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord, but there is a point upon this of very great moment, if I may respectfully say so. This was the passage which my learned friend, Sir John Simon, said presented some difficulties to him. I respectfully submit it presents no difficulty to a person who approaches it from my point of view. " It is needless to state with any degree of precision the Bounds and Limits of this extensive Country, for We would humbly propose to Your Majesty that the new Government of Canada should be restricted, so far as to leave on the one hand all the lands lying about the great Lakes "—that is a place where the bulk of the Indians were—" and beyond the Sources of the Rivers which fall into the River St. Lawrence from the North, to be thrown into the Indian Country." What is being contemplated there is this, as there are all these Indians to the north of the St. Lawrence, the ones they have heard about, that territory beyond the sources of the rivers which fall into the River St. Lawrence should be thrown into the Indian country ; I underline the words " thrown into the Indian country." It is upon that that you find the proclamation dealing, as I submit, with the matter quite clearly, legislating. There was a controversy, you may remember, between His Majesty and the Lords of Trade as to whether everything should be thrown into the Governments or not. The King was apprehensive that territories might be left derelict ; the Lords of Trade did not take that view ; they thought it was better not to dispose of everything and to give definite boundaries to Quebec and these other provinces at that time, leaving over for the present the question of the disposal of the Indians. It is in the light of that information that I ask your Lordship to look for a moment at the proclamation itself on page 156. My learned friend's submission was that the paragraph which we find on page 156 deals not with any of these Indians in whom I am interested in Labrador, but with Indians hundreds of thousands of miles away.

Viscount FINLAY : I do not think he said hundreds of thousand.

p. 981

Sir JOHN SIMON : "Hundreds or thousands."

Mr. MACMILLAN : At any rate, shall we say a long way off ? I ask attention to this because it is very critical. " Whereas it is just and reasonable and essential to our interests and the security of our colonies, that the several nations or tribes of Indians with whom we are connected, and who live under our protection, should not be molested or disturbed in the possession of such parts of our dominions and territories, as not having been ceded to or purchased by us, are reserved to them, or any of them, as their hunting-grounds "—the word " ceded " there is nothing to do with the ceding by France ; it is ceded by the Indians—" are reserved to them, or any of them, as their hunting-grounds ; we do, therefore, with the advice of our Privy Council, declare it to be our Royal will and pleasure that no Governor or Commander-in-Chief in any of our Colonies of Quebec, East Florida, or West Florida, do presume upon any pretence whatever to grant warrants of survey, or pass any patents for lands beyond the bounds of their respective governments as described in their commissions." I pause there, my Lord. The next part of it is dealing with Indians in quite a different place. " As also that no Governor or Commander-in-Chief in any of our other colonies or plantations in America do presume for the present, and until our further pleasure be known, to grant warrants of survey, or pass patents for any lands beyond the heads or sources of any of the rivers which fall into the Atlantic Ocean from the west and northwest, or upon any lands whatever which, not having been ceded to or purchased by us, as aforesaid, are reserved to the said Indians or any of them." Two things are dealt with there. First of all the embargo placed upon the Governor or Commander-in-Chief of our Colony of Quebec. We may disregard the others for the moment. Secondly an embargo placed upon the Governor of our ancient colonies. These are the New England Colonies, Virginia, South Carolina, Georgia, and all the others. The Governors of these other colonies are not to " grant any warrants of survey or pass patents for any lands beyond the heads or sources of any of the rivers which fall into the Atlantic Ocean from the west and northwest " ; that is to say, up to the height of land, if you please, in the interior of our ancient colonies, but beyond that the land is to be reserved for the Indians. Then he goes on : " And we do further declare it to be our Royal will and pleasure, for the present as aforesaid, to reserve under our sovereignty, protection, and dominion, for the use of the said Indians, all the land and territories nor included within the limits of our said three new governments, or within the limits of the territory granted to the Hudson's Bay Company." Then comes again a second limb : "as also all the land and territories lying to the westward of the sources of the rivers which fall into the sea from the west and northwest as aforesaid ; and we do hereby strictly forbid, on pain of our displeasure, all our loving subjects from making any purchases or settlements whatever, or taking possession of any of the lands above reserved, without our especial leave and licence for that purpose first obtained." Then any who have settled in these lands are to remove. Then provision is made as to doing trade with them ; the trade with the said Indians at line 12 on page 157 is to be "free and open to all our subjects whatever, provided that every person who may incline to trade with the said Indians, do take out a licence for carrying on such trade."

Mr. Macmillan.

p. 982

Viscount HALDANE : You read "falling into the sea" as including the St. Lawrence ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : No, my Lord ; these are to the west of the rivers running down from the Alleghany to the sea. My learned friend has brought a great deal of learning and most interesting investigation to bear upon this matter, and he has always told you the main concern was with an Indian country inhabited by a large number of Indians round the lakes and extending over what you might call the central portion of North America generally. He said that that was what occupied the attention and anxiety of those who were framing this proclamation, because these had been the turbulent Indians who required to be conciliated or subdued, that it was always looking in that direction, looking westward rather than northward, and that the comparatively insignificant and friendly Indians in the Labrador Peninsula were entirely disregarded in this matter. My Lord, the language is not apt for that purpose ; the language deals with two cases and two cases quite distinctly. It deals first with Quebec, and it says now that we have delimited Quebec, our Governor is prohibited from making any grant outside the limits of his territory, because the territory outside his limits, the lozenge, is reserved to the Indians, and the trade with them is to be free and open to all our subjects, provided that they take out a licence. Now, will you turn to the document which my learned friend produced for the purpose of showing that it was not the Labrador Indians that we were concerned with, but other Indians.

15 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord
Warrington.

Mr. Macmillan.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Before you leave this page, under which words do you include the Labrador Indians ?

Lord
Warrington.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I include them as the persons inhabiting lands and territories not included within the limits of Quebec or within the limits of the territory granted to the Hudson's Bay Company ; that is on page 156.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Literally that would include the whole of the coast

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It would include the whole of the coast, and the explanation of that is that the same proclamation had said that the coast of Labrador was to be under the care and inspection of the Governor of Newfoundland. Looking at it purely from the question of coastal jurisdiction, it would not interfere with the working out of the Indian reservation. It is the same proclamation that talks of care and inspection.

p. 983

Lord WARRINGTON : Is there any inconsistency in saying that the Governor of Newfoundland was to exercise jurisdiction over the land so reserved ? It might still be reserved to the Indians, and the sovereignty and the protection of the Sovereign might be exercised by the Governor of Newfoundland. There was no trace of any attempt by settlers or others to encroach upon the Indians in Labrador ; at least there was no settlement : They had not the trouble that they had about the great Lakes where there were first French settlements and then the English settlements.

Mr. MACMILLAN : My answer is that when you look at the instructions to the Governor of Newfoundland and contrast them with the instructions to the Governor of Quebec, instead of finding the Governor of Newfoundland equipped to grant licences to trade and all these things regulating the Indians, the Governor of Quebec has all those powers and the Governor of Newfoundland has not any of them.

15 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Lord WARRINGTON : There is no doubt that the Indians with whom the Governor of Quebec would come in contact were a much more important set of men, and there was much more trouble with them, but we know that in May, 1763, the conspiracy of Pontiac broke out, and it had been smouldering for a long time. The reason for it are known.

Mr MACMILLAN : Your Lordship will perhaps suspend judgment until I complete this. My Lord, there are two or three other points entering into the picture, and then I will try and see whether these assist or not. Would your Lordship take the bundle of documents first of all that my learned friend put in ? You will see at once that they have nothing to do with the first branch of the proclamation ; they deal with the Indians who are referred to under the words " as also." Will you take the very first document : " Commission to Sir William Johnson." He is to be " Colonel of the six united nations of Indians and their confederates in the northern parts of North America." These were not people in Labrador at all. Will you observe what is said at the foot ? This is his successor, I take it, Atkin.

Sir JOHN SIMON : His colleague in the south.

Mr. MACMILLAN : He is appointed to be "Our agent for and superintendent of the affairs of our faithful allies the several nations of Indians inhabiting the frontiers of our colonies of Virginia, North and South Carolina and Georgia." Then if you look at the next one here is a recommendation by the Lords of Trade, "It appearing to us to be of great importance in the present conjuncture, That a proper person should be appointed by His Majesty to manage and conduct the Affairs of the several Nations of Indians upon the Frontiers of His Majesty's Colonies of Virginia, North and South Carolina and Georgia, by which means His Majesty's interests amongst the said Nations may be better cultivated," and so on. Then they beg leave to desire "that Edmund Atkin be appointed agent and superintendent of the affairs of the several nations of Indians upon the frontiers of the several colonies above mentioned." Then below it is noted that letters were sent to those Governors. These Indians, "the several nations of Indians upon the frontiers of the several colonies above mentioned," Virginia, North and South Carolina and Georgia, are those who were protected by the reservation of all land lying to the west of the rivers falling into the Atlantic from the north and northwest. That is the frontier that is being guarded there, and if you look again at No. 7 : "Commission to John Stuart to be Agent and Superintendent of the Indians inhabiting the frontiers of Virginia, North and South Carolina and Georgia," that is the reservation which is under the second head on page 156, and with great respect it seems to me that what is being considered there (no doubt a very anxious matter) is the conciliation of these Indians, undoubtedly the most important Indians, who lived to the west of the Alleghandys ; you are dealing there with the ancient colonies and the people who lived beyond the sources of the rivers falling into the Atlantic from the west and northwest. These Indians with whom I am concerned do not live there ; they do, on the other hand, live beyond the sources of the rivers falling into the River St. Lawrence which the Lords of Trade had suggested should be thrown into the Indian territory in that communication which preceded the issue of this very proclamation. Therefore you are dealing with two sets of people altogether ; you are dealing on the one hand with people who are found about Quebec and who are to be protected, in so far as they are outside the limits of Quebec, by this embargo upon approaches and who are to be traded with under licences ; on the other hand, you have this great body of Indians to the west of the Alleghandys. I am not concerned to dispute that the Indians round the lakes were a much more anxious proposition, but it seems a strange doctrine that because those Indians who were in Labrador had manifested friendliness to us, that our friends were to be disregarded in any protective proclamation, while our enemies were to have the privileges given to them of conciliation and protection. That these Indians in Labrador were in mind at this time is, I submit, plainly shown by this circumstance : that Governor Murray himself dealt with them. First of all, in Volume VI, page 2761, you find a paper with Governor Murray's signature to it.

Lord WARRINGTON : This is 1767.

Mr. MACMILLAN: Yes, my Lord ; it is within four years of the proclamation being issued. The importance of this is to show that he was dealing here with the Indians of the King's domain. On my learned friend's view the proclamation of 1763 had nothing to do with Indians in this part of the world at all ; it was concerned with the six nations, the Iroquois and all these other people. So far from that being the view which Governor Murray took of the situation, he regarded the pro- clamation of 1763 as dealing necessarily with the Indians of the King's posts. Now, the King's posts that are referred to there are posts along the coast. Four of them are mentioned, and these are four of the posts to which the Indians from the interior resorted.

Viscount HALDANE : You are referring to this for the construction put upon, it by Governor Murray ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, my Lord, at the time ; and to negative the view that when Indians are referred to in the proclamation they are not Indians in this neighbourhood at all. Will your Lordship see now what this document is ? It is first of all a discussion of the posts and then he says at the top of page 2761 : " After the reduction of Canada in 1760 The Indians of the Domain "—these are Indians in the Labrador area.

Sir JOHN SIMON : That surely is the question.

15 Nov., 1926.
Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : They are Indians on the St. Lawrence ; they are not Indians hundreds or thousands of miles from the coast.

Viscount HALDANE : They might have been Indians in the west.

Mr. MACMILLAN : These are the Indians who resorted to these posts on the St. Lawrence. These are Indians in this neighbourhood, if you will let me put it at its lowest. "After the reduction of Canada in 1750 The Indians of the Domain deputed their Chief and Missionary to adress General Murray in their favor, and represented to him that they were in the utmost misery and distress since the Conquest, destitute of provisions and every necessary, begging that they might be taken under the protection of His Britannick Majesty and supply'd and maintained in the same manner they had been in the time of the french."

Lord WARRINGTON : The posts are all within Quebec as laid down by the proclamation.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I am afraid I am not putting my point clearly. I am combating now the suggestion that the Indians which were in contemplation in the proclamation were not only the western Indians, but were Indians about this neighbourhood and in the neighbourhood of Quebec. "The General after enquiring into the nature and establishment of the Domain, reported a state of it to General Amherst who ordered it to be continued on the same footing as formerly, and an Agent or Director was appointed to supply them with merchandise etc. and to receive the returns on the King's Account." Then it talks about the leases that had been given on the posts of the King's domain, and then at line 31, "His Majesty was pleased to issue His Royal Proclamation signifying his pleasure with regard to North America and enjoining that the Trade with the Indians described therein might be free and open to all His Subjects. General Murray issued a proclamation in consequence of that of the King last mentioned setting forth that hostilities were now ceased with the several Indian nations who had lately appeared in arms against His Majesty's and a friendly intercourse between His Majesty's Subjects and then thereby restored, declaring that the trade with the several Indian nations living under his Protection was free and open to all His Subjects under the restrictions mentioned in said Royal Proclamation. The General having been doubtful whether the King's domain in Canada and the lease thereof granted on behalf of His Majesty was or was not affected by the King's proclamation as no express mention was therein made of the same, had reported his thoughts on that subject to the Board of Trade and received for answer in general terms that the fate of the Posts of the King's Domain was determined by the said Royal Proclamation of 7th October, 1763." Then he goes on to explain that a number of persons in Quebec were annoyed about this, because they had hoped that they would get this trade and that the King's domain would be thrown open. It was then decided that the King's domain must still be kept for the King's lessees, and therefore that the trade which was to be opened was to be outside, or beyond, the King's domain, because the King's domains were still to be kept for the lessees of the King trading in that particular part. Two things emerge from that, and two things of great importance : first of all, it is manifest that at this time included among the Indians who were then to be covered by the proclamation of 1763 were Indians who were in the King's posts ; that is to say, Indians who were at posts on rivers falling into the River St. Lawrence, the rivers that come in from the interior of Labrador. These Indians were regarded as being entitled to the benefits of the proclamation of 1763. General Murray regarded them as Indians within the purview of that Proclamation. That is very significant, because it shows, just as one would have expected, that these Indians were not omitted from consideration, and it chimes in perfectly with the language on page 156, where you have the two classes of Indian, those who are to the west of the Alleghanies and those who have been thrown into the Indian territory, namely, those who have their hunting grounds to the north of the rivers that fall into the River St. Lawrence and who come down those rivers to trade at these posts. Those Indians were regarded by General Murray as the Indians to whom the Proclamation applied.

p. 986

Mr. Macmillan.

Therefore I get a contemporary admission of the applicability of this Proclamation to persons who resorted to these posts ; and, so far from being Indians a long way off, they were Indians who were very much at home, and Indians closely associated with Quebec who, in the French period, as Mr. Geoffrion pointed out, had been carrying on a long and very intimate connection with these missionaries ; they had traded with them and at times had relieved them. Why, I ask, should these Indians have been kept from consideration ? My learned friend's point that possibly this yellow corridor might be the Indian territory, disappears at once when you look at the language, which shows that what is to be drawn into the Indian territory is the land lying to the north of the sources of the rivers falling into the St. Lawrence.

Your Lordships will recollect why I pointed to Map No. 27. When you looked at Map 27, you saw that the land north of the height of land there, is also land north of the yellow corridor shown on my friend's map. Therefore, what was contemplated as to be thrown into the Indian territory for the purposes of the Proclamation, was not that yellow strip, because that is to the south of the sources of the rivers falling into the St. Lawrence, but a territory to the north of the sources of the rivers falling into the St. Lawrence. It is at least common ground that the River St. John falls into the River St. Lawrence. The River St. Lawrence is a term not of precise connotation, but at least the River St. John falls into it. The land lying to the north of the River St. John was inhabited by the Indians, who came down in their canoes to trade their furs, and who came down from their hunting grounds in the green area, and these are the people with whom the Governor of Quebec was to allow free and open trade, subject to this, that in the portion of it known as the King's domain, the King's lessees had a monopoly ; but beyond that, it was an open and free trade where he might grant licences to all and sundry to trade.

My Lords, in these circumstances, why should not one go to the language of the Proclamation for its plain intention ? The language hardly admits of controversy. The Proclamation says : "Under our sovereignty, protection, and dominion, for the use of the said Indians." How these are "the several nations or tribes of Indians with whom we are connected, and who live under our protection." Indians from this very territory had come and asked General Murray to be put under his protection. I read the passage where it explained the difficulties they had been in since the Declaration of Peace.

15 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

They had been Indians in close touch with the French, our predecessors, and they were the people who were connected with us and who had asked to live under our protection. The said Indians are to have reserved to them what ?— "all the land and territories not included within the limits of our said three new Governments or within the limits of the territory granted to the Hudson's Bay Company." There are two people recognised as concerned in the Labrador peninsula. There is our new Governor of Quebec—the lozenge ; there is the Hudson Bay territory, whatever that may be, and so far as Newfoundland's interests are concerned in that neighbourhood, they have been in the mind of the framer of this Proclamation, but they have been in the mind of the framer of the Proclamation from this point of view, that His Majesty has placed a coastal strip from the River St. John to the Hudson Strait under the care and inspection of our Governor of Newfoundland. I am reading the document in the light of its own context. The fact that the coast of Labrador between these points had been put under the care and inspection of Our Governor of Newfoundland would cause no interference with this reservation of the interior lands and territories : not Hudson Bay on the one hand and not Quebec on the other, and the hunting grounds of the Indians in the interior.

My Lords, if it be suggested that the Governor of Newfoundland was as suitable a person to have a territory in which there were Indian reservations—a point, if I may say so, well worthy of consideration—the answer to that is this : that whereas the Commissions to the Governor of Quebec recognise the duties which he has towards Indians, you will search in vain for any comparable directions to the Governor of Newfoundland.

On that point I can give one or two short references, and that will practically conclude what I have to say on the Indians. My Lords, I put it in this way. Contrast the instructions given to Guy Carleton when the hinterland was thrown into Quebec in 1774, to be found in Volume IT, at page 832, with the trade in the interior—contrast those instructions with the instructions given to the Governor of Newfoundland, Captain Graves, in 1763, when he had, according to my friend, the same thing as Quebec got in 1774. At page 391 of the same volume you find the instructions given to Governor Graves. I only pray in aid the comparison between the two because it is the same area, according to my friend, which is passing under the two documents of 1763 and 1774. Contrast Graves at page 391 with Carleton at page 832. Then, my Lords, contrast again the instructions given to the Governor of Newfoundland when, in 1809, Newfoundland got back, according to my friend, the whole hinterland from Quebec : contrast those instructions with the instructions which persisted for the Governor of Quebec. The most striking thing is this Viscount HALDANE : What is the reference to that ?

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is Volume II, page 662. My Lord will permit me to offer this suggestion upon that point ; that when you look at Volume II, page C62, and see the instructions given to the Governor of Newfoundland when, for the second time, according to my friend, there was included in the Government the whole of this hinterland, it is astounding : the only instruction given to him is to have regard to the Indians in Newfoundland. He is expressly told in the 11th Article of his instructions : "You are to use your best endeavours to encourage a friendly intercourse with the Indians residing in Our Island of Newfoundland or resorting thither." Those instructions were given to a Governor who, as my friend would submit, had restored to him jurisdiction over a huge hinterland right up to the watershed including all these Montagnais and the Nascopies, of whom we have heard—he is told, if you please, "to encourage a friendly intercourse with the Indians residing in Our Island of Newfoundland"

Viscount FINLAY : What has that passage to be contrasted with?

Mr. MACMILLAN : It has to be contrasted with the instructions given to the Governor of Quebec. The instructions to the Governor of

p. 989

Quebec, on the other hand, first of all in 1774, when he was given this area, are at Volume II, page 832, which your Lordships already have. He was elaborately instructed in this matter about the peltry trade, and so on ; I have read all the passages already and I do not propose to trouble your Lordships with them again.

The instructions to the Governor of Quebec and, after 1791, to the Governor of Lower Canada remain the same regarding the pelty trade and Indians ; and that will be found vouched at Volume II, pages 878 and S82. ' Then one matter I think concludes it : that after 1791, as my Lords remember, the whole of Upper Canada was severed from the jurisdiction of the Governor of Quebec. There was then in 1791 a division of Canada into Upper and Lower Canada. Thereafter also Canada ceased to contain the lakes at all ; the lakes were then in Upper Canada and the Governor of Quebec was shut off so far as his administration was concerned, from the very places where my friend said the important Indians were congregated. The lakes were removed from his jurisdiction and put in the jurisdiction of another Governor, the Governor of Upper Canada.

Yet notwithstanding that, you find in the first of my additional documents—and that is the only one I have to refer to—an "additional instruction to the Governor, Lieutenant Governor, or the Person administering the Government of Our Province of Lower Canada for the time being." That is after the severance in 1791. "Given at Our Court at St. James's the 16th day of July, 1800, in the Fortieth year of our reign." Then it says : "Whereas we judge it to be conducive to the better Regulation of Lower Canada"—now these are not the Indians round the lakes at all—"that the same should be conducted by the Person exercising the Government of Our said Province for the time being," and so on ; then he goes on to give general instructions about that matter. But here is the Governor of Lower Canada, after it has been severed from his jurisdiction altogether, given instructions as to how he is to deal with the Indians of Lower Canada, not the Indians round the lakes at all.

My Lords, the natural reading of the Proclamation of 1763 at page 156 is the reading I have put upon it. You have there an outlook upon Indians from two points of view. You may look at this as the Indian territory to the west of the Alleghanies ; that is all dealt with by the instructions to the Governors along that coast, and that was in pursuance of the Treaty which had been made with those very Indians, the Treaty of Easton in 1758 ; that is Volume VI, page 3089. These people had had an arrangement made for their protection, and the second branch of the reservation, at page 156, ensures that, that shall be carried out. On the other hand, there had been thrown into the Indian territory those Indians, whose very name, the Naskopies, was on the map, there had been thrown into their territory the district to the north of the sources of the rivers falling into the St. Lawrence—a good general description of the hinterland in this district from which the Indians came down the rivers to trade at coastal points. That that did not apply to the King's domains, the Governor himself said, but the King's domains were reserved to lessees of the King, and the open and free trade in the peltries which was to be given to all His Majesty's subjects on licence was beyond those domains and not within those domains, those domains being reserved for His Majesty.

My Lords, I ask your Lordships accordingly to place upon this Proclamation the interpretation which it naturally bears on examination. The result is this, that you have in this area no undistributed middle, that you have in this area a complete disposition of the whole matter. You have it, of course, varying at different stages, but the subjects which at different stages figure in the apportionment, are, first of all, the Hudson Bay territory, secondly the Quebec territory, thirdly the Indian reservations, and fourthly, not always, of course, coincidentally, but I am taking them as at different periods they figure in the drama—fourthly, the Governor of Newfoundland, with a costal territorial jurisdiction designed to preserve the open and free fishery of His Majesty's subjects along this shore, which is designated contemporaneously by His Majesty as a placing of that coast under his care and inspection, which would not interfere with the Indians in the interior or their hunting grounds at all. These are the dramatis personae, I submit, in this epoch of the distribution of the Labrador territory, and if you have this in mind, the whole of this process of handing back and forward falls into a completely consistent whole.

Might I just say a word upon one point which my Lord Sumner suggested to me as a possible difficulty ? It is true that these Indian reservations would not be subject to any precise or definite government; but so, of course, would they be in any part which was reserved for the Indians , because the whole essence of it was that these were places to be reserved as a natural reservation for these people to carry on their own business. They were not subjected to a definite government in these places at any part, wherever it was, whether it was at one part or another ; and the reservations remained in the hands of the Crown under the direct personal responsibility of His Majesty, sometimes exercised through various officers or Commissioners to whom duties were assigned.

My Lords, the upshot of all this comes to be, as I humbly submit, this : that the watershed line down to the backbone of Labrador, which my friend maintains was the implied boundary of the coast of Labrador, and the line along the coast above the St. Lawrence, which my friend also claims as his boundary, have not been established, in the next step I have shown that there was an Indian territory there which was reserved to the Crown. That again fits in with my humble submission at the outset, that these matters were not in the minds at all of the persons whose governing consideration was the use of the margin of the sea for an open and free fishery. The submission which I make that the grant was limited to the preservation and fostering of an open and free fishery by giving a limited territorial jurisdiction along the coast between two points on the coast, is not only the most natural, but the most appropriate interpretation of this grant, and involves none of the difficulties in which my learned friend would seek to involve the question.

p. 991

Lord
Sumner.

My Lords, if we are away from the watershed and if I have established that it was a littoral jurisdiction which was accorded, then, of course, I am open to the observation, with which I have been more than once confronted, that I am not able to say whether it is one mile or half a mile or five miles. I am fully sensible of that. It is a difficulty which had been present to many of the people who were dealing with those very shores of Newfoundland and Labrador and with the question of how much is really necessary for the purpose of the fishing industry. I gave your Lordships, at an earlier part of my address, many passages dealing with the matter, and varying views were taken from 200 yards up to, in the French Convention, half a mile or one-third of a mile. We assumed that if we said a coastal strip of a mile inland, a mile in from the coast, following the sinuosities of the bay, we could have covered what one might call the maximum. I think it is the largest figure which we find mentioned in any of the documents, except the modern Newfoundland leases, where there is a reservation of five miles from the sea shore.

15 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

The LORD CHANCELLOR: I see in one place it is put at some-where between three to five miles.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is, for the getting of the timber. It is said there are no houses more than 200 or 300 yards from the shore, but in order to get the timber dragged down you may have to go as much as five miles inland. What we are anxious to ensure is, what in the minds of your Lordships is the fair littoral to subserve the maximum requirements of this jurisdiction, that should be accorded to Newfoundland; and while we have suggested a mile on a survey of the needs of this industry as indicated in the various attempts to delimit the coast, which have appeared in these papers, the matter is in your Lordships' hands, upon the evidence before you, as to what would be a fair figure which would include every fair view, which would be a maximum. As far as my clients are concerned, whatever figure your Lordships thought was a maximum so as to ensure the embracing of as much territory as could on any reasonable view be appurtenant to this jurisdiction, would in no sense be resented by my clients at all.

Lord SUMNER : I can see a little difficulty about that ; perhaps you can remove it. The question to us, as I read it, implies that there is a boundary described in the Proclamation and Statutes, and that we can find it and tell you, and that whatever we tell you, is something that is meant by the words used in those documents. I could conceive it being said that the words meant one mile from the shore or meant the watershed; but it is a little difficult to say that it meant in 1763 as much back from the shore as we, who know nothing at all about it, may be pleased to think is good enough to cover everything.

Mr. MACMILLAN : My Lord, I am fully sensible to that point, and I am fully sensible of the pressure of that point on my argument. Let

p. 992

Viscount Finlay.

Mr. Macmillan.

me endeavour to answer it, as your Lordship invites me to do. May I assume for the moment that the watershed is not the boundary. Of course, if the watershed is the boundary, it is quite easy, and I say so at once. But if the watershed is not the boundary, your Lordships would have exactly the same problem to solve, if you simply had the language here—and suppose there was an admission—let me put it in that form—that the watershed is not the boundary—your Lordships might have had precisely the same question addressed to you : "Where is the boundary ?" Your Lordships have as its measure a use, and you can declare the boundary to be a boundary which is limited by the use for which the littoral was confided to Newfoundland.

Lord SUMNER : Of course there is no difficulty in agreeing it.

15 Nov., 1926.

Viscount Finlay.

Mr. MACMILLAN : The difficulty is that your Lordship suggests that unless you take the watershed it is not possible to answer the question at all or to get a boundary at all.

Lord SUMNER : I do not say it is not possible ; I want you to say how we are to define the innocent little word "posts."

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : May I put it argumentatively in this way ? It may be that it is not the watershed. If it is not the watershed, then it must be somewhere else. If it is somewhere else, it is a coastal strip. Then the question is, what is the extent of the coastal strip. Your Lordships then would be judicially considering what is the meaning of a coastal strip on the shores of Labrador having regard to the intention of the grantors in the year 1763. Now that is problem which might quite well be submitted to a judicial tribunal, the problem, namely, of ascertaining what, in the minds of those who wanted a coastal strip but did not choose to define it by metes and bounds, was the depth or extent of it. Upon that, of course, a court would have to pass with the material which it has ; and here it has this material, that this very topic of what is a littoral of sufficient width to meet the requirements of the fishing, has been considered in various ways, and the figure which we suggest would be a figure which would represent a maximum of those varying contentions.

Lord Sumner. Viscount FINLAY : I suppose it would not be said that it was the amount that would have been sufficient in 1763, regard having to be had to future developments.

Mr. MACMILLAN : We are rather met here by the hypothesis that they had in 1763 an intention to confide something to Newfoundland ; but there again I do not think any difficulty would arise, because there is no suggestion in the papers before your Lordships that there has been an extension.

Mr. Macmillan. Lord FINLAY : There is not, as a matter of fact, but we have not got the materials for saying what amount of extension there has been.

p. 993

The Lord
Chancellor.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : It must be a boundary which was fixed in 1763 ; it cannot be a varying floating boundary.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I think not, my Lord.

Viscount FINLAY : My point is whether, in fixing that boundary, you are to have regard to probable future developments, which may require a little more than was actually used in 1763.

15 Nov., 1926.

Lord Sumner.

Mr. MACMILLAN : My Lord, I think the form of question rather restricts me to answering it in the way that the Lord Chancellor indicated ; because it is as put by the Statutes, Proclamations and Orders in Council. Therefore these are the documents. If these documents do not implicitly mean watershed, then equally they mean coast not up to the watershed ; and if I have established that the Hudson Bay watershed was not in the minds of these people, then I am afraid the problem does become a problem of saying now what in the minds of those people who submitted the coast to the care and inspection of the Governor of Newfoundland was the limit which they had in mind or which we must impose upon them as their intention.

Lord SUMNER : One might think the answer to that would be that the meaning of the word "posts" in the documents is that the line which in the mind of His Majesty in 1763 was traced through the woods and wildernesses of Labrador and is still unknown, limits the necessary user for the purpose of the coast fishery. Now there is the answer : "Go away and find that line."

Mr. Macmillan.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : That would be very helpful to both sides.

Lord Sumner.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I think if we knew that the view was that it was a purely littoral strip we would be a very long way to a solution of this problem. The main contest here is between a coastal strip and the hinterland.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Still you would have the trouble of deciding what a littoral strip means. A littoral strip means a strip determined by the coast.

Viscount HALDANE : And there are the inlets to be considered.

Mr. MACMILLAN : There is only the Hamilton Inlet ; that is an excrescence on the coast ; we follow the coast all the way along.

Lord SUMNER : I do not know whether recent maps are supposed

Mr. Macmillan.

p. 994

to indicate tendentiously what was at the time meant or not, but the two recent maps that I have looked at are, first the "Times" Atlas, which cuts across the mouths of two inlets far to the north as well as Hamilton Inlet, and, secondly, the map in the Cambridge Modern History, which cuts across Hamilton Inlet, but somehow makes Hamilton Inlet an inlet of Hudson Bay, which seems odd. They may only represent someone's notion of what the position was. Would you mind helping me on this. If you take that Newfoundland claim on which you go as your claims appear now, I understand you to say with regard to Hamilton Inlet that your boundary going across the mouth there represents a line which is impassable except by the consent of Newfoundland.

Lord Sumner.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That we would have to go through Newfoundland territory. I do not know what the law would be about an open inlet of that sort—whether it would be entitled to, or not.

Lord SUMNER : When I asked you the question before, I understood you to say that it was the same as if the line was drawn on land. At any rate, now, if you look at the top of the map you will see that according to that Cape Chidley is on an island. The centre of that island belongs to Quebec. The whole of the line round the coast goes to Newfoundland. How is Quebec going to get inside the island ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : I think there are many anomalies of that sort to be shown by the map.

Lord SUMNER : The same thing applies to some of these capes which have a very narrow peninsula and then bulge out ; but take any of those instances, how is a rigid line drawn along the coast of sufficient depth to be reconciled with the lakes which form an enclave ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Almost the same problem arose in the case of the Alaska boundary. Your Lordship may remember that there was a difficulty there about getting access, and there, of course, it was wider because it was the crests of the nearest mountains or 12 miles inland. Twelve miles was taken there as being the width of the littoral. It was the same problem there, and it was fixed on that basis by agreement. It is an awkward thing, of course, to have, so to speak, to hoop round the territory.

Lord SUMNER : We should have to say that although there were these difficulties, that is what His Majesty meant in 1763. Perhaps it may be so. I am very far from saying it is not.

Mr. MACMILLAN : One might confront it with this. That is an argument ab inconvenienti—which is always an impressive argument—but on the other hand the height of land, with great respect, seems to be just as unlikely.

Mr. Macmillan.
- Lord SUMNER : It is not so difficult in the narrow upper parts of Labrador to say the height of land. It is not so very far from the sea. It might be accepted there. It is when you get into this deep bulge round the basin of the Hamilton Inlet that there may be difficulty.
- Mr. MACMILLAN : May I try another answer. When they were thinking of the entrance to Hudson's Straits and thinking of the territory, they were thinking of Grimington Island.
- The LORD CHANCELLOR : I suppose it is probably impossible to-day to try and ascertain the territory occupied by these Indian tribes in 1763 ?
- Mr. MACMILLAN : You cannot, my Lord. They were all over this plateau.
- The LORD CHANCELLOR : You are only using the Indian argument for the purpose of destroying the height of land ?
- 15 Nov., 1926.
- Mr. MACMILLAN : I also humbly suggest it is not really inconsistent with the idea of the Esquimaux coast, the coast being under the care and inspection—that is the concomitant idea of the territorial jurisdiction—of the Governor of Newfoundland.
- Viscount Finlay.
- The LORD CHANCELLOR : I gather if the Board thought that five or ten or twenty miles were necessary for the fishing purposes, you would acquiesce ?
- Mr. MACMILLAN : I should regret it if your Lordships took so generous a measure, but at the same time our view is this. It is a fishing coast, and they are entitled to a fishing coast—a littoral which is measured by the reasonable requirements—we would say the maximum requirements—of such industry. Whatever would be the figure that commended itself to your Lordships we should, of course, loyally accept.
- Viscount HALDANE : You do not suggest they went more than 250 yards ?
- Mr. Macmillan.
- Mr. MACMILLAN : No ; but it is true to say that for getting wood they were in the habit of going further.
- Viscount HALDANE : They went up into the woods, and cut timber and brought it down in the form of logs.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I might also add that there is no timber in the north part. There is a zone beyond which no wood can grow. In the north part you get beyond the region where any pines will grow.

p. 996

Viscount HALDANE : How far up is the timber ?

The Lord
Chancellor.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I do not know, but I imagine that all this promontory in the north is beyond the woody part.

Viscount FINLAY : The element of wood seems to exclude any view of there being only 250 yards, if you were to bring that into account.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : We had not suggested 250 yards, of course.

Viscount FINLAY : In fact it is very difficult to suggest any fixed limit to apply all round the coast because the circumstances as regards wood may vary infinitely ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : No doubt.

Viscount FINLAY : By the way, are you going to add something on the question of indents of the sea ?

15 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Oh, yes. I think I have reached the stage now where I should say a word about that. I am not going to attempt componere lites, to enter into a renewal of the scientific questions. After all, as I think Sir John put it, and as I think my Lord was good enough to put it, is not the real question this : Are the shores or banks of Lake Melville "coast" in the sense of the critical words ? One does not use the word "coast" of the shores of a lake at all. Is the true criterion not rather this ? This is the one I have kept before my eyes the whole time. It is a coast for the purpose of a cod fishery, and if the banks or shores of Lake Melville have not shores to which it is necessary to resort for the purpose of a cod fishery, then this inland lake, as I submit, is not part of the Coast of Labrador within the meaning of the words of grant.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : It is all one body of water communi-cating with the sea. True, it is rather narrower at one point than at another, but there is no interruption. It is not an inland lake in the ordinary sense of the word.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is in truth, as I should submit, an inland lake which happens to be so near the sea that it is very nearly at sea level, but not quite. Its outlet is The Narrows, which is really the continuation of the river.

Viscount FINLAY : I suppose the other side will put it against you that it is so near the sea that it has become part of it.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Yes, that is the converse way of putting it.

p. 997

Lord WARRINGTON : And it is affected by the tides.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Of course, lots of river expansions are affected by the tide.

Viscount HALDANE : It is partly salt water, is it not ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : I think a fair way to say it is this. The bottom half of it is salt, the heavier water where the tides comes up underneath ; but the top part is brackish or fresh.

Sir JOHN SIMON: It is more salt than the Baltie.

Viscount Finlay.

Mr. MACMILLAN : That may be an interesting fact. We have heard that statement before. But the question surely is, does it subserve the purpose of the grant ? Does it subserve the general governing consideration of the reservation of a margin of the sea for fishing ? The question is, is it a margin of the sea ? It is noticeable geographically and physiographically that the rivers here have the habit of expanding into lakes. If your Lordships look at the green map you will notice that the whole of the hinterland is composed of great lake surfaces which are really en route of the rivers. They expand into large expansions, and then resume their course. Those large expansions are taking place, why ? Because a river in the course of its journey has encountered a large flat basin. It expands into that and fills it all up, and then looks like a lake. Then it resumes its journey at the other end and proceeds on. You have that conformation. If you have river expansion nearer the sea you will then have much more appreciable tidal effect upon it. You have a tidal effect right up the St. Lawrence River as far as Three Rivers.

15 Nov., 1926.

Viscount Finlay.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount FINLAY : Where is that ?

Mr. MACMILLAN : Between Quebec and Montreal. The Lake of St. Peter is one of those expansions of the River St. Lawrence. The River St. Lawrence flows into Lake St. Peter, and then flows out of it. It comes to be a question whether this is not merely one of those cases where a river no doubt on approaching the sea has encountered a large basin over which it has spread itself, and the true outlet of the river is

Viscount Finlay.

the Narrows. But the question, which I think will be more important to your Lordships than mere physiography or any of the other sciences, is the question whether it is part of the sea-coast or not. I suggest the criterion for that is, is it essential for carrying on the open and free fishery.

Viscount FINLAY : Can one introduce that qualification ? Is it part of the sea-coast, you can say. But then if you immediately go on to qualify that by saying, "so far as it will be used for the purposes of

Mr. Macmillan.

p. 998

carrying on sea fishers," you get into a different region. I doubt whether you can introduce that there.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I pray it in aid for this reason. The actual language of the Proclamation is : "And to the end that the open and free fishery of our subjects may be extended to and carried on upon the coast of Labrador, and the adjacent islands, we have thought fit . . . to put all that coast. under the care and inspection of our Governor of Newfoundland." Therefore I naturally examine the words "open and free fishery of our subjects," that being the end with which the thing has been done. The governing consideration has been the open and free fishery.

Viscount FINLAY : What strikes me as a difficulty in the way of that view is this. What is given must be plain in its terms. It is no doubt with a view to controlling the fishery, but what is granted is the use of the coast, and therefore what fairly falls within the term "coast" is taken to be granted. No doubt the motive is in order to enable the fishery to be carried on, but I doubt whether you can cut down the grant here, there, and in a third place, by saying "Oh, this bit is not really wanted for fishery."

Mr. MACMILLAN : I submit the language rather aids me, because you may remember it is : "We have thought fit . . . to put all that coast . . . under the care and inspection of our Governor of Newfoundland" ; and "that coast," reading backwards, is the coast upon which "the open and free fishery of our subjects may be carried on."

15 Nov., 1926.

Mr. Macmillan.

Viscount FINLAY : Yes, upon the coast of Labrador, but, of course, "coast" is a great entity.

Mr. MACMILLAN: I am fully aware of that difficulty. That is the cardinal difficulty of the case., May I just conclude that part of the case by saying this. I start with "the open and free fishery" there contemplated. I submit that on the plain interpretation of the words used at page 154 that has whatever nothing to do with salmon or any other animals but cod. I say that with confidence. I agree in law with my learned friend. The Common Law of England, as I understand, gives a right to fish in tidal waters.

Sir JOHN SIMON : An open and free right.

Mr. MACMILLAN: An open and free right—as my learned friend would like me to use the words—up to the limit of the tides. I am not at all sure that that is so in Scotland, but we are perhaps less enlightened there. In England, however, that is the law, and this no doubt was framed in the light of the Common Law of England. But that does not carry you very far. The question here is what was "the open and free fishery of our subjects" which was intended to be "extended to and carried on upon

p. 999

Sir John Simon.

the coast of Labrador." For the purpose I desire to make one or two references. First of all, I am interested to find that my learned friend is once more my best assistant, as he has been throughout in many of my arguments, in his written as contrasted with his oral arguments. If you will look at a sentence of his in his Counter-Case, page 91, I derive much sustenance from it. At the foot of that page he says : "In the island of Newfoundland itself the law regarded the interest of the cod-fishery only and forbade colonization, and the purpose of the Government was the development of the cod-fishery." That seems a very straight and definite statement. A person goes from an island where "the law regarded the interest of the cod-fishery only and forbade colonization, and the purpose of the Government was the development of the cod-fishery."

Mr. Macmillan.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : You ought perhaps to read the sentence at the top of the next page.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I was going on to read that. "Nor was any substantial interest taken in the interior land : yet no one would suggest that the Governor was not Governor of every part of the island." That is the argumentative part of it, but the statement of fact is that in the island of Newfoundland the law regarded the interest of the cod-fishery only.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I do not know whether my learned friend would think it right to read the passage at line 11 of the next page.

Mr. MACMILLAN : "Though the cod-fishery was always the main, it was never the exclusive object of the Government's interest."

Sir JOHN SIMON : I think it should be read as clearly as the first passage you read. "Moreover, as in Newfoundland, so on the Coast of Labrador, though the cod-fishery was always the main, it was never the exclusive object of the Government's interest. There was not from the first any attempt to prevent fishermen from fishing for salmon in the rivers or from hunting or trapping for fur."

Mr. MACMILLAN : It is a little difficult to reconcile that with the statement that "in the island of Newfoundland itself the law regarded the interest of the cod-fishery only." But there may be an inconsistency in the pleading. However, I do not rest upon merely a pleading.

Viscount HALDANE : Of course, there is the pulp industry, and there are many other things now.

Mr. MACMILLAN : Of course, there is the pulp industry. But the point I desire to make, and which I can make quite shortly, is this.

The Lord
Chancellor.

Throughout the whole of this business you find that the controlling matter is the observance of the Act of 1699. That was the great Act for encouraging the trade to Newfoundland, and it was that Act which the Governor of Newfoundland was exhorted to carry out. It was an Act which related to cod-fishing, and did not relate to salmon or any other such fishing. The trade to Newfoundland which was there sought to be encouraged was a fishery trade, and no other trade. It was the trade which was carried on by the ships that left the ports of England and went out there and really were such a nursery for our Navy. The Government of this country have always considered the trade of Newfoundland merely as a fishery. So say the Lords of Trade on the 10th May, 1790, Volume IV, page 1878. That was the Statute which was to control all that the Governor of Newfoundland did. It was a Statute which had no relation to salmon fishing, and which had only relation to cod fishing. My learned friend said that that Act did not apply to the coast of Labrador. It is true that the Governor of Newfoundland apparently had some doubt about it, but it is noteworthy that in point of fact this Act of 1699 expressly is referred to in the instructions to Guy Carleton in 1775. He is to regulate himself by it. In 1775, as you remember, the whole of the coast was put in the hands of Guy Carleton. After the 1774 Act, he was instructed to conform himself to the Act of 1699. And so was Graves, the Governor of Newfoundland, when he was in charge. I observe, moreover, that Hugh Palliser, the energetic Governor of Newfoundland, had no doubt in his mind that it did, or at least ought to apply. So says he at Volume III, page 1041, and it was because he was applying it with such rigour that he got into trouble with the old French sedentary fishermen on the north bank of the St. Lawrence. If you have all these things in mind, and have in mind that the cod do not resort to this lake, it seems plain, does it not, that the "open and free fishery" which is to be encouraged and extended is the cod fishery regulated by the Act of 1699; and for the purpose of carrying on that open and free fishery for which a coastal territory is confided to Newfoundland, it was unnecessary to include any part of this great inland sheet of water which possesses the attributes rather of a lake, which seems to be almost invariably called a lake in contradistinction to a sea, and which has not coasts in the sense of "sea-coast" at all

Sir JOHN SIMON : I do not think it was called a lake until 1820.

Mr. MACMILLAN : It was called a river at one stage.

Sir JOHN SIMON: I do not think it was called a lake before 1820.

Mr. MACMILLAN : If you say that I will accept it.

p. 1001

Sir JOHN SIMON : The Melville in question was First Lord of the Admiralty in 1820.

Mr. MACMILLAN: In fact, it was only discovered by Newfoundland in 1821, but that would not affect the interpretation of it.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I quite agree.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I think it must be right if it is called after Lord Melville.

Sir JOHN SIMON : It was called after the second Lord Melville.

Mr. MACMILLAN : I think I have now really concluded all the topics on which I ought to address your Lordships. It is not necessary for me to say anything about Woody Island. There is always a Derby dog at a race, and that very small topic is one which I need not once more trot out across the course. My submission is that on the Woody Island point I succeed.

One has now come to the conclusion of this long debate. I need not rehearse again to your Lordships the submissions I respectfully make on behalf of the Dominion of Canada. They must be truly present to your Lordships' minds, and the importance of those considerations, I am sure, will be weighed by your Lordships along with the impressive arguments which my learned friend has submitted from the other side.

Sir John Simon at the end of his address spoke in happy phrases of the good friendship and neighbourliness existing between the Dominion of Canada and the Ancient Colony. My Lord, I, in turn, would like to express my appreciation of the spirit in which this controversy has been conducted. In the words of Shakespeare : " We may have striven mightily as adversaries do in law, but we are prepared to eat and drink as friends." In ancient Rome, my Lord, the God of Boundaries was honoured at the great annual festival of the Terminalia. In these days we are more prosaic, but the decision which your Lordships are going to pronounce will, I doubt not, be hereafter a memorable one in the annals of the British Empire.

My Lord, I have no Latin quotation to grace my concluding words, but there is consolation in the reflection that on neither of us can rest the curse pronounced on him who removes his neighbour's landmarks, for no one can be guilty of removing boundaries whose existence your Lordships have yet to ascertain.

Sir JOHN SIMON : I do not know whether I might mention the case my learned friend quoted in reply. The well-known case of St. Katherine's Milling Co. has in fact since been before the board. If I might draw your Lordship's attention to it, there is the Judgment of Mr. Justice Duff in the case called Attorney-General for Quebec v. Attorney-

p. 1002

General for Canada, in 1921, 1 Appeal Cases, page 401. There is an incidental reference to the Proclamation at page 410.

The LORD CHANCELLOR : Their Lordships will take time to consider the advice which they will tender to His Majesty on this Reference. In the meantime I desire to acknowledge on behalf of the Board the great care and research which has been used in preparing the case for the Board, and also our indebtedness to the able arguments of Counsel on both sides.

REPORT OF THE LOARDS OF THE JUDICIAL

DELIVERED THE 1ST MARCH, 1927.

Present at the Hearing:

THE LORD CHANCELLOR.
VISCOUNT HALDANE.
VISCOUNT FINLAY.
VISCOUNT SUMNER.
LORD WARRINGTON OF CLYFFE.

[Delivered by THE LORD
CHANCELLOR.]

The Government of the Dominion of Canada and the Government of the Colony of Newfoundland having petitioned His Majesty to refer to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council the following question: -

"What is the location and definition of the boundary as between Canada and Newfoundland in the Labrador Peninsula under the Statutes, Orders in Council and Proclamations?"

that question has been referred to this Board under the Statute 3 and 4 Will. IV, c. 41, s. 4, for its consideration and advice. The Board has

p. 1006

accordingly heard evidence and arguments upon the matter, and has now arrived at a conclusion.

The Orders in Council and Proclamation upon which the decision must mainly depend were made in the year 1763, and it may seem strange that a question which affects (as it now appears) the jurisdiction over 5 more than 100,000 square miles of territory has remained so long undecided. But an explanation is to be found in the fact that the region in dispute consists mainly of dense forests and bleak and inhospitable table-lands, of which the greater part is uninhabited (except by a few Indian families) and was until recently unexplored, being visited only 10 occasionally by a few trappers in search of furs. The country has accordingly been regarded as having little or no value, and it is only in recent years, when the growing demand for -paper has attracted attention to the vast quantity of timber suitable for pulping, that a serious controversy as to its ownership has arisen. The question of boundary 15 was first raised in or about the year 1888, and was the subject of discussion at the Halifax Conference of 1892; but no solution was then reached, and it was not until the year 1903 that the Government of Canada, having been informed that the Government of Newfoundland had issued a licence for cutting timber in the neighbourhood of the 20 Hamilton River, raised the question in a serious form. Since that time the matter has been the subject of close and skilled investigation, and it now comes before this Board for decision. The issue so raised is, as Lord Hardwicke said in another connection, of a nature " worthy the judicature of a Roman Senate " (Penn v. Lord Baltimore, 1750, 1 Ves. 25 Sen. 444) ; but the duty of the Board is not to consider where the boundary in question might wisely and conveniently be drawn, but only to determine where, under the documents of title which have been brought to their notice, that boundary is actually to be found.

The capture of Quebec in the year 1759 was followed by other British successes; and by the Treaty of Paris, signed on the 10th February, 1763, the Most Christian King ceded to His Britannic Majesty in full right " Canada with all its dependencies as well as the island of Cape Breton and all the other islands and coasts (côtes) in the gulf and river of St. Lawrence and in general everything that depends on the said 35 countries, lands, islands and. coasts "—a description which included the whole of the great peninsula of Labrador, except such parts of it as had been already granted to the Hudson's Bay Company by their charter of 1670 and confirmed to them under the Treaty of Utrecht. British sovereignty over the whole of the vast region which had 40 belonged to or been claimed by France having been thus secured, it became the duty of the advisers of King George III to consider what government or governments should be established in the territories so acquired; and the Lords of Trade (a name then usually given to the Lords Commissioners for Trade and Plantations) first turned their attention to Labrador. On the 15th March, 1763, in reporting to the King upon the steps proper to be taken for the protection of the fisheries upon the coasts of Newfoundland and in the gulf and river of St. Lawrence, they observed that "upon the coast of Labrador it will be impossible to prevent the French continuing to have the full benefit of their former commerce with the Indians of that coast unless some British settlement should be made there, or sufficient cruisers stationed with instructions to the Commanders to seize all French ships coming within a certain distance of that coast." Shortly after receiving this report the Secretary of State (Lord Egremont) caused a letter to be written to the Hudson's Bay Company, whose territory extended to the entrance of Hudson Straits at the extreme northern end of the peninsula of Labrador, expressing his desire to know as soon as possible "what were the limits upon the coast between the Hudson's Bay Company and the coast of Labrador" ; and on the morning of the 24th March Sir William Baker, the Governor of the Company, waited on the Secretary of State and had an interview with him. Immediately after this interview, namely, on the 24th March, the Secretary of State wrote a letter to the Lords of Trade informing them that the King had "judged it proper that all the coasts of Labrador from the entrance of Hudson's Straits to the River of St. John's, which discharges itself into the sea nearly opposite the west end of the island of Anticosti, including that island with any other small islands on the said coast of Labrador, and also the islands of Madelaine in the gulf of St. Lawrence, should be included in the government of Newfoundland," and requesting them to prepare for the King's approval the draft of a new Commission for Captain Thomas Graves (who was then Governor of Newfoundland) to be "Governor of the island of Newfoundland and of the coast of Labrador with the several islands as above described," and revised Instructions for the Governor's guidance. Drafts were accordingly prepared, and on the 30th March both drafts were submitted to the King in Council and approved for issue in regular form. On the 25th April the revised Commission was duly sealed and the revised instructions signed by the King; and, armed with these documents, and also with separate Admiralty instructions issued to him as Commander in Chief of His Majesty's ships on the Newfoundland station, Captain Graves. sailed on the 2nd May to take up his duties.

By the Commission as passed under the Great Seal on the 25th April, 1763, in accordance with the Order in Council of the 30th March, King George III revoked the former Commission (dated the 29th May, 1761) by which Captain Graves had been appointed Governor and Commander-in-Chief of the island of Newfoundland and constituted and appointed him to be the King's " Governor and Commander-in-Chief in and over our said island of Newfoundland and all the coasts of Labrador from the entrance of Hudson's Straits to the river St. John's, which discharges itself into the sea nearly opposite the west end of the island of Anticosti, including that island with any other small islands on the said coast of Labrador and also the islands of Madelaines in the gulf of St. Lawrence, as also of all our forts and garrisons erected and established or that shall be erected and established in our said islands of Newfoundland, Anticosti and Madelaine, or on the coast of Labrador within the limits aforesaid," and required him to conform to the Instructions given or to be given to him. By the same document power was given to the Governor to administer the oath of allegiance to all persons who should at any time "pass into our said islands or shall be resident or abiding there or upon the coasts of Labrador within the limits aforesaid"; to constitute and appoint judges and justices of the peace for the administration of justice and keeping the peace and quiet of "the said islands and coasts," with power to hold Quarter Sessions and adjourn the same as might be convenient "for the peace and welfare of our subjects inhabiting 5 there"; and to erect and set apart court-houses for such justices of the peace and prisons for the keeping of offenders. The Commission required all officers, civil and military, "and all other inhabitants of our said islands and the coasts and territories of Labrador and islands adjacent thereto or dependent thereupon within the limits aforesaid," to be 10 obedient, aiding and assisting the Governor in the execution of the Commission.

By the Instructions to Captain Graves, as passed under the Royal Sign Manual in accordance with the same Order in Council, the Governor was directed (among other things) to use his best endeavours 15 to prevent aliens or strangers from fishing or drying fish " on any of the coasts or in any of the harbours of the islands and territories under your government " except as allowed by the 13th Article of the Treaty of Utrecht and the 5th Article of the Treaty of Paris; to visit all " the coasts and harbours of the said islands and territories under your 20 government " in order to inspect and examine the state of the fisheries carried on there; to endeavour to procure accurate maps of " the several harbours, bays and coasts of Newfoundland and the other islands and territories under your government," and in particular to cause a vessel under his command to " search and explore the great inlet commonly 25 known by the name of Davis' inlet, in order to discover whether the same has or has not any passage to Hudson's Bay, or any other enclosed sea." The Instructions also required the Governor to enquire and report " whether any or what further establishment may be necessary to be made or forts erected in any part of Newfoundland or the other islands or territories under your government either for the protection of the fishery, the security of the country, or the establishing and carrying on a commerce with the Indians residing in or resorting to the said islands or inhabiting the coast of Labrador."

It is worthy of notice that in these two documents, which are of 35 primary importance for the purposes of this enquiry, no distinction was made between the island of Newfoundland and the coast of Labrador, both being included in identical terms in the territories placed under the care of the Governor, and the powers applicable to one being equally applicable to the other.

The business relating to Captain Graves's command having been thus disposed of, Lord Egremont turned his attention to the ceded territory in general, and by a letter dated the 5th May, 1763, requested the Lords of Trade to consider and report upon a number of questions relating to that territory, including the question what new governments 45 should be established and what form should be adopted for such new governments. In the same letter he called attention to the desirability of conciliating the Indians in the " Indian country " by protecting their persons and property and securing to them the rights and privileges which they had hitherto enjoyed. The Lords of Trade replied by an elaborate report dated the 8th June, 1763, in which, after setting out the advantages which, in consequence of the cession of French Canada, would accrue to the fishing and fur trades and the planting and settlement of North America, they recommended that three new governments should be erected under the names of Canada, East Florida and West Florida, with certain boundaries indicated in the report, and that certain lands outside those limits—described in the report as "all the lands lying about the Great Lakes and beyond the sources of the rivers which fall into the river St. Lawrence from the north"—should be left as an Indian country, open to trade, but not to grants or settlements. After some discussion as to the boundaries of the proposed new government of Canada (which it was decided to call Quebec), the King agreed to the proposals of the Lords of Trade, with the addition of a provision that the "interior country" to be reserved for the use of the Indians should be placed under the control of a military commander-in-chief. A draft Proclamation for giving effect to this decision was accordingly prepared by the Lords of Trade, and was approved for issue at a meeting of the Privy Council held on the 5th October.

By this Proclamation, which was dated the 7th October, 1763, the King declared that he had, with the advice of his Privy Council, granted letters patent under the Great Seal to erect within the countries and islands ceded and confirmed to him by the Treaty of Paris, four distinct and separate governments styled and called by the names of Quebec, East Florida, West Florida and Grenada. The limits and boundaries of these governments were defined by the Proclamation, those of the government of Quebec being described as follows :—

"Firstly.—The Government of Quebec, bounded on the Labrador Coast by the river St. John, and from thence by a line drawn from the head of that river, through the Lake St. John, to the south end of the Lake Nipissim; from whence the said line, crossing the river St. Lawrence, and the lake Champlain in forty-five degrees of north latitude, passes along the high lands which divide the rivers that empty them-selves into the said river St. Lawrence from those which fall into the sea; and also along the north coast of the Baye des Chaleurs, and the coast of the gulph of St. Lawrence to Cape Rosieres, and from thence crossing the mouth of the river St. Lawrence by the west end of the Island of Anticosti, terminates at the aforesaid river St. John."

After defining the boundaries of the three other new governments, the Proclamation proceeded :—

"And to the end that the open and free fishery of our subjects may be extended to and carried on upon the coast of Labrador and the adjacent islands, we have thought fit, with the advice of our said Privy Council, to put all that coast, from the river St. John's to Hudson's Streights, together with the islands of Anticosti and the Madelaine and all other smaller islands lying upon the said coast, under the care and inspection of our Governor of Newfoundland."

The Proclamation also contained the following further declarations :—

"And whereas it is just and reasonable, and essential to our interest and the security of our colonies, that the several nations or tribes of Indians with whom we are connected and who live under our protection, should not be molested or disturbed

in the possession of such parts of our dominions and territories as, not having been ceded to or purchased by us, are reserved to them or any of them as their hunting grounds; we do therefore, with the advice of our Privy Council, declare it to be our Royal will and pleasure, that no Governor or Commander-in-Chief in any of our colonies of Quebec, East Florida, or West Florida, do presume upon any pretence whatever to grant warrants of survey, or pass any patents for lands beyond the bounds of their respective governments as described in their commissions; as also that no Governor or Commander-in-Chief in any of our other colonies or plantations in America do presume for the present, and until our further pleasure be known, to grant warrants of survey, or pass patents for any lands beyond the heads or sources of any of the rivers which fall into the Atlantic Ocean from the west and northwest, or upon any lands whatever which, not having been ceded to or purchased by us as aforesaid, are reserved to the said Indians or any of them.

And we do further declare it to be our Royal will and pleasure, for the present as aforesaid, to reserve under our sovereignty, protection, and dominion, for the use of the said Indians, all the land and territories not included within the limits of our said three new governments or within the limits of the territory granted to the Hudson's Bay Company; as also all the land and territories lying to the westward of the sources of the rivers which fall into the sea from the west and northwest as aforesaid; and we do hereby strictly forbid, on pain of our displeasure, all our loving subjects from making any purchases or settlements whatever, or taking possession of any of the lands above reserved, without our especial leave and licence for that purpose first obtained."

It is to be noted that this Proclamation, although sometimes referred to in the later documents as if it were the origin of the title of Newfoundland to its territory in Labrador, was in fact only declaratory of an annexation which had already been effected by the Commission approved by the Order in Council of the 30th March and issued to Captain Graves; and it is plain that the statement in the Proclamation that the coast of Labrador had been placed "under the care and inspection" of the Governor of Newfoundland was not intended to take anything from the rights conferred upon the Governor by his Commission. In the Commissions issued to the Governors of Newfoundland who succeeded Captain Graves, the language of the original Commission was retained unaltered.

The annexation to Newfoundland of the southern coast of Labrador bordering on the Gulf of St. Lawrence soon led to difficulties. It had been the policy of the British Government not to encourage planting and settling in Newfoundland or to establish a form of civil government there, but rather to treat the island as a base to which fishing vessels should proceed in each season and which they might use for drying and curing their fish and for other purposes connected with the fishing industry; and, in pursuance of that policy, it had been the practice to appoint as Governor a Naval officer who was also charged, under instructions issued by the Admiralty, with the protection of the free fishing rights of British subjects, such local administration as was required being entrusted to "Admirals of Harbours," who were in fact masters of fishing vessels selected in the order of their arrival in the island harbours. Indeed, the Newfoundland of that day was sometimes spoken of as resembling a great ship provisioned and fitted out by the mother 50 country, and moored off the American continent for the convenience of English fishermen, and its government as a "floating government."

p. 1011

When the Labrador Coast was added to Newfoundland, the same policy was applied to that coast; and Hugh Palliser, who in 1764 was appointed to succeed Captain Graves as Governor of Newfoundland and the coasts of Labrador, applied that policy to the added territory, including the northern shore of the gulf of St. Lawrence. He forbade all persons from Quebec or any of the Colonies to winter on the coasts of Labrador under his government; and ultimately, by a regulation dated the 28th August, 1765, he went so far as to order that no person whatever should resort to Labrador to fish or trade except ship fishers annually arriving from His Majesty's Dominions in Europe and carrying men engaged to return to those Dominions after the season was over. These restrictions led to serious complaints from the "sedentary fishermen," mostly of French nationality, who had long been settled on the north shore of the gulf of St. Lawrence and had been engaged in the seal and 15 salmon fishery there, and some of whom had received grants of land from the French Government; and early in the year 1766 these settlers and some Quebec traders presented memorials to the Lords of Trade praying to be reinstated in their rights and possessions. These memorials were taken into consideration, and after a considerable correspondence with Governor Palliser (against whom some of the complainants brought an action at law in London) the Lords of Trade, by reports dated the 24th June, 1772, and the 2nd March, 1773, recommended that the part of the coast of Labrador between the river St. John and the Ance des Espagnols or Baie Phillippeaux near the Straits of Belleisle—being the part of Labrador, with which the settlers and traders were concerned—should be taken from the government of Newfoundland and restored to its dependence on the government of Quebec. This proposal was apparently approved by the King's advisers, and on the 22nd April, 1773, an Order in Council was passed for the preparation of the instruments necessary for carrying it into effect; but it was ultimately determined that the matter should be dealt with by a provision to be inserted in the Bill for the Quebec Act of 1774, which was then under consideration. In the course of the preparation of that Bill the proposal made by the Lords of Trade was enlarged so as to provide for the transfer 35 to the Province of Quebec not only of the coast of Labrador from the river St. John to the Ance des Espagnols, but of the whole of the territory in Labrador which had been annexed to Newfoundland. The clauses of the Bill relating to Newfoundland were strenuously opposed by Mr. Edmund Burke, Admiral Saunders and others, but were ultimately carried into law. Accordingly, by the British North America (Quebec) Act, 1774, after reciting (among other things) that by the arrangement made by the Proclamation of 1763 "certain parts of the territory of Canada where sedentary fisheries had been established and carried on by the subjects of France, inhabitants of the said Province of Canada, under grants and concessions from the Government thereof were annexed to the Government of Newfoundland and thereby subjected to regulations inconsistent with the nature of such fisheries," it was enacted that the territories therein described and also "all such territories, islands and countries which have since the 10th February, 1763, been made part of the Government of Newfoundland" be annexed to and made part of the Province of Quebec as created and established by the Proclamation of the 7th October, 1763.

Soon after the passing of this Act it became apparent that in transferring to the Government of Quebec, not only the parts of Labrador where the "sedentary fishery" for seal, sea-cow and salmon had been carried on, but also those parts facing towards the Atlantic where the great cod and whale fisheries had flourished, a serious blunder had been committed. Complaints were made that the Government of Quebec paid no attention whatever to the cod fisheries on the Atlantic coast, and that "in truth there was no government whatsoever on that coast"; and, ultimately, by the Newfoundland Act, 1809, section 14, it was enacted:

"That such parts of the coast of Labrador from the river St. John to Hudson's Straights, and the said Island of Anticosti and all other smaller islands so annexed to the Government of Newfoundland by the said Proclamation of the seventh day of October One thousand seven hundred and sixty-three (except the said islands of Madelaine), shall be separated from the said Government of Lower Canada and be again re-annexed to the Government of Newfoundland; any thing in the said Act passed in the Thirty-first Year of His present Majesty's Reign, or any other Act, to the contrary notwithstanding."

It would seem that, in so restoring to Newfoundland the whole of the coast of Labrador originally annexed to that government, Parliament omitted to have regard to the position of the sedentary fishermen in the gulf of St. Lawrence which had given rise to so many complaints before the passing of the Act of 1774; and, as might have been expected, these complaints were soon renewed, with the result that in the year 1825 effect was at last given to the counsel tendered by the Lords of Trade in 1773. By the British North America (Seigniorial Rights) Act, 1825, S.9, after reciting that under and by virtue of the Acts of 1774 and 1.809 the coast of Labrador from the river St. John to Hudson's Straights and the islands above referred to were " annexed to and form part of the Government of Newfoundland," and that it was expedient that "certain parts of the said coast of Labrador should be re-annexed to and form part of the province of Lower Canada," it was enacted :

"that so much of the said coast as lies to the westward of a line to be drawn 35 degrees north and south from the bay or harbour of Alice Sablon, inclusive, as far as the fifty-second degree of north latitude, with the island of Anticosti and all other islands adjacent to such part as last aforesaid of the coast of Labrador, shall be and the same are hereby re-annexed to and made a part of the said province of Lower Canada, and shall henceforward be subject to the laws of the said province and to no other."

The bay or harbour of Ance Sablon referred to in this section lies a little to the east of the Ance des Espagnols or Phillippeaux Bay.

The statute of 1825 is the last of the documents directly affecting the annexation to Newfoundland of a part of Labrador; but it may be here mentioned that by an Act passed in the year 1840 the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, into which Quebec had been divided in the year 1791, were united to form one province of Canada; that, in the year

p. 1013

1854 Newfoundland, in which a representative Government had been established in 1832, became a responsible self-governing Colony; that by the British North America Act, 1867, the Dominion of Canada was set up, Lower Canada becoming the Province of Quebec; and that by an Order in Council made in 1880 it was ordered and declared that :—

"From and after the first day of September 1880, all British territories and possessions in North America not already included within the Dominion of Canada, and all islands adjacent to any of such territories or possessions, shall (with the exception of the Colony of Newfoundland and its dependencies) become and be annexed to and form part of the said Dominion of Canada, and become and be subject to the laws for the time being in force in the said Dominion in so far as such laws may be applicable thereto."

Thus either by the statutes already cited or by the last-mentioned Order in Council, the Dominion of Canada, and particularly its Province of 15 Quebec, has become the next neighbour to the dependencies in Labrador of the Colony of Newfoundland, and the question of boundary falls to be determined as between the Dominion and the Colony.

At this point it is desirable to set out the contentions of the two parties. The contention of the Dominion is that the "coast" which by the Commission and Proclamation of 1763, as modified by the subsequent statutes, was annexed to Newfoundland, is

"a strip of maritime territory, extending from Cape Chidley at the entrance to Hudson Strait, to the eastern headland of the bay or harbour of Blanc Sablon on the Strait of Bellisle, and comprising, in its depth inland, only so much of the land immediately abutting on the sea, above low-water mark, as was accessible and useful to the British fishermen annually resorting to that coast in the ordinary conduct of their fishing operations, for the purposes of 'the open and free fishery' extended to that coast by the Royal Proclamation and carried on there and for those purposes only" ;

but, recognising that it may be found impracticable to lay down such a line upon the land, Canada suggests "that the boundary be located as a line to be drawn from the eastern headland of the bay or harbour of Blanc Sablon on the south to Cape Chidley on the north at a distance from high-water mark on the seacoast of the peninsula of Labrador of one mile."

On the other hand, the contention of the Colony of Newfoundland is that the boundary should be "a line drawn due north from Ance Sablon as far as the fifty-second degree of North latitude, and should be traced from thence northwards to Cape Chidley along the crest of the watershed of the rivers flowing into the Atlantic Ocean."

In order to make the matter clear, a sketch-map illustrating the two claims is annexed. On this map the territory proposed by the Dominion as the land to be allotted to Newfoundland is indicated by a thick black line following the line of the seashore, while the boundary claimed by the Colony is marked by a broken line with a hatching over it.

It may be added that the Colony contends that, in the event of the Dominion establishing its main contention, the littoral strip of land which would then represent the territory annexed to Newfoundland should not cross the mouth of the great Hamilton Inlet as shown on the sketch-map, but should be carried along the northern shore of that inlet and round the head of Goose Bay and so back along the southern shore of the inlet to the seacoast.

p. 1014

Before examining these claims in detail, their Lordships think it desirable to formulate two propositions which appear to be common to both sides, and which indeed are beyond dispute. First, the word "coast" or "coasts" (for both are used in the documents) is a word of undefined meaning; and while it is usually to be understood in the sense which is given to it in Dr. Johnson's and other dictionaries, that is to say, as meaning "the edge or margin of the land next the sea" or "the shore," there are many examples of its being used to denote a considerable tract of land bounded by and looking towards the sea. In Murray's Oxford Dictionary (1891) it is 15 stated that the term "is familiarly applied in different regions to specific littoral districts, in India especially to the Coromandel coast"; and in the "Encyclopaedia Britannica (12th edition, 1922) that the word is sometimes applied to the bank of a river or lake and sometimes to a region (cf., Gold Coast, Coromandel Coast), which may include the hinterland." In the Appendix of documents used in this inquiry a number of extracts are given from the Old and New Testaments and from well-known authors, in which the word "coast" is used as signifying a whole country, sometimes extending from the sea to the sources of the rivers running into it; and it is plain that the word is susceptible of more constructions than one, and that its precise meaning must depend on the subject and context.

The second proposition which appears to be beyond dispute in this case, is that the effect of the Orders in Council, Proclamation and Statutes which have to be construed, was to give to the Government of 30 Newfoundland, not mere rights of inspection and regulation exercisable upon a line of shore, but territory which became as much a part of the Colony as the island of Newfoundland itself, and which was capable of being defined by metes and bounds. This is evident from the form of the Commissions issued to Captain Graves and his successors, by which they 35 were appointed Governors of the island of Newfoundland and of the coast of Labrador in identical terms, and, indeed, in one and the same sentence, and in which reference is again and again made to the "territory" of Labrador comprised in the Commission. If there remained any doubt upon this point, it would be set at rest by the language of the statutes of 1774, 1809 and 1825, which refer to the territory in Labrador as being "annexed" first to the Government of Newfoundland and then to the Government of Quebec, and afterwards as being "re-annexed" to Newfoundland and partly "re-annexed" to Lower Canada. Stress was laid by Counsel for Canada on the declaration in the Proclamation of 1763 that the Labrador coast had been put under the "care and inspection" of the Government of Newfoundland; but this ambiguous expression cannot affect the plain inference to be drawn from the other documents cited that what was added to Newfoundland was a tract of land, having a boundary which can be located and defined. Indeed, this is assumed by the terms of reference to this Board, to which the parties have agreed.

In these circumstances the question to be determined is, not whether Newfoundland possesses territory upon the peninsula of Labrador, but what is the inland boundary of that territory. Is it to be defined by a line following the sinuosities of the shore at a distance of one mile or thereabouts from high-water mark, or is it to be found at the watershed of the rivers falling into the sea on that shore ? No third alternative has been suggested by any person.

When the material documents are considered from this point of view, it is evident that they contain much which supports the contention that the word "coast" is to be construed as including a considerable area of land. The Commissions issued to Captain Graves and his successors until 1774 refer to the "territories" of Labrador and to the planters or inhabitants resident there; and they authorise the Governor to appoint judges and justices of the peace for keeping the peace of the coasts and for holding Quarter Sessions at places convenient to the inhabitants. The instructions issued during the same period direct the Governor to erect upon the "coast" court houses for the trial of offenders and prisons for their detention; and it is plain that a criminal jurisdiction limited to a narrow coastal strip, so that offences committed beyond that limit would not be justiciable and offenders escaping from it could not be apprehended, would be very difficult to exercise. Further, the same instructions require the Governor to report, not only as to the protection of the fishery, but also as to the security of the country and the establishing and carrying on of commerce with the Indians inhabiting the coasts of Labrador; and the directions for protecting the timber from waste and for reporting as to the number of the inhabitants and of the furs taken by them and the improvement of the land, which apply to Labrador as well as to the Island, are appropriate to a government extending into the interior.

With regard to the limit in depth of the country which may be described as "coast," where that term is used in the wider sense, it is argued that the natural limit is to be found (in the absence of special circumstances) in the watershed which is the source of the rivers falling into the sea at that place ; and there is much to be said in favour of that view. It is consistent with the doctrine of international law by which the occupation of a seacoast carries with it a right to the whole territory drained by the rivers which empty their water into its line (see Hall's International Law, 5th edition, page 104; Westlake's International Law, Part 1, page 112; and Lawrence's Principles of International Law, 3rd edition, page 151); and it is certainly difficult, in the absence of any specified boundary or of any special feature (such as a political frontier), which could be taken as a boundary, to suggest any point between the seashore and the watershed at which a line could be drawn.

Further, the use of the watershed or "height of land" as a boundary was undoubtedly familiar in British North America at the period in question, and it is shown as a boundary in many of the maps of that time. Thus, in some of the pre-annexation maps of French Canada which have been produced (Sanson 1656, Coronelli 1689, and Mortier 1693), the watershed running westward from Cape Charles is shown as the boundary between Labrador (or Nouvelle Bretagne) and Nouvelle France. In Bowen's map of 1763 the southern boundary of Labrador appears to run along the fifty-second north parallel of latitude, roughly corresponding with the same line of watershed; and the same feature is reproduced in Rocque's map of about the same date. In Bellin's map of 1755 the "hauteur des terres" is indicated as the boundary between the possessions of the Hudson's Bay Company and the territory (then in French ownership) of Labrador or Nouvelle Bretagne; and the same observation applies to Gibson's map of 1763. In the Proclamation of 1763 the province of Quebec thereby constituted was defined as bounded on the south by "the high lands which divide the rivers that empty themselves into the said River St. Lawrence from those which flow into the sea." It may well be, therefore, that in allotting to Newfoundland the "coast" of Labrador the framers of the documents of 1763 had in mind as a boundary the "height of land" from which the rivers ran down to that shore—though without any accurate conception of the distance of that boundary from the sea.

The contention that the territory annexed to Newfoundland was intended to run back to the watershed is supported by the fact that in the Proclamation of 1763 the province of Quebec is described as bounded on the north by a line drawn from the head of the river St. John to the westward—a description which leads to the inference that the land on the east or left bank of the river St. John from its head to the sea had been already allotted to the government of Newfoundland. It has been ascertained by recent surveys that the river St. John here mentioned does not in fact rise near the watershed, but at some point between the height of land and the sea; but it is plain from contemporary maps that the sources of the river Romaine, which rises at the watershed and runs parallel with the St. John, had been taken for the sources of the latter river, and that the eastern boundary of the new Province of Quebec at this point was intended to follow the course of the river Romaine from the watershed to the sea.

A further argument for the adoption of the watershed as the boundary of Newfoundland-Labrador is based on the position at that time of the Hudson's Bay Company. That Company had always claimed to be entitled under its charter to the land reaching to the watersheds from which the rivers ran into Ungava Bay, James Bay, and Hudson's Bay, and this claim was ultimately conceded by the British Government. Upon this footing the line of the watershed running from Cape Chidley southward was for a considerable distance the eastern boundary of the Hudson's Bay territory, and so that watershed might for that distance form a political as well as a natural boundary for the "coast" of Labrador.

But perhaps the strongest argument in favour of an extended construction of the grant to Newfoundland is to be found in the terms of the Act of 1825 above quoted. By that statute, after a recital that it was expedient that "certain parts of the said coasts of Labrador should be re-annexed to and form part of the province of Lower Canada," it was enacted that "so much of the said coast as lies to the westward of a line to be drawn due north and south from the bay or harbour of Ance Sablon inclusive as far as the fifty-second degree of north latitude" should be re-annexed to and made part of that province. Now a line drawn due north and south from the bay of Ance Sablon to the fifty-second degree of north latitude would penetrate the interior of the country for a distance of about 40 miles, and the land to the westward of such a line would in some of its parts cover a distance of over 100 miles from the sea; and this being so, it would seem that the language of this enactment, construed in its plain and natural meaning, points directly to the inference that the expression "coasts of Labrador" as used in 1763 and 1809 was understood by Parliament in 1825 to have comprised the interior of the country back to those limits. It is suggested in the case for the Dominion that the line to be drawn north and south as far as the fifty-second degree was merely the draftsman's device for effecting the division of the coastal strip of one mile at Ance Sablon, and was probably intended to serve as a "boundary monument, as it were," for that purpose; but, having regard to the terms of the statute, their Lordships find great difficulty in accepting that construction.

While these arguments make a formidable case in favour of the contention of Newfoundland, it is obvious that the Canadian claim presents great difficulties. A grant of "so much of the land immediately abutting on the sea above low-water mark as was accessible and useful to the British fishermen annually resorting to the coast," even if expressly made in those terms, would have been so vague and indefinite as to be hardly capable of taking effect without some further and clearer definition. Under a grant in those or similar terms, would regard be had only to the needs of the fishermen resorting to the coast at the date of the grant, or would it be necessary to take into account the possibly greater needs of future generations of fishermen ? And in case of doubt, upon whom would the duty fall of determining what extent of land was "accessible and useful" to the fishermen? The case for Canada admits that it may be found impracticable to lay down such a line upon the land, and suggests that, in order that neither party may suffer by reason of this difficulty, the boundary should be drawn along the coast at a distance of one mile from high-water mark; but their Lordships cannot think that in adopting such a proposal they would be performing the duty cast upon them by the terms of reference to determine the boundary " under the Statutes, Orders in Council and Proclamations." In any case they could not regard the line proposed as accurately defining the territory accessible and useful for the fishery. Of the ribbon of land along the coast which it is proposed to concede to Newfoundland, a great part lies at the summit of high cliffs not accessible from the sea, and this part of the area proposed would be of no use to fishermen. On the other hand, in places where, owing to the existence of a sea beach or of an inlet, opportunities for landing are available, a limit of one mile would often be found insufficient. Dr. Wilfred T. Grenfell, who has an unequalled knowledge of the country to which he has rendered such devoted service, states that he knows of no building in Labrador 'which is more than 250 yards above high-water mark, and that all nets are spread and fish dried within that distance from the sea; but his report makes it clear that, for the purpose of obtaining wood for repairs, an allowance of three miles on the average or five miles as a maximum would not be excessive. This view is confirmed by Minutes of the Executive Council of Newfoundland, from which it appears that it has been the practice in leasing the right to cut timber in the island to reserve a margin of three (or sometimes five) miles from the sea in the interest of the fishermen. Further, there are places where a broad peninsula is joined to the main-land by a neck not more than two miles in width, and in each of these instances the one-mile strip would meet in the neck of the peninsula and cut off by an interposed barrier of Newfoundland soil all access to the Canadian enclave on the broader part of the promontory. These considerations seem to show that on any view of the construction of the grant an allowance of one mile from high-water mark would be inadequate, and that any allowance of that kind which might be made would certainly be arbitrary and would probably be insufficient. Indeed, it may be doubted whether any person, noting upon the sketch-map the configuration of the coast as proposed by Canada to be defined, would conceive that the Crown can have intended to annex to Newfoundland an area of shape and character, to refer to it as a "territory," and to establish a form of Government there; and if, as the Colony forcibly contends, the shores of the great Hamilton Inlet must be treated as a part of the sea coast, so that the one-mile strip would pass up the northern shore of that inlet and round the head of Goose Bay and would then return along its southern shores, the fantastic character of the boundary proposed would become even more apparent. It is also to be observed that the effect of allotting to Newfoundland a continuous one-mile strip along the shore would be to seal off the hinterland up to the watershed from all contact with the shore, from which access to it would naturally be sought ; and it cannot be supposed that the statesmen of 1763 intended, while setting up a new form of Government in the interior, to put that Government entirely at the mercy as regards customs duties and otherwise of the Government of Newfoundland.

The principal arguments urged on behalf of the Dominion were based on the terms of the Proclamation of 1763, and particularly (1) on the declared purpose for which the government of the coast of Labrador, was entrusted to Newfoundland and (2) on the provision made in the Proclamation for the Indians residing in the hinterland. It is true that the actual annexation of part of Labrador to Newfoundland was effected by the Commission issued to Graves under the Order in Council of the 30th March, 1763, which was prior in date to the Proclamation of the 7th October; but the Proclamation is referred to in some of the statutes as a document of great importance, and no doubt regard must be had to its terms so far as they bear on the construction of the Commission of the same year.

As to the purpose of the grant, great stress was laid on the declaration in the Proclamation that "to the end that the open and free fishery of [the King's] subjects might be extended to and be carried on upon the coast of Labrador and the adjacent islands," that coast with the islands has been put under the "care and inspection" of the Governor of Newfoundland. Attention was also called to a number of passages in letters and reports of about the same date, in which the control of the fishermen and the prevention of encroachments by the French were referred to as the principal objects to be attained. Having regard to these expressions, it was said the grant of the " coast " must be held to include only so much of the land as was accessible and useful to the fishermen resorting to that coast in the ordinary conduct of their fishing operations.

There is no doubt that the fisheries supplied the principal, if not the only, motive for the annexation of the coast of Labrador to Newfoundland. Labrador, like Newfoundland, was to be a base for fishing and a nursery of British seamen. But although this was the principal motive of the annexation, it does not follow that it was the measure of the grant. The free right to fish off the shores of Labrador, and the right of British fishermen to land there for the purpose of curing and drying their fish and repairing their ships and tackle, was already secured by statute or Order in Council; and the instructions regularly given to the Admiral in command of the Fleet provided for the protection of British subjects and the prevention of foreign intruders. What King George III and his advisers desired was that there should be a government on the coast, with power to administer justice, to imprison offenders, to encourage trade, and to erect forts for the purpose of defence; and it was for these purposes, which went beyond the regulation of the fisheries, that the coast of Labrador was subjected to the government of Newfoundland on the same terms as the island of Newfoundland itself.

Further, the fishing industry would not have been fully provided for by the grant of jurisdiction over a narrow strip of land near the shore. In addition to the cod and the whale which were caught off the Atlantic coast, and to the seal and sea-cow which were found mainly in the gulf of St. Lawrence, the salmon and salmon-trout had to be considered. The salmon fisheries are mentioned in the Instructions given to Captain Graves, and the special importance of those fisheries in the gulf of St. Lawrence, and in the rivers running into the gulf, is apparent from many references in the documents produced in evidence. The salmon fishery could only be fully protected by the grant of jurisdiction over the rivers and inland lakes as well as over the seashore; and from this point of view the reference to the fisheries tends rather to extend than to limit the grant.

But it was pointed out that the Proclamation of 1763 contained a declaration (quoted above) reserving under the sovereignty, protection and dominion of the King for the use of the Indians, the lands and territories not included within the limits of the three new governments of Quebec, East Florida and West Florida, or within the limits of the territory granted to the Hudson's Bay Company; and it was argued that this reservation applied to the territory occupied by the Indian tribes 45 who were settled between the Atlantic seaboard of Labrador and the watershed, and was evidence that this territory was not intended. to be included in the "coast" granted to Newfoundland. The Indians living in this territory consisted of Nascopies who lived north of the Hamilton River, and Montagnais who ranged to the south of that river ; and if it were established that those tribes were intended to be included among the Indians in whose favour the reservation was made, the argument would undoubtedly have much force. But it does not appear to their Lordships to be made out that the declaration in question referred to the lands occupied by these two tribes. The reservation is confined to lands occupied by "the said Indians"—that is to say, those who are referred to in the next preceding paragraph of the Proclamation as nations or tribes of Indians with whom the King was connected and who lived under his protection; and it appears from the report of the Lords of Trade, dated the 8th June, 1763, on which the Proclamation was based, that the Indians so described consisted of those tribes of the Six Nations who were settled round the great lakes or beyond the sources of the rivers which fell into the river St. Lawrence from the north. This description would not include Indians residing beyond the sources of the rivers which flow into the gulf of St. Lawrence or into the Atlantic. It is true that the exception of lands and territories included in the three new governments or the Hudson's Bay territory does not apply to lands in the "coast" annexed to Newfoundland; but if the Indians in the "coast" territory were not included in "the said Indians," it was unnecessary to except them. Nor would the lands occupied by these Indians fall within the general description contained in the Proclamation, as "lands and territories lying to the westward of the sources of the rivers which fall into the sea from the west and north-west." Further, the Nascopies and Montagnais, so far as they had taken any part in the Anglo-French conflict, had sided with France, and they were not connected with or under the protection of the King before the cession of the French territory to him. The instructions given to Governor Graves in the earlier part of the same year had required him to report as to the establishing or carrying-on of a commerce with the Indians "inhabiting the coast of Labrador"—a direction which was repeated in the Instructions to the Governors appointed immediately after the Proclamation, but which was omitted in those given after 1774 when Labrador was withdrawn from the government of Newfoundland; and such a direction would have been out of place if the Indians settled in Labrador had been altogether excluded from the Governor's jurisdiction. Upon the whole, their Lordships are of opinion that this argument, although well deserving of consideration, is not well founded.

It is said that the territory claimed by Newfoundland is of great extent, being about twice the size of Newfoundland itself; and no doubt this is the case. But the territory in question, when compared with the vast regions with which the British Government was dealing at the time, 40 was relatively small in area and infinitesimal in value.

The colony of Newfoundland claimed to support its case founded on the documents by a reference to evidence showing that the annexation of the "coast" had from the year 1763 onwards been understood and treated by everyone as including the whole area, lying between the sea and the watershed or "height of land"; and there is no doubt that, where a document is ambiguous, evidence of a course of conduct which is sufficiently early and continuous may be taken into account as bearing upon the construction of the document. In this case the events of the sixty years next after the year 1763 have a special relevance, as the statute of 1809 (under which the present title of Newfoundland directly arises) and the statute of 1825 may be assumed to have been passed with knowledge of the public events which had occurred before their passing. It may be added that it was a term of the agreement between the two governments that in the discussion before this Board reference might be made to any evidence which (having regard to the nature of the case and the parties to it) the Board might think material and proper to be considered; and that throughout the discussion, which was conducted in the most friendly spirit, both parties were desirous that no available material which might possibly bear upon the question to be decided should be excluded from consideration.

p. 1021

In this connection the following facts, which were proved, appear to their Lordships to be material and proper to be considered :—

(1) In the year 1765 the Unitas Fratrum, a Society of Moravian missionaries, petitioned the Lords of Trade for the allotment to them of four tracts of land on the coast of Labrador containing together about 400,000 acres, with a view to the settlement there of missions to the Eskimos; and with the approval of the Lords of Trade missionaries were sent out by the Society and received the support and protection of Governor Palliser. At a meeting of the Privy Council held on the 3rd May, 1769, upon a report of the Lords of Trade recommending that a grant of land should be made to the Society, the King in Council authorised certain British subjects as trustees for the Unitas Fratrum to occupy and possess during His Majesty's pleasure 100,000 acres of land in such part of Eskimo Bay on the coast of Labrador as they should find most suitable to that purpose, and directed the Governor of Newfoundland to give them all reasonable assistance and support in forming their establishment. This grant was duly made, and early in the year 1774 two other similar grants to or in trust for the Society of 100,000 acres each were sanctioned by the Privy Council and committed to the Governor of Newfoundland to be carried out. In the year 1821, after the retransfer of Labrador to Newfoundland, a fourth grant of a like nature was made to the same Society.

The lands so granted to the Society of Unitas Fratrum penetrated into the country far beyond the suggested limit of one mile from high-water mark, and in the case of the most northerly of them to a distance of about 30 miles from the shore. It would appear that these grants, connected as they were with the Government of Newfoundland, were consistent only with the existence of a Newfoundland jurisdiction extending beyond the littoral strip ; and it is hard to believe that when, in the year 1809, Parliament restored to Newfoundland the coast of Labrador, it intended to divide the Moravian settlements then in existence, placing a small fraction of them (one mile in width) under the jurisdiction of the colony, and leaving the remainder to Canada.

(2) In the year 1774, John Agnew and others having petitioned for a grant of mines and minerals to be discovered on the "coast or country of Labrador" between the river St. Lawrence and Hudson's Straits, the King in Council approved of the grant to them of all such mines and minerals "upon such parts of the sea coasts of Labrador as lie within 60 miles of low-water mark of the open sea" between the river St. John and the southern limits of the territories granted to the Hudson's Bay Company. This grant appears to treat the "coasts" as extending far inland from the shore.

(3) The administration of justice in Labrador has throughout been under the direction of the government of Newfoundland. In the early years after the annexation it was found sufficient, as in the case of Newfoundland itself, to administer justice by the agency of Naval Surrogates exercising their functions on board their vessels or from some place close to the sea shore. But by the Act of 1809 (section 15) it was enacted that the Supreme Court of Judicature of Newfoundland might hold sittings for criminal and civil cases in the parts of the coast of Labrador by that Act re-annexed to Newfoundland; and by an Act of 1811 the institution of surrogate courts for that purpose was authorised. By an Act of 1824 the government of Newfoundland was empowered to institute a court of civil jurisdiction on the "coast" itself, and to appoint a judge of such court; and Judge Patterson, the Judge so appointed, exercised his functions at various places in the Labrador territory, including Rigolet, Kimmamish and North West Brook, places which would have been far outside his jurisdiction if it had been limited as suggested by the Dominion in this enquiry. In 1834 the Legislature of Newfoundland, which had then been established, abolished the court in Labrador on the ground of expense; but by an Act of the same Legislature passed in 1863 the Governor was empowered to institute "at the Labrador" a court of civil and criminal jurisdiction to be presided over by one judge to be appointed by the Governor in Council, and with an appeal to the Supreme Court of Newfoundland, and to appoint such judge to be a collector of revenue on the Labrador. This court was duly set up and was presided over by Judges Sweetland, Pinsent and McNeil successively; and it continued to function until 1874, when it was discontinued. Each of these judges, in addition to performing his judicial duties, made reports from time to time to the Governor on a number of questions relating to the territory of Labrador, including roads, schools, churches and the fur trade. Among other incidents may be mentioned a visit of Judge Pinsent in 1873 to the North West river (about 100 miles from the open sea), when a Government official vaccinated a number of Montagnais Indians coming there for trade.

(4) Customs duties have been levied on behalf of the government of Newfoundland on goods disembarked in Labrador from about the year 1826 until the present time, and the right of the government to collect such duties has from time to time been affirmed by the Secretary of State. In the year 1864 Mr. Donald Smith (afterwards Lord Strathcona), who was in control of the Hudson's Bay Company's trading station at North West river, agreed after some demur to pay the duties on goods landed at that place; and such duties have since been regularly paid.

It may be added that a considerable trade in fur was carried on by traders settled at or near the seashore or on the shores of the Hamilton inlet with the Indians in the interior, and was fostered by the Governor of Newfoundland; but a trade of this character would easily reach beyond the territory of the traders themselves, and it has little bearing on the question of boundary. A similar observation applies to the trade carried on by the Indians with the King's Posts in the Province of Quebec, on which counsel for Canada relied. No evidence was given of any exercise of a Canadian jurisdiction in any part of the territory in dispute.

It seems desirable to add some observations on the maps, of which a large number (some of great antiquity and interest) were produced by the parties.* Maps published by private persons must, of course, be received with caution, as such persons depend to a large extent upon information obtained from general and unauthoritative sources; but a map issued or accepted by a public authority, and especially by an authority connected with one of the governments concerned, an inference may not improperly be drawn.

The maps issued before 1763 have no direct bearing on this case, although some of them have been already referred to as instances of the use of a watershed or "height of land" as the boundary of a territory; and the later maps down to the year 1842 are of little use, except that they clearly indicate the whole course of the river St. John as the eastern boundary between Quebec and Labrador. Arrowsmith's map of British North America (N 24), published in 1842, is interesting as showing a line drawn from Ance Sablon northward to the fifty-second degree of north latitude and then along that parallel to the head of the St. John river as being at that point the boundary between Lower Canada and Labrador, thus indicating that the construction of section 9 of the Act of 1825 now put forward by Newfoundland was then adopted by the cartographer. The same indication of boundary appears, with greater authority, in the map (N 25) prepared in 1855 by T. C. Keeper, C.E., on the instructions of the government of Canada for the use of the Canadian Commissioners at the Paris Exhibition. Arrowsmith's map of 1857 (N 26) has some authority as having been ordered to be printed by the House of Commons for the purposes of the Hudson's Bay Committee of that year, and as having been selected as an exhibit in the Alaska Boundary case; and that map not only has a similar indication as to the southern boundary of Labrador, but assigns to that territory the exact boundaries now claimed for it on behalf of Newfoundland. The same observation applies to a map (N 31) prepared in 1871 by two Canadian officials (Russell and Mare) on the order of the Canadian Minister of Agriculture, and to a map (N 32a) compiled by Desbarats in 1873 and sent by Lord Dufferin as Governor-General of Canada to the British Ambassador in Washington as showing "the exact boundary on the coast and the assumed boundary in the interior." The despatch of the Governor-General transmitting this map enclosed a copy of the report of a Committee of the Privy Council approved by the Governor-General in Council on the 12th November, 1874, which was in the following terms :—

In a despatch dated 20th June, 1874, from Sir Edward Thornton to Your Excellency, inclosing a communication from the Hon. Hamilton Fish, Secretary of State at Washington, desiring to be informed whether any part of Labrador is separated from the jurisdiction of either the Dominion of Canada or that of Newfoundland.

The Honourable the secretary of State to whom this despatch, with enclosures has been referred, reports that the boundary-line between the Dominion of Canada and Labrador is line drawn due north and south from the Bay or Harbor of Ance au Blanc Sablon, near the Straits of Belle Isle, as far as the 52nd degree of north latitude; that Labrador extends eastward and northward from that point to Hudson's Straits.

That the division-line in the interior separating Labrador from the Dominion of Canada has only been defined as far north as the 52nd degree of north latitude, but it has been assumed that the boundary-line in the interior would have taken the direction laid down on the accompanying map, which follows the height of land.

That Labrador, with the islands adjacent thereto, is annexed to Newfoundland, and under the Government of that Island.

Attached to the Report of the Secretary of State are extracts from the Imperial Statute bearing on the question, and a map showing the exact boundary on the coast and the assumed boundary in the interior.

The Committee recommend that a copy of this Minute with map and extracts from the Imperial Statute, above alluded to, be transmitted to Sir Edward Thornton for the information of the United States Government.

The terms of this report appear to their Lordships to be significant.

The maps subsequent to 1874 are not less interesting. The boundary now claimed by Newfoundland is assigned to Labrador by a map (N 35) prepared by Johnston in 1878, signed by the Surveyor-General of Canada and published by order of the Ministry of the Interior; in a map (C 36 and N 36) prepared by Johnston and Edmunds in 1882 and issued by the Canadian Department of Railways; and in a map (N 38) compiled by two French-Canadians (Tache and Genest) and issued by the 30 Department of Railways of Quebec in 1883. In a map (C 37 and N 39) prepared by J. Johnston by authority of the Minister of the Interior and issued by the Department of the Interior at Ottawa in July, 1890, the height of land now claimed by Newfoundland as a boundary is shown by a red line; and though it is not clear on that map whether it is intended to be taken as the boundary between Canada and the Dependency of Newfoundland, no other boundary is indicated. This observation does not apply to a map (N 41) issued by the Department of Railways and Canals of Canada in 1891 and signed by the Chief Engineer of Government Railways, for in that map Labrador is clearly shown as bounded by the height of land; nor to a map (N 43) published by the Map and School Supply Company of Canada, Limited, and registered with the Department of Agriculture, in which "Labrador (Dependency of Newfoundland)" is depicted in bold colours as containing (subject to a slight difference to be mentioned hereafter) the precise area for which Newfoundland is contending. In the important map (N 42) prepared by Mr. A. P. Low, an official of the Canadian Geographical Survey, as the result of a careful survey of the country and issued by that Department in 1896, the approximate height of land is shown, though not as a boundary; but the line drawn due north from Alice Sablon to the fifty- second parallel is shown and marked "boundary line." No other boundary of Labrador is indicated in that map. It is not until the year

[1927lab]

1900 that the boundary now claimed by Canada is found upon any map; but it then appears upon a map (C 39) issued by the Department of the Interior, where a dotted line is drawn along the line of the shore and is marked " boundary undefined." It is also found in later maps; but as these were published after the dispute had arisen, no importance attaches to them.

The maps here referred to, even when issued or accepted by departments of the Canadian Government, cannot be treated as admissions binding on that Government; for even if such an admission could be effectively made, the departments concerned are not shown to have had any authority to make it. But the fact that throughout a long series of years, and until the present dispute arose, all the maps issued in Canada either supported or were consistent with the claim now put forward by Newfoundland, is of some value as showing the construction put upon the Orders in Council and statutes by persons of authority and by the general public in the Dominion.

Upon the whole, their Lordships, having considered the facts and arguments put before them with the care which is necessary in a matter of such grave importance, have come to the conclusion that the claim of the Colony of Newfoundland is in substance made out; but there are two points of detail to be mentioned.

First, in many of the maps issued after the year 1882, and particularly in the official maps above mentioned and numbered N 38, 41 and 43, and in maps issued by W. and A. K. Johnston (N 37) and by Stanford (N 40), the southern boundary of Labrador is shown as running, not from the point where the north and south line drawn from Ance Sablon meets the fifty-second parallel, and in a straight line along that parallel, but from a point where that north and south line would reach the watershed north of the fifty-second parallel and along that watershed as far as the head of the Romaine river. A boundary so drawn along the watershed would no doubt be more convenient than one which follows the arbitrary line of the fifty-second parallel, and would have the advantage of throwing into Canada the whole course of the rivers which run into the gulf of St. Lawrence. But their Lordships would not feel justified in adopting a boundary which, however convenient in itself, is not warranted by the terms of the statute of 1825; and they are of opinion that the line must be drawn along the parallel as far as the supposed river of St. Johns, namely, the Romaine river. According to the claim of the Colony as illustrated by the sketch-map, the line would be continued westward across the river until it met the height of land; but there is no warrant in the statute of 1825 for such a continuation of the line, the effect of which would be to give to Newfoundland a part of the original province of Quebec as constituted under the Proclamation of 1763. The line should follow the parallel only until it meets the river, and should then turn north to the watershed.

Secondly, a small island called Woody Island, lying opposite to the bay of Ance Sablon, is claimed both by Canada and by Newfoundland. In their Lordships' opinion the transfer to Canada by the Act of 1825 of so much of the coast as lies to the westward of a line drawn due north and south from the bay or harbour of Ance Sablon " inclusive," with the islands adjacent to that part of the coast, carries with it Woody island, which accordingly belongs to the Dominion.

p. 1026

For the above reasons their Lordships are of opinion that, according to the true construction of the Statutes, Orders in Council and Proclamations referred to in the Order of Reference, the boundary between Canada and Newfoundland in the Labrador Peninsula is a line drawn due north from the eastern boundary of the bay or harbour of Ance Sablon as far as the fifty-second degree of north latitude, and from thence westward along that parallel until it reaches the Romaine river, and then northward along the left or east bank of that river and its head waters to their source and from thence due north to the crest of the watershed or height of land there, and from thence westward and northward along the crest of the watershed of the rivers flowing into the Atlantic Ocean until it reaches Cape Chidley; and they will humbly advise His Majesty accordingly.

AT THE COURT AT BUCKINGHAM PALACE.

THE 22ND DAY OF MARCH, 1927.

PRESENT:

THE KING'S MOST EXCELLENT MAJESTY

LORD PRIVY SEAL

SECRETARY SIR SAMUEL HOARE

MASTER OF THE HORSE

LT.-COL. WILFRID ASHLEY.

WHEREAS there was this day read at the Board a Report from the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council dated the 1st day of March 1927 in the words following, viz. :—

" WHEREAS by virtue of Your Majesty's Order in Council of the 24th day of July 1925 there was referred unto this Committee for their hearing and consideration the question, viz. :—What is the location and definition of the boundary as between Canada and Newfoundland in the Labrador Peninsula under the Statutes, Orders in Council and Proclamations ?"

"THE LORDS OF THE COMMITTEE in obedience to His Majesty's said Order in Council have taken the said question into consideration and having heard Counsel on behalf of the Government of the Dominion of Canada and the Government of the Colony of Newfoundland Their Lordships do this day agree humbly to report to Your Majesty as their opinion that according to the true construction of the Statutes, Orders in Council and Proclamations referred to in the Order of Reference, the boundary between Canada and Newfoundland in the Labrador Peninsula is a line drawn due north from the eastern boundary of the bay or harbour of Ance Sablon as far as the, fifty-second degree of north latitude, and from thence westward along that parallel until it reaches the Romaine river, and then northward along the left or east bank of that river and its head waters to their source and from thence due north to the crest of the watershed or height of land there, and from thence westward and northward along the crest of the watershed of the rivers flowing into the Atlantic Ocean until it reaches Cape Chidley."

HIS MAJESTY having taken the said Report into consideration was pleased by and with the advice of His Privy Council to approve thereof and to order as it is hereby ordered that the same be punctually observed obeyed and carried into execution.

Whereof all persons whom it may concern are to take notice and govern themselves accordingly.
